Some of the poorer classes liv on hillsides so steep that there are no regular streets or paths, and coming into the city on certain roads used to almost take away my breath to see those wretched shanties poised in mid-air from two to three hundred feet above the tracks, and when the clouds are low they are completely hidden from sight. Their rents are practically nothing, but the absence from municipal accommodations more than offsets the advantages. The children learn to become a sort of human fly, or else they would certainly fall over these precipices.

The utilization of natural gas has been the greatest boon that could possibly fall to the city of Pittsburgh, and clear skies hav taken the place of dense clouds of smoky darkness which certainly might, like that of Egypt, be felt. From force of habit, the barbers continue to wash your face over three times, which was merely intended to take the fresh, grimy soot off in the past.

In the matter of buildings Pittsburgh has a court house which rivals in massiv Norman architectural grandeur that of any city on this continent, and in all other directions its progress and prosperity are remarkably of the metropolitan order. Those who take advantage of the low rates to the Congress will be well repaid for their visit by the unusual attractions Pittsburgh presents.

Courtlandt Palmer's Funeral.

From Secular Thought.

The indignant protest of Miss Helen Gardener in the last issue of Secular Thought against the part that Dr. R. Heber Newton took at the close of the funeral of our friend Palmer, has been followed by intimations that he in some way went back upon his religion or his friend at the last moment, or that his friend failed to comply with his oft-repeated and published request to join in the last words over him.

It is proper that all these protests, insinuations, and suspicions should be put at rest by the following letters and by an explanation honorable to all concerned.

It had been for many years an understanding between Mr. Palmer and myself that the survivor should speak at the funeral of the other, and with Colonel Ingersoll, if his participation could be obtained.

On the 19th of March last I received the following letter, and was told that one, containing the same directions as to his funeral, was at the same time sent to Colonel Ingersoll, which has been recently published in Secular Thought:

No. 117 EAST 21ST ST., GRAMERCY PARK, N. Y.,
March 16, 1888.

MY DEAR WAKEMAN.—The sacrilege of the Christian service over the remains of the dead Freethinker, Henry Bergh, which I attended this morning, has led me to speak again of what I desire done when I shall start upon my rest.

I shall hav my remains cremated, and hav written to Mr. Walter Damrosch about the music. The addresses are to be from you and Colonel Ingersoll; you first, and Ingersoll second. I would like neither of you to talk much more than fifteen minutes.

Hav you any idea of what was done with that form of funeral service which I worked out with considerable labor? I think it was left in the hands of Mr. Hugh B. Brown. Do you know of any good printed forms for the burial of Freethinkers? I should like to see them.

Yours sincerely, COURTLANDT PALMER.

P.S.—I hav shown the above to my wife.—C. P.

At the next interview with Mr. Palmer, after receiving this letter, I called his attention to its postscript, and intimated that Mrs. Palmer's wishes in such a matter must be regarded, and that I would not like to speak without her consent. The next reference to this matter was contained in the following letter, which was evidently dictated, but was signed by his own hand. It was about the last thing he did, and is of inexpressible value as evidence of his friendship, and of his confidence in, and devotion to, the new faith. It shows him happy, fearless, and true in the face of death, and that he kindly deferred to Mrs. Palmer's wishes, so as not to deprive her of the consolation of her faith in the hour of her affliction.

BRANDON, VT., July 22, 1888.

DEAR WAKEMAN: I should not wonder if, ere this reaches you, life's fitful fever over, I might be sleeping soundly the sleep that knows no waking, and that is so full of peace.

I am suffering from an acute attack of peritonitis that began less than a week ago, and has kept me in fever and pain since then, relieved only by morphine.

I shall send some memoranda to-morrow about my funeral, in case a proposed operation, which the doctors deem necessary to my recovery, should not terminate as they hope. My secretary has all my writings.

I think my little poems, called "The Future" and "The New-Born Soul," had best be read at my funeral. From the latter, however, reject the more abstruse verses in reading.

Mrs. Palmer is very anxious to find some liberal theologian who will officiate with Ingersoll. In that case, probably, you had best withdraw, because the most effectiv tribute I can receive anyhow is a short encomium as a Freethinker, and Ingersoll's eloquence will accomplish this better even than your knowledge and friendship. Please consult Mrs. Palmer, Mr. D. G. Thompson, and Colonel Ingersoll about details of funeral.

You and I hav stood side by side for many long years as religious co-believers in this world. And, with no knowledge of a life beyond the grave, I do not hesitate to affirm, in the expected presence of death, that the religion of humanity is a faith to liv and die by.

I hav asked Mrs. Palmer, in the settlement of my estate, to giv to you five hundred (500) dollars as a contribution toward the publication of your works.

As ever, Your friend, COURTLANDT PALMER.

Before the receipt of this letter death had left only the following response possible:

No. 93 NASSAU ST., N. Y., July 24, 1888.

MY DEAR MRS. PALMER: In this terrible and sudden affliction, if I can be of any service in any way, let me know where I can meet you or friends.

Mr. Palmer, in a letter to me on Sunday, the 22d, suggested that some liberal clergyman should speak with Colonel Ingersoll at the funeral in my stead, as he originally intended. Let this be done by all means, if possible. I feel too much burdened with grief to say more now. With sincerest sympathy, Yours, T. B. WAKEMAN.

The wishes of Mr. Palmer as to his funeral, and even his cremation, were in fact fully complied with. The presence, at its close, of his wife's pastor, a liberal theologian, was no exception. His consent to that presence, though evidently obtained during his last hours, was a double victory—a victory over himself in deferring to the wish of another; and a victory for Freethought, in placing it in his own family and home by its greatest advocate, and having it recognized there at the same time on an equal footing, by the presence of the accredited representativ of the elder faith. Thus "the amenities of the soul" and of the faiths were properly regarded. As to the propriety of having Colonel Ingersoll to speak, if he could be obtained, neither of us ever had a doubt. No one could hav uttered that true, noble, beautiful, wonderful eulogy over our friend but he to compare with whom, as has been said of Shakspere, sane ambition does not even dare to aspire.

T. B. WAKEMAN.

Courtlandt Palmer and "The Aristocracy of Freethought."

Of the many devoted Liberal workers whom I hav met since I entered the lecture field, more than two hundred now repose in the grave. In this mortuary list are recorded the names of some of the ablest and most distinguished apostles of Freethought: The tireless and fearless D. M. Bennett; that eloquent Radical and martyr to science, William Denton; that lifelong reformer and subtle thinker, Stephen Pearl Andrews; T. C. Leland, whose pen was a dagger, but in whose breast throbbed the heart of a child; that sturdy Western warrior, D. R. Burt; that humble, but indefatigable itinerant, F. F. Follett, who planted the banner of Liberalism and sowed the seeds of Freethought in every county of Illinois; that grand old patriarch, Elizur Wright, ever to be found in the front rank of freedom's soldiers; the venerable editor of the Liberal, W. S. Bailey; the frank and genial Dr. T. L. Brown; the great Freethinking jurist, Arnold Krekel; and now our beloved comrade Courtlandt Palmer.

The death of Courtlandt Palmer is a peculiarly sad and lamentable event. The others named had, for the most part, lived to a good, ripe age; but he is stricken down in the noon of a useful life. Nature was prodigal in many respects in bestowing her gifts upon him. He possessed in a high degree everything calculated to make man happy, save health, and this, during the last decade of his life at least, was denied him. He suffered much. I was with him six times during the last six years—in New York, in Albany, in Rochester, in Cleveland, at Watkins, and at Cassadaga—and I never saw him when he was free from pain.

He suffered. But in spite of his sufferings he toiled, and the world has been enriched by his labors. In this brief, tortured life he dreamed splendid dreams in behalf of humanity. Some of these dreams he made realities; and but for disease and death he would hav achieved still greater triumphs for the cause so dear to his heart. I remember with what enthusiasm he unfolded to me the plans of his great Freethought temple, and then with what keen sorrow he referred to his failing health and his consequent inability to proceed with his cherished enterprise. Could he hav been assured of twenty years of health that magnificent project would hav been successfully carried out. But he feared that his years were few, and he realized that whether few or many they would be weighted with the burden of ill-health, and so it was reluctantly abandoned. But in the parlors of his home sprang up and flourished the Nineteenth Century Club, a society whose work can hardly be overestimated.

On the platform Mr. Palmer was one of our ablest advocates. He did not speak often, but few spoke better. His address at Watkins, in 1882, was a masterpiece of eloquence. His scholarly effort at Rochester, in the following year, was much admired. Those who attended the Cleveland Congress in 1885 will recall, in addition to Colonel Ingersoll's last great lecture, "Myth and Miracle," two noble vindications of Freethought delivered there—two of the most sublimely eloquent discourses that this generation has listened to—"The Glory of Infidelity," by Samuel P. Putnam, and "The Aristocracy of Freethought," by Courtlandt Palmer. Neither of these discourses has, I believe, been published. Both ought to be, and it is to suggest and urge the publication of Mr. Palmer's address that I hav taken up my pen. It can, I think, be procured, and it should be printed. In no other way can we more fittingly do honor to the memory of our departed brother than to read and cherish the brave and inspiring words which in life he uttered in defense of our cause. Will THE TRUTH SEEKER endeavor to favor the Liberal public with Mr. Palmer's address?

J. E. REMSBURG.

Robert Dale Owen on Miracles.

The late Robert Dale Owen was a Spiritualist. He published a book entitled, "Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World," and he believed in the materialization of Katie King. But Mr. Owen became a convert to Spiritualism rather late in life. In 1831, when he was twenty-seven years of age, he had a discussion with Origen Bacheler on the "Authenticity of the Bible," and it is amusing now to read his argument against miracles. He said:

> I heard a Scottish Highlander declare, with a voice and manner which left no doubt of his sincerity, that he possessed the faculty of second sight, and he related to me the instance in which he had exercised it. I disbelieved him. Why? Second sight is a miracle.

The italics are Mr. Owen's. Then, after citing from Cotton Mather about specters and demons, and particularly the case of a specter-ship that was seen by an assembled multitude to enter the port of Salem under full sail, and suddenly vanish while they were singing, under the direction of the Rev. Zebidee Stebbins, the forty-sixth Psalm, Mr. Owen says:

> In the face of this mass of evidence, we do not believe Cotton Mather's stories. Why? For the simple reason: they are miraculous.

And in a note appended to the foregoing he adds:

> I cannot consent to waste my own and our readers' time by disproving witchcraft. If anyone still believes in the stories of Cotton Mather and Jack the Giant-Killer, I leave the assailing of his faith to others who hav more leisure and patience than I hav.

Such was the summary manner in which that question was disposed of by one who twenty-five years later became a believer in phenomena far more miraculous than the Scotchman's second sight, and quite as incredible as the phantom-ship of Salem.

Mr. Owen's opponent, on the other hand, not content with upholding only ancient Bible miracles, adduced several modern ones; for example, the vision of the Rev. Wm. Tennent, of New Jersey, who died in 1777. Mr. Tennent, in a trance, saw "an innumerable host of happy beings surrounding the inexpressible glory in acts of adoration and pious worship," but "not any bodily shape or representation in the glorious appearance." He heard also "their songs and hallelujahs of thanksgiving and praise, with unspeakable rapture." Not only did Mr. Tennent hav this trance, but at another time, being under trial in court for an offense, the nature of which is not stated, he was honorably acquitted by strangers who were directed to the place of trial by a dream.

Another remarkable fulfilment of a dream was adduced by Mr. Bacheler as a modern miracle. Also a case where two young men at Port Royal, Jamaica, having "argued that earthquakes and all other things come by nature, and denied a supernatural power," were so astonished at an earthquake that they took to their beds and "never spoke more, but died soon after."

It is not surprising that Mr. Owen disdained to notice these alleged proofs of modern miracles, having defined his position so positivly; but it is curious to compare his views as expressed in 1831 with those he entertained and published in the latter years of his life.

Had Origen Bacheler lived as long as Robert Dale Owen it is quite possible that his views would hav undergone a change in the opposit direction, so that we might hav seen the Infidel upholding modern Spiritual manifestations, including Salem witchcraft, all as miraculous, and the Christian denouncing all of them as gross frauds or works of the devil.

W. H. BURR.

An Important Question.

Please decide it immediately. To all readers of Liberal papers and dear friends: I am now in the eighty-eighth year of my life, and feel that I am drawing near to its close; am liable to drop away at any moment, but hav not the means to accomplish what I wish to before I die, therefore I appeal to you.

In 1845, forty-three years ago, after lecturing more or less for more than twenty years, I started a paper, the Portland Pleasure Boat, in Maine—with $5 given me by the first outspoken Infidel or Liberal I had ever conversed with, at the close of one of my lectures in a city, and a small sum more, for which I pledged my clothing—and published the paper about seventeen years.

At that time the Boston Investigator was the only Liberal paper published. I was influenced to start the paper by witnessing the influence the clergy had over their ignorant and credulous dupes, and from a desire to dispel that influence and set them free.

The Boat was not started to advocate Infidelity, for I did not believe the people were prepared for it, but its aim and object was to convince the people that they were not Christians, and thus break their hold on their false and vain hopes and prepare them to look for something better; and this work it did thoroughly accomplish on the minds of many thousands. All who carefully read the paper became convinced that the churches of that day were no more like such churches as the better part of the New Testament doctrin would establish than they were like the synagog of Satan. The clergy of that day never attempted to dispute or disprove my facts, but spent their time in calling me a blasphemer, in declaring that I ought to be hanged, and in laboring to prevent people from reading what I wrote.

Every week while publishing the Boat, during seventeen years, I laid aside a quantity of the unbound volumes, intending near the close of life to giv them to the people of this generation that they might see the difference in opinions between the people now and twenty to more than forty years ago.

The time has now come when I want these papers scattered over the land, for I know they might open the eyes of thousands who are yet willing dupes and slaves to priestcraft; but I am not able to spread them free, as I intended. I hav been confined to my couch most of the time for several months. Mittie, my faithful companion, who has borne with my deafness nearly half a century, is now confined to her bed; I hav not the means to hire housekeeper or nurse; if we should linger along till winter comes, we hav not the means to procure fuel, food, or necessary clothing, and I see no way to procure means except by selling these unbound volumes of my old paper. And there are two ways in which to do that. I will send them to those who order them, postpaid, at fifty cents a volume; the original price was $1. If Liberals will buy these papers to read and distribute among their friends, all will be well; the wolf will be driven from the door for a while. If not, I must sell them to the paper-makers, to be ground over, and perhaps worked up into Bibles and tracts, to aid the priests of all sects in deceiving and misleading the people another thousand years; and here, friends, is the question I ask you to solve, Will you buy these papers to do good with, or must they be destroyed?

As I was the means of starting the "Children's Corner" in several papers, I would like to hav one volume go into the hands of every child of the "Corner." Two children can send for one volume each and hav different ones, so by paying fifty cents each and changing papers each can read two volumes; and a dozen can send for one each, all different, and read a dozen volumes for fifty cents each child, if they liv near each other.

For some years past the Boston Investigator, New York TRUTH SEEKER, the Light-Bearer, and other Liberal papers hav been kindly sent to me free, and I hav a large quantity of them on hand now, and specimen copies of them all will be sent out in every package of mine, so that many will see papers they hav not seen before.

Now, friends, if you act, be quick, for time is short. Write names and post-offices plainly. I hav several orders for my "Lecture and Rhymes" that I cannot answer on account of errors.

Will all Liberal papers copy this, and aid one who has spent his life in battling superstition?

God and the Bible.

DEUTERONOMY.

Chap. xxiii, 2: More heavenly justice. Generation after generation sent to hell for what they cannot help. Better that a God or Bible had never been heard of than such infernal doctrin taught.

If every man who would enslave another could be forced to wear the chains himself, there would not be an advocate of slavery in all the earth. And if Christians who are bedeviled to get the Bible into the schools could be compelled to display some of these precious chips from God's hewing-block before the scholars in school every morning, their own children included, they would soon die of dry-rot.

Chap. xxiv, 1: "When a man hath taken a wife, and she find no favor in his eyes, then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and giv it in her hand, and send her out of his house."

But suppose the husband find no favor in her eyes? That was quite a different thing in old Bible times when God ruled the people. No wonder Christian ladies are so fond of carrying gilt-edged Bibles, nor why they are so taken with black-coated gentlemen, nor why they are considered the main pillars in the church. Talmage has given the reason: "It is through the Bible and Christian teaching that woman has been lifted to her present high position."

Chap. xxv, 11, 12: These two verses I call Christian ladies' tidbits. Unless my Christian lady friends take the trouble to look up these choice morsels dropped from the throne of God, these remarks, in a measure, will appear pointless. No penalty for "ripping up women alive," no penalty for giving over young girls to lustful soldiers when they fight on God's side. But when a woman attempts to rescue her husband from the man who "smites him," then she is to hav her hand cut off, and none is to pity her. "The Bible is woman's friend—it has brought her up to her high position in society." Yes, and it has made Talmage crazy, and caused him to tell hundreds of lies, and play the harlequin, and deceive the people.

One would think that if he should put some of these select passages of scripture so edifying to Christian ladies into his sanctimonious pipe and smoke them, they might clear his vision, so that his statements would not disgrace a certain long-eared animal mentioned in holy writ, owned by one Balaam.

Chap. xxvii, verses 20, 21, 22, 23: Lot and his family were so precious in the sight of God that he sent a special agent to warn them when the city in which they lived was to be destroyed. Yet Lot's daughters got the father drunk and were guilty of incestuous acts that would shame a Hottentot. But in the passages above cited God pronounces curses upon those guilty of incest. This shows that God is unchangeable and no respecter of persons.

JOSHUA.

Chap. v, 2: "At that time the Lord said unto Joshua: Make thee sharp knives and circumcise again the children of Israel the second time." This sounds just like some of God's talk. The only wonder is that he didn't order their ears cropped and their noses slit. God must hav been tickled when his command was carried into execution. After the job was completed, I wouldn't wonder if he and his old Josh "took a smile." It is to be hoped that the second operation afforded God sufficient delight to balance the torture to those who had the operation performed on them. A great deal of human suffering on account of a godly whim—but "of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Chap. vi, 2: "And the Lord said unto Joshua, seven priests shall bear before the ark seven trumpets of rams' horns." Verse 20: "The people shouted with a great shout, that the wall fell down flat." Great Scott! If they had been bulls' horns instead of rams' horns, the whole city would hav been gulped down by an earthquake.

Now, my Christian friends, if you don't believe this story about the rams' horns you will be caught on Old Nick's horns. Verse 25: "And Joshua saved Rahab the harlot alive." And one prostitute was all that was saved of the city. Surely "God's ways are past finding out."

JUDGES.

Chap. xi: It appears from this chapter that Jephthah was a bloodthirsty wretch. He wanted to fight Ammon, and he promised God that if he would giv him the victory, then after he returned from the fight he would offer up to the Lord as a burnt-offering whatever might come from his house.

His only daughter came out to meet him when he returned, and he "did with her according to the vow which he had vowed." God could not possibly let Jephthah off, and the poor girl was murdered. Why did not God tell Jephthah better? He had not yet lost his voice when this occurred. Who can doubt that God was well pleased when this unnatural murder took place? What kind of a God can delight in the shedding of innocent blood? Is it possible that God would hav suffered if the daughter had not been killed? It certainly could not hav served any good purpose to kill her.

If God was pleased with this transaction, who knows that Freeman will not get an extra string on his harp and hav the largest diamonds in his crown for killing his little girl? Who can calculate the awful consequences of teaching such monstrous absurdities as the word of God? Better if a Bible and a God had never been heard of among men. The Bible is not the word of God, or God is a savage.

He let Abraham off when he was going to kill his son, because he found out that Abraham was savage enough to do it, but perhaps he had some doubts about Jephthah. He might hav spit upon a stone, and thrown it up and let it come down, "wet or dry," and given the poor girl an even chance.

Chap. xiii, 9: "And God hearkened to the voice of Manoah, and the angel of God came again unto the woman as she sat in the fields, but her husband was not with her." Just so. Here another conception is made to hinge on the visit of a heavenly messenger. Verse 24: "And the woman bare a son, and called his name Samson." "But Manoah, her husband, was not with her." Of course he was not. If he had been, the world would hav been short one great fox-hunter. These angels were a little inclined to visit women in the absence of their husbands. How many women hav borne children on account of these heavenly embassadors the world will never know. Now the angels are all beautiful women with wings; then they were all young men, and everyone a "masher." It is a little curious that women do not bear children after the visits of angels in flowing robes.

Chap. xv, 4: "And Samson went and caught three hundred foxes, and took firebrands and turned tail to tail and put a firebrand in the midst," etc. Great God and Gulliver! did any half-drunken tar ever spin a yarn that beats that? I wonder what he did with the two hundred and ninety-nine foxes while he was running down the last one! What a torchlight procession that must hav made!

Chap. xv, 15: "And he found a new jawbone of an ass, and he put forth his hand and took it and slew a thousand men therewith." Jehosaphat, what a whopper! (I mean the jawbone.) If he had got hold of an entire skull of an ass, he would not hav left a man living on the face of the earth.

Samson was a sharp-sighted slugger, and knew the difference between a "new jawbone of an ass" and a jawbone of a new ass.

O my Christian friends, I pity you! Think of this as the word of God. It is worse than old Zeke's homeopathic pill, but you must down with it—"believe or be damned."

Verse 19: "And God clave a hollow place that was in the jaw, and there came water thereout, and when he had drunk his spirit came again," etc. That jawbone would hav sold for a high price during the drouth out West. But I will just hand over this whole jawbone business to Heston. I think he can kill more Christian fools with it than Samson did Philistines. He can cause a stream of holy water to flow from it sufficient to sprinkle all the Christians in the land.

Chap. xix, 22: "And they spake to the master of the house, saying, Bring forth the man that came into thine house that we may know him."

In such ignorant times, when society bore every mark of brutality, when the people would descend to such acts of bestiality, is it any wonder that they had heavenly messengers to visit them—that children were begotten by these celestial visitors, and that many were talking with God and under his immediate direction?

I can remember, fifty years ago, at every revival and camp-meeting blow-out, men and women in telling their experiences would tell about hearing the voice of the Lord, and would repeat words which they claimed God spoke to them. God has ceased to talk with these fanatics, simply because the people hav become too intelligent to hav such holy nonsense crammed down their throats. If men and women should tell such stuff now, intelligent men would know they lie, and perhaps tell them so.

Down South, among the colored Christians, they hav the same experience to-day. They see wonderful sights and hear voices in the air. At their meetings they get filled with the power and roll on the ground, and steal chickens on their way home.

When the ignorance, superstition, and brutality of the people in Bible times are considered, all the miraculous events can be accounted for.

Prophets prophesied until they could fool the people no longer. People held communication with God as long as anyone would credit their statements. Women were visited by celestial messengers, until the entertainment of such visitors was regarded as prostitution.

In a state of society when sodomy was practiced, when holy men could hav scores of wives and concubines, when people could be made to believe that walls of solid masonry could be blown down with rams' horns, when men were so ignorant as to believe that they could build a tower to reach to heaven, when men were so brutal as to rape their own sisters, when men believed that magicians could turn all the waters of a great country into blood, when men were so barbarous that they "took" women wherever they found them, without their consent; when armies were so brutal as to plunder a country and utterly destroy all the people, without regard to age, sex, or condition—there the most miraculous events may be looked for.

Where the people are most ignorant, there superstition most abounds. God, being simply a creature of the imagination, will be made to giv commands to a warring savage to commit the most diabolical and inhuman acts practiced among such a people.

The Bible is all easy if understood in this light. It would be interesting to trace these Bible stories to their supposed origin.

Take, for instance, the legend in regard to the magicians turning the waters of Egypt into blood. If one could get back to the time when it was first written it would be found to be an old story, the writer knowing no more about the time of its occurrence than we do. Perhaps the story of Daniel being cast into the lions' den would be found to be an old tale, handed down from generation to generation, revamped and applied to a new subject. There was, perhaps, a belief in a flood ancient to the writer. Nobody even then could tell when it was said to hav occurred. And so of the Jonah story and many other stories of the Bible. It is like chasing a rainbow—it recedes as you approach the place where it was first seen. These legends no doubt were regarded with such veneration by those who recorded them that in their superstition they believed they were directed by God, of whom they had about as rational ideas as the wild tribes of American Indians.

Verse 29: "And when he was come into his own house, he took a knife and divided her, together with her bones, into twelve pieces, and sent her into all the coasts of Israel." Here is a clew to the civilization—or want of civilization—of the people in Bible times. That God was superintending the affairs of such a people is the most preposterous idea that could be imagined.

Of all the abominations which hav ever been recorded, those of the Bible are the most sickening and revolting. In many instances the language is the most unchaste and vulgar that could well be used. Sometimes the sentences are made redundant, it would seem, in order to use obscene terms and vulgar phrases. That God is the author of such sublime nastiness is too ridiculous to be believed by those who seek to keep on good terms with a clean mind.

Not only are the most vulgar terms used, but they are used in the most bungling manner. Oh, what a book for the schools! How the world has ever been benefited by the narration of the rapes, murders, wars, and robberies of those old barbaric times it is not easy to see.

Chap. xxi, 21: "And see and behold, if the daughters of Shiloh come out to dance in dances, then come ye out of the vinyards, and catch you every man his wife of the daughters of Shiloh, and go to the land of Benjamin."

My Christian lady friends, how do you like this way of selecting a wife? How would you like to hav a half-savage man spring out upon you like a tiger, and drag you away from your friends to another country? All through the Bible women are treated like beasts. In the choice of a wife a woman's feelings are not consulted or regarded any more than those of a female brute. Penalties are imposed upon them which are not imposed upon men. Women were made the subjects of barter and trade. Frequently money was paid to the father for the daughter without consulting her. Men simply "took" wives when and where they found them.

Nothing could be more abhorrent to a noble-minded man than "taking" a wife and forcing her to liv with him against her will and desire. In those days God was on speaking terms with the people, clothed with infinit wisdom and power—why did he not tell the people better?

How an intelligent woman can regard the Bible with feelings other than of contempt, I am unable to see. The Bible has been her seducer, betrayer, and enslaver. How in her dignity she can do anything but spit upon it is an unsolved mystery. But she is its advocate and upholder. But there are many instances on record where the enslaved hav sacrificed their lives for their enslavers.

RUTH.

Suppose this book should be expunged, would we relapse into barbarism on that account? Would anyone be less interested in the welfare of the race? Would men be less truthful or less honest? If it were bound by itself in pamphlet form, would anybody want it? The pamphlets could not be sold for a penny apiece. The story would not be as valuable as that of Cock Robin. It is said that the Bible carries the evidence of its divine origin upon the face of it. But I'll bet you a prayer-book that Charles Darwin would rather hav any decent man spit in his face than to be charged with the authorship of such a composition as the book of Ruth. The same is true of a great part of the Bible.

If the task were assigned me to improve it, I would begin just as I would with an old slaughter-house which had become a nuisance, by removing the filth. There would be but a small book left. And even this would be far below in literary merit many productions of the present day.

The story of Ruth can be told in a few words. She loved her mother-in-law Naomi. She gleaned in the harvest-fields of Boaz, and slept with him on a threshing-floor, and took her pay in some measures of grain. And finally Boaz declared "unto the elders and unto all the people, moreover, Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, hav I purchased to be my wife." JOHN PECK.

STELLA, WASH. TERR., July 17th–19th.—Leaving the dear friends at Skamokawa, who expressed kindest wishes for my success and insisted on a promis of my return, I took steamboat for Stella. When about half-way—at Cathlamet—the genial Sheriff Albert and his bright, energetic little better half came on board and accompanied me to Stella, remaining through the lectures. I the more appreciated their presence on arriving at Stella, which consists of two buildings, all told. Where would the hearers come from? But when night came the ever-beautiful river proved the highway, and boats filled with happy, gleesome folks arrived; and for miles and miles through the woods friends came down the mountain, and the new hall of Brother H. Lawson was filled with intelligent, interested hearers.

Henry Lawson is an Infidel, with an Infidel family, all careful readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. They hav neither need nor desire for any sky glory, for their home is as happy and perfect a heaven as mortal could desire. Love and peace reign supreme; each and all evince a spirit of emulation as to who can do most to make all others happy. It reminded me of the dear home of the Booths, of Boonton, N. J., and of Wm. Thorpe, the Infidel blacksmith, of Ballston Spa, N. Y.

Frank Howard, a fisherman, zealous for the cause, could not himself attend the lectures, for with July ends the salmon-fishing season; each night's catch counted big. But he rowed over to deposit his $5 toward lubricating the wheels of progress. He is an Infidel who livs a life of good deeds, scorning empty professions of creed.

The old, eccentric Infidel, F. C. Scharnharst, one of the first settlers in this section, a pioneer and able champion of Freethought, rejoiced in the glorious progress of the good work.

Having delivered the first Liberal lecture in the place, and dedicated Brother Lawson's beautiful and cosy hall to the cause of Freethought, again came the hard, sad word. But they would not say "Farewell," but "Good-bye," and in response to earnest appeals I promised, should her health permit, bringing Mrs. Reynolds with me in the fall of 1889. Under any circumstances, if I ever again visit this coast, Stella will be one of the places I shall with eager delight long to arrive at.

PORTLAND, ORE., July 21st–23d.—Portland is a city of fifty thousand inhabitants, situated on the west bank of the Willamette river, twelve miles from its confluence with the Columbia and one hundred and fifteen miles by river from the Pacific ocean. Portland is the metropolis of the Northwest. It needs only a continuance of public spirit in erection of public buildings, setting out public parks, widening the streets, and a good dynamite blow-up or juvenil earthquake to remove the leprous Chinese town—the best business blocks in the very center of the city—to make Portland one of the most progressiv and handsome cities in the United States.

Washington and Oregon, with their regular and abundant rainfall, their enormous agricultural territory, immense forests of finest timber, wondrous water routes—navigable for the largest ships—their inexhaustible fisheries, unrivaled water power, vast mining interests—coal, iron, silver—and, above all, the grand onward march of intelligence of the people, make this part of the world the most desirable place of abode beneath the sun.

The early settlers and their descendants who, forsaking their old homes and notions, had the hardihood to cross the plains and mountains, heroically fighting their way, with patient, persistent energy overcoming every obstacle, form a nucleus around which rally all friends of progress, all lovers of universal mental liberty, who immigrate here.

I found a good home with that noble, unostentatious and genuin, hospitable, kindly-hearted veteran, Calvin H. Saunders. His wife is indeed his true helpmate and co-worker in every good work. All the children are practical, conscientious Liberals. Charles, the enterprising young merchant, is the most outspoken of Infidels, the most obliging and kindly-hearted of men, winning the hearts of his customers, and is truly a worthy son of a noble sire. Here, too, I found Professor Seymour and wife, home, resting from their labors, yet ever vigilant to see and profit by any opportunity afforded to do all in their power to advance the cause of Freethought.

There are many good Liberals at Portland, but there is much need of practical organization; now there is altogether too much of "willingness." The willing burden-bearers find too many quite willing to shirk all labor or responsibility.

Individual efforts made in divers directions fail to count or accomplish half what the same effort with unity of forces would effect.

With proper advertising, there would hav been twenty-five hundred instead of two hundred and fifty people at the lecture at City park, Sunday afternoon at 2:50.

I lectured Sunday evening at Turner's Hall, and Monday evening at Snyder's Hall, in close proximity to the Chinese theater. I am a great admirer of the theater, but with Chinese theaters, as with Chinese people, distance lends enchantment. The horrible discords, clanging of tomtoms, etc., are not needed helps to a Liberal lecture.

Mrs. Davidson and daughter came fifteen miles to attend the lectures; Mr. McEllsander and others from Eagle Creek, twenty-two miles, to see and hear the Jersey blasphemer.

TRICKS OF A MENDACIOUS FRAUD.

While at Silverton I was shown a newspaper, the West Side, published at Independence, Polk county, Ore., dated July 27, 1888, which contained a column-and-a-half letter indorsing Clark Braden, to which were appended the names of three Christian gentlemen of Silverton as committee.

Any person who had ever read one of Braden's characteristic effusions of billingsgate, bombast, and falsehood could not fail at once to detect its authorship as that of Braden himself. I quote a couple of sentences: "Christians know they hav selected the right man, and if Infidels ever debate with anyone in Silverton it is Clark Braden, the man Infidels fear to meet." "Churches, papers, and conventions hav indorsed Mr. Braden hundreds of times, and over one hundred times as representativ in debate."

Mr. R. S. Allen, secretary of the Silverton Secular Union, speaking of the letter to one of the gentlemen whose name was signed thereto as one of the committee, was astounded to learn that the gentleman never authorized the use of his name; never before had seen the letter or known of its existence; had never signed, or sanctioned, or in any way authorized Braden, or anyone else, to so use his name. And it appears that the same was true of the other signers.

Braden himself wrote the letter—a silly tissue of falsehoods about Infidels, and fulsome adulation of himself—and forged the names of the three Christian gentlemen to it.

We need no longer wonder how this disreputable fraud obtained indorsement of a hundred churches, papers, and conventions.

The object of Braden in perpetrating and publishing this forgery is self-evident. He cared nothing for Silverton folks, for he had already worked the credulous Christians there for all they would stand. But he could use copies of the paper containing the letter in places far away as an indorsement by the Silverton Christians, and so deceive them into hiring him to deliver lectures against Infidelity, and challenge Liberal lecturers to discussion, whom he well knew would not condescend to meet him.

This bombastic fraud, finding Mr. Putnam would not under any circumstances recognize him, much less meet him in debate, like the low bully he is has for a number of weeks followed Mr. Putnam to every place he lectured, seeking opportunity to insult and abuse him, and published in local papers under Christian influence long tirades of calumny and abuse.

That the true inwardness of the mercenary Bombastes might be made manifest to the Christians, and to save them from being deceived by his fraudulent pretenses, after consultation with the committee of the Silverton Secular Union, I issued a manifesto stating that while self-respect forbade my meeting so foul a calumniator and unprincipled blackguard as Braden has proved himself to be, yet, if he could obtain the indorsement of any number of orthodox ministers in good standing in their own denomination, that they regard him as a good, moral man and a worthy representativ of Christianity, I will listen and reply to the mouthpiece of such ministers.

But, as I do not propose to be entrapped into in any way helping him in his mercenary and nefarious schemes to extort money from credulous Christians, the conditions of the discussion shall be:

That the disputants shall each pay one clear half of hall rent, advertising, and all and every expense of holding such discussion.

That each disputant shall publish over his own signature a pledge to promptly pay over to the chairman of the committee of arrangements all and every cent of money or moneys paid, given, or devoted to them or either of them, directly or indirectly, on account of said discussion.

That the chairman of the committee of arrangements shall giv and bestow all such sum or sums of money so received to the destitute sick or needy poor of Silverton, and publish a receipt of the recipient in the local newspapers of Silverton.

That each disputant shall publish in the local papers of Silverton all and every money or gift received by them or either of them on account of said discussion, giving date, amount, and name of donor.

Thus the discussion would be held for truth's sake the poor, sick, and needy be benefited, and neither disputant receive, directly or indirectly, any financial recompense, but each from his own private resources pay one clear, full half of all the expenses of such discussion.

Braden makes no undue haste to accept these conditions.

Preserve this number of THE TRUTH SEEKER and let the facts be known, so that honest people may no longer be victimized and deceived by the mendacious fraud, Clark Braden. C. B. REYNOLDS.

Our London Letter.

The petty tyranny on the part of the godly members of the London school board in the case of Mr. A. B. Moss, the well-known Freethinker, is scarcely surprising, as these individuals, having been accused of misapplying the money of the ratepayers, would be very glad to stave off an inquiry into their acts of jobbery by an excessiv show of piety. Mr. Moss was an activ member of the Freethought party, but as his lecturing would not furnish him with a superfluity of riches and he had a family depending upon him, he can scarcely be blamed for considering them, and temporarily sinking the expression of his opinions to retain the post he holds under the school board. As interference with a man's speculativ opinions can scarcely come within the duties of the board, this despicable act ought to hav some influence with the more enlightened electors, and prevent them from voting for any more parsons.

If Mr. Foote succeeds in his candidature, possibly he will make it rather lively for his fellow-members, more particularly the clerical party. It would certainly be much more profitable for the ratepayers if a few prominent Freethinkers had seats, and the jobbers would not be able to make such a good thing of it for themselvs. The impending inquiry will doubtless show that the champions of the Lord are not quite so disinterested as they pretend.

The editor of the Freethinker surely could not hav supposed the Congregational Review would accept his advertisment of Ingersoll's Reply to Gladstone. If the proprietors were to allow such a thing to appear, some of their subscribers might be inclined to buy a copy; and, if they read it carefully and possessed fair intelligence, would very possibly hav their eyes opened a little too wide, which would not be good for the Congregational Review. I think the proprietors showed they possess a decent amount of worldly wisdom. It would not hav paid them if they had received £1 a word for such an advertisment.

Mrs. Besant has done a good work in her successful efforts on behalf of the watchmakers employed by Bryant & May. The wretched pay they receive for a long week's work is disgraceful, though when it is considered that a considerable percentage of the shareholders are clergymen, it can scarcely be expected that the wage-earners should be treated with any degree of fairness. A dividend of over twenty per cent will reconcile any parson to the most iniquitous practices. And if through their greed a girl has to supplement her scanty earnings by prostitution, what do they care?

The Bishops' Congress wound up with a sermon by the archbishop of York on "The Terrible Problem of the Poor." But I do not see it stated anywhere that he suggested the richer clergy's giving of their means to assist the poor and needy. His suggestion that the rich should help the poor did not apply to his own class, or, of course, he would hav stated how much he was going to giv up by way of setting a practical example. It is disgusting to hear these hypocrits discoursing on the want of thrift amongst the poor, thousands of whom would consider themselvs rich on an annual income equal to a day's pay of an archbishop. If there is any truth in the hereafter these men preach, how great will be their own damnation when they appear to receive judgment! J. D.

Is it more probable that nature should go out of her course, or that a man should tell a lie? We hav never seen, in our time, nature go out of her course; but we hav good reason to believe that millions of lies hav been told in the same time. It is, therefore, at least millions to one that the reporter of a miracle tells a lie.—Paine.

Is it more probable that eminent men should liv centuries in another sphere without acquiring a single new fact to communicate to us, or that a professional conjurer should perform legerdemain? We hav never seen, in our time, multitudes of able men pass ages unfruitfully; but we know that millions of tricks like those of mediums hav been performed by avowed prestidigitators in the same time. It is, therefore, at least millions to one that Spiritualistic phenomena are prestidigitators' tricks.

The Same Old Story.

Within the last week another instance of the Roman Catholic church's determination to run our public schools has come to our notice. This time it is right here in our neighborhood, and the church tool is the Catholic Protectory of Westchester, an institution which robs the taxpayers of New York of more money than any other institution in the county. The facts are these: For the last six years Michael E. Develin has been principal of the Union Free School, No. 1, of Westchester. As he is a friend of the Protectory people, and a good Catholic, the church was satisfied. But Mr. Develin's partisanship, or sectarianism, at length became distasteful to the townspeople, even some Catholics condemning his conduct, and on the 7th inst. the board of education replaced him. The board is composed of seven Catholics and two Protestants, and three of the Catholics voted against Mr. Develin and for the new principal, who is a Protestant.

In the board of education itself, no question of religion arose, but upon Mr. Develin being deposed and the Protestant principal elected, Brother Leontine, director of the New York Catholic Protectory, began, presumably at the instigation of the deposed principal, to raise sectarian issues, and is now using the influence which a director of the Protectory can wield to secure at the coming school meeting, which occurs on August 28, 1888, the election of trustees in favor of reëmploying the deposed principal at the end of the expiration of the term of the present newly-elected principal, which will be one year from August 28, 1888. None of the brothers in the New York Catholic Protectory is entitled to vote at the school meetings, not even Brother Leontine himself, and yet they hav at past school meetings attempted to vote until they were challenged. Among the inhabitants of the district there is no feeling upon the question of religion, as the vice-principal is a Catholic, and the entire board, save two, are Catholics. No sectarian issues can arise to the detriment of the Catholics, and the efforts of the Protectory director are exerted solely because he desires to control the school. He desires to punish the three Catholic trustees who refused to support his friend, and to replace the two Protestant members with two Catholics who will do his bidding.

In this case we see the whole scope of the Catholic scheme, as well as the policy which the church has pursued and intends to pursue. Note the presence in the board of seven Catholics to two Protestants. No one has had his attention called to this. Quietly the church has put her men in position; for six years she has run the school, until the arrogant bigotry of the chief tool awoke opposition, and still the church would hav been secure, so strongly did she think herself intrenched, had she not made a mistake in three of her men. The "still hunt" has been the method of Rome, until now she finds herself so strong that she can throw off her disguise and fight in the open field. With the quarter of a million dollars annually presented to the Protectory by the county of New York, Brother Leontine can bother the Protestants a good deal, and unless they take more interest in the school question than heretofore, he will win, and Westchester's schools will be modeled on the Romish plan—a plan against which not a word need be written to show its dangerous incompetence. Everybody knows that Catholic schools are the most miserable of educational farces, and that the dominance of Romish ecclesiastics is a most serious source of danger to free institutions.

Why don't the people wake up to their danger?

Christian Science.

Notwithstanding the legal troubles that many Christian scientists hav lately been subjected to—troubles in which policemen hav followed closely upon the death of neglected patients—the humbug is still flourishing, and has taken deep root in many large cities. New York has a pretentious "school" on Forty-second street, whence is issued a monthly magazine advertising for dupes.

This science, according to this school, "is the science of spirit." And "the science of spirit is the essence of all religions. Spirit is causation, hence back of all the arts and sciences. Christian science, then, is the science of the sciences." Such is the dogmatic definition given of the "philosophy" of the cult, and argued for on scriptural and Christian grounds. This science further aims in practical work to monopolize the professions of medicin and preaching. "Healers" and "teachers" are numerous, and as "healing is the most easily accomplished, it is the first step," and relied upon to prove the truth of the science. Colleges for teaching the science are also plentiful, and connected with each is a healing department where patients are either treated in person or "absently" for so much cash. These present or absent treatments are always "in strict accord with Divine Mind-Healing," terms given upon application, and testimonials forwarded free of charge. One establishment advertises to cure by the "apostolic method," and to instruct in theology and practical ministry and fit the pupil for general public speaking and biblical exposition according to Christian science—tuition fifty dollars, board reasonable. Some of the testimonials are unique in their simple trust in the capacity of the ordinary mortal to be humbugged. One patient writes that "while saying over my lesson, repeating, 'Nothing in all the world can harm me,' I picked up a cloth, and while holding it in my hand an immense centipede crawled over my arm and tried to fasten itself in my flesh. I shook it off and was unharmed." This is very miraculous, but the next day brought the same patient another benefit from the science. The writer goes on: "While driving, two horses ran away with me. I thought of my principles; all of a sudden the horses stopped, and one turned its head around and looked at me." Another equally conclusiv case is this: "A child was subject to convulsions for three years until she was reduced to idiocy—seemed possessed of a demon. Her bowels were entirely inactiv. In despair her parents applied to Mrs. L. In one week the spasms had ceased; in four weeks she was entirely restored and began to talk. She can now walk." But perhaps the most astonishing testimonial is the following. It happened in Brooklyn, and Mrs. V. M. Carhart is the healer: "A woman suffering from varicose vein and ulcers to such an extent that the leg had to be supported on a chair beside the washtub (by which she earned her living). After conversation with the woman, she was given absent treatment for three or four weeks before time was found to go to her. The practitioner then found her patient had moved two weeks before, carrying her furniture herself, walking on the limb without difficulty. And this is the work done by Mrs. Carhart while sitting evenings trimming bonnets."

The scientists, however, hav their dissensions, which sometimes lead to disastrous results. These dissensions, says one teacher, "hav so dechemicalized the sick that there is a great deal of poor work being done." From which we may infer that when a patient fails to recover, it is because of dissensional dechemicalization. These dissensions are surely to be regretted.

The creed of the scientists may be gathered from the following report of a meeting in Chicago:

"The president introduced the divinely precious creed of the Christian scientists, with some appropriate remarks on the obligation to state our belief before its excellence is perfectly apparent. The association repeated in concert:

"'I believe in thee as here present with me.
"'I believe in thee as my life.
"'I believe in thee as my strength.
"'I believe in thee as my health.
"'I believe in thee as my peace.
"'I believe in thee as a healing presence.
"'I believe in thee as my savior and deliverer from all evil.'"

There is nothing more ridiculous or mischievous in this creed than in the orthodox church creeds, but the harm this humbug does is in duping sick people to neglect medical attendance, relying upon the superstitious nonsense of a healer for cure. Think of a woman trimming bonnets and curing the varicose veins of another woman miles away!

The extent to which this absurd faith has spread is wonderful, and can be accounted for only by the fact that centuries of belief in the supernatural hav prepared the soil in which it grows. Alongside of Christianity the silliest of metaphysical speculation does not appear out of place. In fact, it may be said to be really rational. The preachers of this new fad of Christian science depend on the gullibility of the average religionist, and their dependence seems not misplaced. Men and women will pay more money to be humbugged than to be enlightened—hence the great support the church obtains, and the prevalence of the Christian scientists.

The Faith of Low-Down Slaves.

To illustrate the Bible promis that all things work together for good to them that love the Lord, the Richmond Religious Herald tells this story:

"The Rev. George J. Hobday preached to his congregation in Berkeley from the text, 'All things work together for good to them that love God,' and three days later his church was destroyed by fire. The afflicted little flock gathered around the pastor and asked: 'How is this, Brother Hobday? is this for our good?' 'Yes,' replied the pastor, 'of course it is for your good.' They went to work to collect money to build another church, and placed it ($1,000) for safe keeping in the Exchange Bank of Norfolk, and a few days later that bank broke. The discouraged little flock once more visited their pastor and said: 'How is this about the bank going down with our money in it—is that for our good?' 'Of course it is for your good, brethren,' said Brother Hobday, 'there can be no doubt of that. But don't stop to discuss that. Let's try again.' And they did try again, and now the prettiest church in Berkeley—the prettiest in Virginia, some might say—is the house this heroic little band of Baptists hav built. And now every one of them sees that the struggle has not only given to them a far better church, but that, better still, it has put a brighter, sweeter, stronger faith into their hearts."

Reprinting this object-lesson in faith, another religious journal comments:

"The Rev. Mr. Hobday did well to stick to the doctrin of his text and sermon, notwithstanding the facts for a time puzzled his people. God always keeps his word, and in the end so makes things work that they all work together for good to them that love him. He knows just how to do it in the best way, and never fails to do it in his own way. It is worth something to the soul to hav such a God to love and serve."

A faith which induces comments like these is certainly remarkable. As an expression of hopeless, utter, and abject slavery to a monster of injustice we never saw its equal. The cringing cur becomes beside that editor an animal of superb bravery. The slave crouching under the uplifted lash, without daring even to run a rod, is a marvel of manly courage compared with the worshipers of such a God. The believers in fetichism, the idolators who smash their idols when angry, are the highest type of independence alongside the man who says to the tyrant who is destroying him, "It is worth something to the soul to hav such a God to love and serve."

Religious Selfishness.

The Convent of the Sacred Heart at 137th street was burnt Monday night, the 13th inst. The convent is a school for girls, and about one hundred and fifty nuns found employment within its walls. No lives were lost, but the buildings are ruined. The loss is about $200,000, fully insured.

Three engin companies were employed in subduing the flames, and since the fire a police sergeant and forty-four policemen hav been constantly employed watching and guarding the premises, which consisted of ninety acres of ground and the magnificent buildings now in ruins. The grounds were purchased about 1830 at a cost of some $40,000. The value of the land now is about a million dollars. The grounds extend from 6th to 10th avenues, and from 130th to 137th street. The ninety acres are the door-yard of the convent, and because the institution is religious and educational it has escaped taxation.

For years this convent has stood in the way of improvements in that part of the city, the sisters refusing to allow streets to be cut through, and holding their large block intact. The city map provides for streets, but the church has been more powerful than the municipal government. The convent fire has revived the efforts of property owners to push forward the opening of the streets which will cut through the convent grounds. They claim that these improvements hav been delayed too long, and insist upon their right to ready access to their lots, so as to enable them to build or realize on the real value of the land. The reply of the church is, as given by a priest, "It would be vandalism to disturb the convent."

Here we hav it again. For years this immense tract of valuable land has been held by the church, paying no taxes; the city has provided engins and men to subdue the flames and save a portion of the buildings, furnished policemen to protect the property of the sisters, yet the church in her selfishness fights the city, denies the rights of neighboring property owners, and screams vandalism when they are asked to build their new school where it will not block the way to all improvements. If arrogant selfishness can be more strikingly illustrated, the public would, no doubt, like to see it.

The Female Academy of the Sacred Heart, as this institution is legally known, is a private money-mak ing school, and the sisters are no more entitled to the exemption given charitable institutions than any business college in the city. Because they are religious, however, our truckling and superstitious legislators hav allowed them to gather wealth by the hundreds of thousands of dollars, and the city is rewarded by a refusal to allow any improvements to be made. The sisters care for nothing but their own welfare, though begging the public to help them in their misfortune.

The Women.

It can never be sufficiently repeated that organization is the secret of success. Above everything else, this is necessary, and must be forwarded. Our enemies—the enemies of progress, civilization, of all human happiness—are strengthening their already formidable organizations every day. What their purposes are, we well know. In these purposes they are firm and determined; they see their end clearly before them—know just what they want and are determined to hav it. When they grow a little more, they will unite on their purposed action. It may be said to be a race whether they or the influences of civilization and Secularism first reach the goal of adequate power. It cannot be too much repeated that we must organize. What has been done is very little, and as nothing to what is needed.

A special need is of attention to growth of the social side of our organization. Great rewards await efforts made on this line. Feminin aid will be found of the very highest value, and all pains should be taken to procure the women's attendance. Growth will then be rapid. The goddess Truth is very beautiful to us, but we are afraid that the young man not long in the cause would be more persuaded by the presence of his private goddess of flesh and blood. We attend our meetings to worship the divinity of Liberty, but it would surely be policy not to despise the help of the neophyte willing to come and worship a material divinity on the back bench.

Laying aside jocoseness, it is a truth, how serious the signs of the times show, that we must, above all else, organize.

Proper Gratitude Shown.

Christianity is the source of our civilization. It has given us all we enjoy. It has given us all that we hav of morality and refinement. Likewise of the arts and sciences. It has been the great factor in the world's progress. It has made us all we are. It has also kept us from being all we aren't.

We know this because so told by a large body of men who are supported for the express purpose of studying such matters. Besides, a good way will be to consider in detail what our civilization consists of, to analyze it, and observe the production of each factor by Christianity.

The development of industrial arts is thought to hav done much in producing civilization. By them we hav more, know more, enjoy more; by them our hours of labor hav been reduced and will be still more reduced, allowing us more time for leisure and culture; by them militarism with its harsh and imbruting influences is being superseded. Now, if it were found that the source of all our knowledge, the Bible, failed to contain proper and decent instruction on this head, skeptics might indeed show some reasonable basis for their claims. The facts being quite the opposit, it is evident that they are willful walkers in darkness. Everyone knows how full the Bible is of designs of labor-saving machinery. Any not knowing that it is a complete body of knowledge on applied mathematics, navigation, land surveying, geometry, mechanics, building, engineering, metallurgy, bleaching, dyeing, manufactures, and domestic economy would better go to school over again. Reference by any reader to his pocket Bible will show beneficent designs of the mower, the reaper, the reaper and binder, the thresher, and the seed-drill. Likewise of the steam-engin, the locomotiv, and the electric telegraph. Though we hav no direct knowledge on the subject, it is probably safe to say that the Bible forms the essential part of Edison's laboratory, and is consulted on all occasions. Probably without it we should never hav got the electric light and the telephone. The cotton-gin, the spinning-machine, the printing-press, will all be found fully described and explained by diagrams in the book God gave us.

So with all the arts and sciences in general. Just consider for a moment what is our present knowledge of acoustics, thermology, meteorology, optics, magnetism, hydraulics, and pneumatics—recollect how, when, and where that knowledge was obtained, and one will see it all to come from Christianity. To contemplate for a moment where we should be in chemistry, pharmacy, medicin, pathology, and clinics without our revelation makes one feel as he does in a nightmare when the ground disappears from under him. Christianity's fondness for logic has always been notable. We are struck speechless when we wish to describe its discoveries in biology and protistology. Think of all the useful principles of botany and zoology contained in the XXXIX Articles and Calvin's five points. Geologists get up in the night and praise God when they think of the valuable additions religion has made to the knowledge of their science. What would philology be without Christianity? Without it, it is clear, we should be quite oblivious of any such things as linguistics and hermetics. Its value in the development of psychology is simply unspeakable. Anyone not testifying to the derivation of physiology and anatomy from the scripture is one choosing the evil rather than the light. Could there be astronomy without Christianity? Would evolution be known without it?

Examination of the fields of sociology, ethics, government, and art uniformly givs corresponding results. Probably no one will deny that without the Bible we should be mere beasts of the field in morals, utterly devoid of principle and seeking evil continually. Christianity abolished slavery. A full exposition of the wrongfulness of that institution will be found in the good book. Our esthetics would not be worth a cent without said volume. If there is one thing in the world for which we should be thankful more than for another, it is the science of government divinely revealed to us. A judicious assortment of Christian calumnies may be applied to any affirming non-scriptural origin of the axiom, "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." Christianity is justly celebrated for its impartial and beneficent investigations into occult phenomena and science. To it we owe the true scientific method. Spiritualists know what they owe it. The same may be said in regard to animal magnetism, mesmerism, somnambulism, and clairvoyance. The debt heredity owes scripture it will probably never find words to express. In regulations of marriage and kindred social matters Christianity quite surpasses itself.

All this is caused by its uncontrolable desire for facts. Facts, facts, are what it calls for; facts it wants and facts it must hav.

Limits of space preclude our doing this very glorious, surpassing, and ineffable subject full justice. We hope this will satisfy the darkened and perverted minds of skeptics and cavilers. If it does not, they can get satisfied pretty quickly when the National Reform Association "places all Christian laws, institutions, and usages on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land."

Courtlandt Palmer's Life.

As a specimen of ignorant Christian claptrap, the following concluding paragraph of an editorial in the Savannah, Ga., weekly News is printed:

"Courtlandt Palmer did nothing to help his fellow-man, but he did much to deprive him of the faith which not only affords him comfort and joy in this life, and helps him to bear the ills which afflict him, but also promises him a future which robs the grave of its terrors. Whatever the Agnostics may say, and however much they may praise his honesty and promptness, Mr. Palmer's life was a failure."

Mr. Palmer's life was full of good works. He helped everyone he could. Hundreds can testify to personal kindnesses at his hands, and the community of New York was made better, more Liberal, by his teaching. He was in almost every movement for the betterment of the condition of the poor, and he educated the rich. His life was eminently successful, if we call that success which succeeds in doing something for the race, leaving your impress upon the world, and stimulating others to do good. Christian success is in thinking you hav saved your own miserable little soul even at the expense of damning everybody else, and in that way Courtlandt Palmer's life was not a success. In a decent definition of the word, Mr. Palmer's life was a monumental triumph.

Editorial Notes.

THE cable from Berlin says: "Under the new leader, young Kaiser William, a touch of stern religious fanaticism may be trained into the army, for the new set headed by the kaiser is excessivly and very activly religious." This, the correspondent thinks, means war. Queer, isn't it, that the more religious a ruler is the more ready he is to see men mangled and slain?

MRS. A. M. FREEMAN will make dates for lectures between Chicago and Pittsburgh previous to the Secular Union Congress, and also after that event anywhere in the state of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and probably in other localities near by. We hav often spoken of Mrs. Freeman's ability and eloquence on the platform and her agreeable qualities in private life. She is sure to do good wherever engaged, and it is hoped that she may be kept busy this fall. Write her in care of the Union secretary, Mr. E. A. Stevens, 241 Washington Boulevard, Chicago, Ill.

ELLIOTT F. SHEPARD, the pious journalist, still prints his scripture motto, abuses Colonel Ingersoll and other Infidels, appeals for Sunday laws to stop the Fifth avenue stages, shrieks for a "Christian government," and thinks every man who is not a church-member or who does not agree with him in politics is on the broad road to destruction. His attack on the late Courtlandt Palmer was perhaps the most indecent specimen of hateful journalism ever seen except in a purely religious paper. Mr. Shepard's conduct recalls what old Commodore Vanderbilt said of him when he came courting his daughter: "He's more kinds of a damn fool than any other fellow I ever struck!" Mr. Shepard has not improved much since those ancient days.

THE correspondence between the late Courtlandt Palmer and T. B. Wakeman which we reprint from Secular Thought, settles the question of responsibility for the presence of a clergyman at the former's funeral. A true man and kind husband, Mr. Palmer waived his own feelings in the matter to allow his wife to do that which seemed necessary to her. Heber Newton, as the pastor of Mrs. Palmer's church, as a personal friend of Mr. Palmer, and as a heretical or Liberal Christian, was the natural choice. It is not in our heart to judge harshly of Mrs. Palmer, a most estimable and intellectual woman, nor shall we criticise anyone for yielding to a wife's wish where equal liberty for his own philosophy is allowed. Mr. Palmer's funeral was, as he wished it, a Freethinker's sepulture. It could not be otherwise with Colonel Ingersoll as the panegyrist. Now that Mr. Wakeman has thought it proper to giv the letters to the press, there is no room for further misunderstanding. Denunciations of the Palmer family, either as "aristocrats" or orthodox and bigoted Christians, are quite out of place.

THE Montpelier, Vt., Argus and Patriot has some caustic remarks upon the brethren in its section of the country: "A number of the professedly would-be saints were taken in and done for over at Lyndonville by the skin games attached to the Wallace circus. The St. Johnsbury Caledonian said that one worthy Christian lost nearly $100, but recovered it over at Morrisville the next day. It is a notable fact that every time anything of this kind has happened in Vermont in connection with the gambling connected with that circus, those who hav been implicated hav been members of some religious organization, and another noteworthy matter connected with it is that the men who hav squealed the loudest were these same professed Christians. They appear to be perfectly willing to engage in gambling, notwithstanding that it is a device of the devil, so long as they can win, but the moment that the sinners who run the game get the better of them they squeal. We fear that the Christianity of a man who will do as they hav done is certainly not more than skin-deep. A worthy Christian, who has the fear of God before his eyes in his daily works and conversation, will not be so easily overcome by temptation and fall into the traps of Satan." We opine, however, that "worthy Christians" are scarce, as the number of saints constantly getting into trouble is increasing.

MR. EDITOR: The more I read the old TRUTH SEEKER the better I like it. The pictures are worth more than the subscription price, and the paper is simply immense. I hav succeeded in procuring four new subscribers. I could hav got more, but hav been too busy with my work to get around among the people. We hav a few very stanch Liberals in this community. You may expect to hear from me at least once a year as long as THE TRUTH SEEKER is published and I am able to read. Yours for truth, W. H. STEEN.

SILVERTON, COL., July 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just got two new names for your valuable paper for three months. My husband is operating in the mines and running a force of eight or ten men; and they are all Freethought men, save one or two. In fact, I think the San Juan country is at least two-thirds Infidel. But some do not know of your paper, and others hold positions that they are afraid of losing if they let it be known. But I hope the latter class are few. For my part, I feel proud to own myself an Infidel. I hope there will be many more in the near future. Respectfully yours, MRS. PERRY FISHER.

WINNIPEG, MAN., July 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The other day I was reading the fine old paper, which had been sent up from St. Johns, and as I was reading an idea dropped into my mind which I think would be worth repeating. Now, there are thousands of churches in the United States that are only used for a couple of hours on Sundays. I do not see any reason why the Liberals should not use them the balance of the time, and instead of preaching, teach science in those churches. Then, instead of having to travel all over the country to deliver lectures, they could teach the young through the day and their parents at night. As we pay the taxes for the churches, I do not see but that we hav the right. T. ROLLINS.

CLEVELAND, O., Aug. 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to call the attention of your readers to the work of our Liberal friend and artist, F. E. Sturgis, now of Danville, Ind. I hav from his hands a life-size crayon portrait of my deceased husband, which I am perfectly satisfied with. I hav shown it to a number of professional artists, and all agree that the work is first-class. I am so well satisfied with the work and price, as well as with Mr. Sturgis's thorough integrity of purpose, that I heartily recommend him as entirely deserving of the confidence and patronage of all Liberals. His unfortunate condition of health and devotion to Freethought principles should be an additional commendation to all lovers of our good cause.

Fraternally yours, ANNIE EDWARDS KIRK.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., Aug. 5, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: I was chosen to read the Declaration of Independence on the occasion of our Fourth of July celebration, and to make a short address, which I did. The Christians said it was a mistake, as no Infidel was a fit person to address the people of this county, as the cloud of ignorance was so dense over the mind of an Atheist that no light could possibly emanate therefrom. A friend of mine told me this a few days before the time. So I made up my mind that I would let them down with a crash, and so I did. Several Christians complimented me and said they would never say again that an Atheist was a fool. A few did not like it, because I did not say that "God"—whatever that is—was the source of all these blessings; but I am glad to say that the sunlight of reason has begun to dawn since I made those few remarks. Let us hope the seed may take root.

CLEVELAND, O., Aug. 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper is the best one I hav ever had the pleasure of reading. Not only are its editorials exactly to my mind, but its selected articles show that you know a good thing when you see it. The article of W. D. Lesueur was well worthy of quoting—equal to Ingersoll in conciseness and intelligibility of style. I do not agree with Putnam and others in their refusal to meet in debate—what's his name? I gave, as I am in the habit of doing, one of my TRUTH SEEKERS to a Christian friend, and the only thing he seemed to notice in it was the refusal to debate. You can imagin what he said as to Infidel cowardice. Strange that in your notices of the great Ingersoll-Gladstone controversy, I never see anything to indicate that the slightest notice is taken of it in England. Can you not giv us some English notes on the subject? GEORGE F. MOORE.

STURGIS, MICH., Aug. 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Those who can look back at the church of forty or even thirty years ago can observe many and great changes which hav taken place in its methods and style of teaching. The old-fashioned enthusiasm, which was so common, even in city churches, producing such explosivs as "Glory to God!" "Bless the Lord!" "Amen!" and so forth, we rarely hear now except in log school-houses of the backwoods. The horrifying descriptions of hells and devils which were so potent in bringing sinners to the fold we never hear at all now; in their place we hav the insinuation that to unite with the church is to enter "society." Thus an appeal to pride has taken the place of the appeal to fear; whether this is an improvement is a debatable question. It may be quite as enslaving, though not so brutalizing. It seems that outsiders are refining "society."

Then look at the doctrins which were invariably and energetically impressed upon public attention; such as total depravity, personality of the devil, damnation of the unconverted, and many other "divine" sentiments—they all seem to hav been dropped as things too vulgar for the delicate sensibilities of the refined sheep and lambs within the "society" inclosure.

The preacher in those past days was looked upon as a mysterious personage who, next to the Lord himself, was to be approached with reverential awe; but the times hav changed, and his reverence is now regarded by most people as a common man, and by some as even a "little more so." Some think that bigotry and intolerance are leaking away from the church; while others are of opinion that this is but outwardly apparent, and that the priest is only waiting until an opportunity offers to make another spring upon unsuspecting humanity.

For my part, I do not think that the church will ever be Liberalized or reformed out of existence, but I do expect that she will go on adapting herself to public sentiment until scarcely a vestige of the old leaven can be found in the lump. That anecdote about the Irishman who saw a street watering-cart for the first time is suggestiv when applied to the declining theology of our time. "Hould on!" he shouted to the driver of the cart; "hould on! all the wather is laking out of your tub! Be my sowl! you won't hav a drop of it be the time you get home!" THOS. HARDING.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER comes to hand regularly. It is sure death to superstition, ghosts, spooks—all the hosts of pious fraud imaginable.

I am well pleased with Gibbon's "History of Christianity." It is well backed with facts.

We had a big revival meeting in our vicinity last winter, which resulted in the erection of a joss-house. But, alas! the members hav mostly backslid. And, as Christ said of the persons who had the devils knocked out of them, they are more the children of hades than before. The preacher and most of the members are fighting Agnostics and moralists, but the church is like a wounded bird fluttering and the wound hurts only itself.

I am well pleased with the TRUTH SEEKER circle of readers. I hav received kind letters from some of the brethren.

It is 108° of heat in the shade as I write. Now, if Joss makes this weather, I do not think he knows much about the human constitution. It may suit an idle preacher or an Angel Gabriel, but it takes brains to deal with animal life this weather. D. A. MORRISON.

LOCUST DALE, PA., Aug. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I became a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER about two years ago, and I think it is an excellent paper, pictures and all. Locust Dale is a town of about eight hundred inhabitants, in the anthracite coal fields of this state. There are three or four who take THE TRUTH SEEKER in this town, but it is read by ten times that number, who take an interest in its contents. We hav organized a Secular society, and hav applied to E. A. Stevens, secretary of the American Secular Union, for a charter. We were greatly surprised to hear of the sudden death of Mr. Palmer. At a meeting of the society a committee was appointed to draft resolutions expressing the feelings of the members for the loss of one of liberty's truest friends. The following are the resolutions:

WHEREAS, The members of this society hav learned with deep regret of the sudden death of Courtlandt Palmer, ex-president and vice-president of the American Secular Union; and,

WHEREAS, We hav met to express our deep sorrow at the decease of so distinguished a scholar, humanitarian, and philanthropist; therefore be it

Resolved, That in the death of Courtlandt Palmer the American Secular Union has lost one of its greatest supports and friends, the nation an honored and respected citizen, and the world one of nature's own noblemen; and

Resolved, That these resolutions be entered on the journal of this society, and published in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed post-office order for one more new subscriber.

The following will show how much the love of Jesus will do to make good a man who is naturally inclined to crookedness. In talking with a Christian a few months ago, I told him that all there was in his religion that was distinctivly Christian was a belief in certain strange things about the birth, death, and resurrection of Jesus. To this he replied that there was something greater than all those things, which was the glorious feelings in the heart—the result of the presence of Jesus and God in the heart. He admitted that I was a good, honest, kind man, but said I could not be saved that way. I must be "born again" and get the "love of God" in my heart. To-day he was telling me of a mistake that was made in a bill of goods he had bought. He said the price of the article was $3.60, but it was entered by mistake at twenty cents. He said: "I kept quiet, and they don't know it to this day." But then, I suppose the love of God in his heart will make up for such robbery.

He evidently does not think he did anything wrong, and God, who is present in his heart, does not even nudge him to tell him he is giving himself away to a wicked unbeliever, nor yet that what he did was a sin.

Again. We hav some heavy storms in Illinois. One Sunday evening after church—which I did not attend—a heavy storm arose. All the persons in my house, including my wife and some young ladies, had been to church twice. When the lightning began to flash beautifully and the thunder to roll majestically—all of which I enjoyed hugely—they, one and all, found refuge in our bedroom. They—my wife also—sat around on the edge of my bed in their night-dresses, and spoke in subdued whispers of the awfulness of the storm. They were terrorized. They were afraid that the God whom they had been so faithfully serving would hav so little of the real gentleman about him that he, in his anger, would hurt his own lovers. I told them I should think they would be afraid to stay so near an Infidel when God was mad, because if he sent the lightning to kill the blasphemer he might in his blind rage make a mistake and strike some other person. JOHN HUDSON.

HILLSBORO, ORE., July 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: James Campbell, V.D.M., a celebrated Oregon Infidel-smasher, has recently issued a small pamphlet entitled, "Replies to a Skeptic." It is a fair sample of the average Oregonian parson's dishonesty, ignorance, Bradenism, and Jo Cookism. This little parson is suffering with a severe attack of the nightmare, and is laboring under the hallucination that there is an Infidel who has been writing letters to him which contain strong doses of Infidelity. He claims that these letters (anonymous) were the cause of the birth of the wonderful pamphlet. There are many people who differ with the reverend and claim that it is a straw man set up by the reverend for the purpose of having an excuse to show his prowess as an Infidel-smasher and to gain the name of author. After demolishing the argument of his straw man, he barks at Ingersoll. He attempts to do what such intellectual giants of theology as Gladstone, Black, Field, and Fisher failed to do—overthrow Ingersoll's arguments. The reverend does not follow in the footsteps of the others. He does not attempt to tackle any of Ingersoll's strong points, but finds some point of minor importance, and then, with his little scattering bell-muzzled blunderbuss, he fires. The following extracts from his pamphlet show the caliber of the gun and the force of the charge that he smashes Infidels with. Theological popguns loaded with falsehood, theological gas-bags filled with misrepresentation, will not affect truth.

Asylums for the insane, for the orphans, for the poor, the inebriate, and a thousand others, are the outgrowths of Christ.

Here the reverend advertises his ignorance of history, or else knowingly falsifies for Christ's sake. If the reverend is not ignorant of history, if he has read other than Holy Queer history, he would know that hundreds of years before Christianity was born there were in India and Egypt hundreds of asylums and hospitals, not only for men, women, and children, but also for beasts. The ancients cured the insane by music, flowers, and kindness. Long before the time of Moses there were hospitals, schools, libraries. Does the reverend know that when the Christians were imprisoning people for claiming the world was round, the pagan Moors of Spain were teaching geography with globes? The Mohammedans were in advance of Christians in hospitals. Christians simply patterned after the pagans in building hospitals, the same as they hav borrowed from paganism nearly every ceremony and dogma that is in the Christian religion. Can the Rev. Mr. Campbell, V D M., deny this? Why does not the reverend inform his followers that the doctrins and ceremonies of the atonement, trinity, sacrament, baptism, confession of sins, Holy Ghost, were borrowed from heathen religions; that long before the time of the mythical Christ there were divinely begotten and crucified saviors? The story of Christ is borrowed from heathenism. Can the reverend deny this and tell the truth? Christians even claim the Golden Rule as the outgrowth of Christianity. Civilization is not indebted to Christianity for advancement in morals. The reverend should read Buckle, Lecky, and other writers on civilization in Europe.

And it may be truthfully said that the teachings of skeptics are guilty of none of those things [building asylums, etc.].

Here the reverend shows the cloven foot of malice, in the face of the fact that in the adjoining state, California, are Lick's Observatory and Home for Women. This reverend is ignorant of that fact. I wonder if the reverend ever heard of Girard College and other institutions built by Infidels. Assuredly not, as the average Oregon priest rears upon his hind-legs and brays: "What hav you Infidels done?" What answer would these priests hav made some centuries ago, if they had been living then, to the pagan who would hav asked: "Where are the asylums and hospitals you Christians hav built?" These priests would giv them this answer: "We hav not been in power; we are in the minority." The church has tried for many years to stifle Freethought, using force and slander. Can the reverend refute this?

The few good and noble things they hav done and are doing for the alleviation of suffering are in no way attributable to their philosophy, but they copy after Christianity.

The reverend here acknowledges Infidels hav done and are doing good. How the reverend contradicts himself in the preceding sentences! He says that Infidels are not guilty of any of the thousand good things. The reverend is ignorant of the fact that the philosophy of the Infidel is to do right. Can the reverend name any Infidel that teaches contrary? Are morality, kindness, love, etc., the children of Christianity? Will the reverend stand up and say that before Christianity these qualities were unknown to man? Right here I ask the reverend if it is not a fact that in the countries that are the most Christian there can be found the most immorality and crime, and in the countries where Freethought is the most powerful there are the most morality and least crime? Compare Christian Spain with Atheist France; pagan Japan with Christian Spain, Italy, Abyssinia, and Ireland. Infidels hav no book as a guide that teaches and commands the infamous practices of polygamy, slavery, persecution for opinion's sake, and other teachings that are not moral. Will the reverend deny that one little verse in the Bible has caused the death of thousands of innocent women? Will the reverend deny that Christ taught that the institution of marriage was wrong? Is that morality? Were not the Christian kings, queens, popes, and leaders of the church the most villainous criminals that hav darkened the pages of history? Are not the preachers of to-day the most criminal of the professions? Hav not the Infidel presidents, generals, and statesmen of America done as much good for the people as the Christian? Hav not the pioneers of reform been Infidels? Who were the pioneers of the antislavery movement? Infidels. Did not every church in Puritan Boston close its doors against William Lloyd Garrison? Was not the mob that mobbed him in the streets led by preachers? Was it not an Infidel hall, the Investigator Hall, that opened its door to Garrison? What preacher can you point out that did as much for American Independence as Thomas Paine? Was not one of the most bitter foes to American Independence the founder of Methodism?

Can you name one Infidel lecturer that is in the prisons of America, while the preachers are many who are gazing through the bars, to say nothing of hundreds that would be there if they had their just deserts? Do you know that the clergy of the United States hav during the last five years committed over five thousand crimes? Do you know that, according to the census, there is not an Atheist in the prisons of Atheist France, as the clergy call it, while there are hundreds of believers in Christianity and God languishing in prison? I would ask the reverend if the Christians are more moral than the Infidels, and request him to produce facts and figures, not priestly assertions. Hav not the Bible and Christian leaders degraded woman? Does not Christian philosophy teach that a person can from his cradle to the scaffold commit crime and that if he believes in Christ he will be rewarded? Can you disprove this? Why do you not claim the art of printing, the good morals of the Japanese, the temperance of the Mohammedan, the science of astronomy, the morality, kindness, and just laws of the tribes of wild people spoken of by the author of "Sea and Land," who says they were without any religion and idea of gods or devils, pure Infidels, and yet far better than the adjoining tribes who were religious? Were these the outgrowth of Christ? Is it not an old chestnut, this idiotic whine and pious cant about Christian morals? I would advise the reverend and his class to peruse the historians of Europe—Buckle, Lecky, and others. Professor Draper's works will throw light on the theological darkness of preachers. Mosheim, a good religious authority, will enlighten them. If preachers would read more reliable history and less of the Holy Queer, they would be better informed and would evolute from their religion and unfairness, and be led to tell the truth.

Infidelity has but one representativ in America, and he fears and shuns an oral discussion.

Now, no minister in the world who was honest, and who had a reputation for veracity, would publish such a self-evident falsehood, or rather double falsehood. There are hundreds of representativ Infidels in America. A few I will name: Ingersoll, Putnam, Remsburg, Parton the historian, Reynolds, Watts, Jamieson, Underwood, etc., and others falling into line—such men as Hugh Pentecost, Heber Newton, etc. If the Rev. Mr. Campbell will read the Companion to the New Testament, he will see that the committee who recently revised the Bible are on the fence. The statement that Infidels were afraid of discussion comes with very bad grace from one who to-day dares not meet any Infidel who is a representativ Infidel. Reverend sir, can you deny this by accepting an invitation to debate with any of our Infidel speakers? Did you not back down from a challenge after accepting? Can you name a single Infidel, who is a representativ Infidel, who refused to debate? Do not point to the polecat Braden, a man who is guilty of publishing the most contemptible lies about R. G. Ingersoll and family—lies so infamous that Christian papers of his own denomination denounced them as lies and Braden as a liar. Can you deny this? Can you name a Christian publishing house that has ever published any debates between Infidels and Christians? What Christian newspaper has published the debates between Ingersoll and Black, Fisher, Field, Gladstone; between Bennett and Mair, Humphrey, and other Christians; or between Jamieson and Ditzler, Eccles, and other Christians; or between Underwood and Marples, Burgess, and other Christians, and other discussions? After Ingersoll's unhorsing of several representativ Christians in America, and then Christianity's picking out a champion in England, the Honorable Gladstone, to debate with him, then after Gladstone is unhorsed and beaten in every point, does it not sound childish to say that Infidels fear discussions? If you are itching for a debate, I presume you can be accommodated. Whenever you feel inclined to discussion, the Infidels of Hillsboro will find one to accommodate you.

The fool hath said in his heart, There is no god.

That is good Christian argument to prove the existence of a God, although it is neither courteous nor fair, but, reverend sir, do you not know that as a rule children and fools tell the truth?

If Braden is the most learned man in America, there are very few outside of J. Campbell, V.D.M., that know it. He is better known as a notorious liar, denounced as a liar by his own church papers, denounced as a liar by B. F. Underwood before an audience in Salem, O., and requested then and there to take the platform and defend himself from the charge. He failed to do so. The local papers printed the particulars at the time. His forte is to dog some Liberal speaker who will not notice him. Why does he not dog the lecturers Underwood and Jamieson? He has debated with both, and was badly defeated. Like a whipped puppy, he declines. Do you know that one of the leading Campbellite papers defended Ingersoll, and characterized Braden's pamphlet as lies and a libel and Braden as a liar? A sample of his meanness was shown here when he by the aid of his brethren tried to crowd Putnam out of the court house. At the conclusion of Putnam's lecture, Braden brought out the Christian snake, with its hisses. Are you not proud of your Christian hisses? The Christian snake can hiss, but its bite is weak. Did the Infidels hiss Braden, even when he was lying his best? Which acted the most morally?

W. C. Clow.

Upper Mattole, Cal., July 31, 1888.

Mr. Editor: I see that one of your essayists has taken the pains to write an answer to Robert Ingersoll, in which he attempts to show how absurdly the colonel spoke, and which party is in favor of the poor man and the people in general. I am not a politician, neither do I pretend to be, but as ignorant as I am, I can easily show your free trade essayist a few points in politics.

He tells us that the Republican party is opposed to the surrender of any part of the protectiv system, even in order to reduce the surplus in the treasury, which surplus, he says, is $580,000,000. The best way of answering this is to show the action of the Republicans in Congress.

Mr. John Sherman, in his celebrated speech delivered in the United States Senate Jan. 4, 1888, said: "I am willing, as requested by the president, to join in a careful examination of the details of our tariff laws with a view to the reduction of taxes to the extent stated by him, but not in a manner recommended by him. . . . I prefer that policy which looks to the interests of our own people rather than to those of foreign nations. I prefer the policy of reducing prices by home competition rather than by foreign competition; of cheapening raw materials by increased production, and the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and the competition of our railroads. In other words, I prefer the development, increase, and growth of the production and employment of our own countrymen by the aid of our revenue laws, without respect to the policy or theories or interests of other nations."

Hon. Joseph N. Dolph, in his speech delivered in the United States Senate March 12, 1888, said: "The reduction of the revenues under the protectiv policy should be made in such a manner as not to destroy our manufacturing industries, or to disturb unnecessarily the business interests of the country. Instead of placing upon the free list articles which come in direct competition with our great domestic industries, as is proposed by the Mills bill, if there are articles now subject to duty which are not produced in the United States, they should be placed on the free list."

Hon. Wm. P. Fry said in his speech delivered in the United States Senate Jan. 23, 1888: "But, Mr. President, there is a surplus. What shall be done with that? I object to the surplus just as vehemently as does the president. We need nothing and ought to hav nothing more than a working surplus. Democratic incapacity has afflicted us with this evil, and if we are not careful the same incapacity in providing a remedy for the disease will by mistake administer poison to the patient. The disposition of this surplus does not seem to me a very serious problem. Some of it ought to be wisely expended in the restoration of our merchant marine; in the building of a navy; in the erection of necessary coast and harbor fortifications; in the education of the people." If I had room and time, I could cite dozens of other cases equally as conclusiv as these I hav just quoted, from such men as Hoar, Edmunds, Harrison, Cameron, Platt, Wilson, etc., that compose the Republican party.

The gentleman has said in his article that the surplus was $580,000,000. I am surprised to think that a free trader could come as near as $520,000,000 to that surplus, which is about $60,000,000; but I am not surprised to see that those numbers are more instead of less.

Again, Mr. F. M. Holland attempts to make a free trade point by giving a case where, under a protectiv tariff, the people of the United States are forced to buy nickel from a few mines in the United States for a trifle more than they would under free trade. Why does not the Democratic party, if she is in favor of the poor man and against a few rich men, put sugar and molasses on the free list? The Republicans are. No other articles are of more universal use, and none more generally placed in the list of necessaries. They are found in every home, the rich and the poor alike. Louisiana is the only state that produces these articles to any extent, and all of these two articles produced in the United States is but a small fraction of what is consumed annually. From those the government collected impost duties in the fiscal year 1886-1887 to the amount of $58,004,358. Thus the poor people hav to pay annually the greater part of $58,000,000 under Democratic economy, while a few rich men hav to pay a few thousand dollars for nickel.

The gentleman says "that the great question is not tariff against free trade, but simply tariff vs. tariff." Almost any intelligent American knows the difference between the two parties on the tariff question. The Republican party is in favor of protecting all great home industries against foreign competition, while the Democratic party wants to put them on the free list and only retain a tariff for revenue, which simply means no protection at all. The conclusion that Mr. Holland comes to is that the question is, Tariff vs. tariff. I might say that it is, Free trade vs. free trade; but both statements would be dishonestly misleading and fallacious.

Mr. Holland writes that Washington, Hamilton, Jefferson, and the full line of those old heroes were as the Democratic party is to-day on the tariff issue. Let us go ahead and look for the truth of this, whether our examination confirms our preconceived ideas or not. The first Congress that assembled under our national Constitution determined to secure the needed revenue to run the government and pay their debts by a duty on imports. They proceeded to declare that in the imposition of such duties regard should be had not only to revenue but to the development of American industries, in the following express terms: "Whereas it is necessary for the support of government, for the discharge of debts of the United States, and for the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported; therefore, be it enacted," etc.

George Washington, in an annual message, said: "Congress hav repeatedly and not without success directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of too much consequence not to insure a continuance of their efforts in every way which shall appear eligible."

John Adams, in a special message to Congress, said: "The manufacture of arms within the United States still invites the attention of the national legislature. At a considerable expense to the public, this manufacture has been brought to such a state of maturity as with continued encouragement will supersede the necessity of future importation from foreign countries."

Thomas Jefferson in his annual message said: "To cultivate peace, and maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises, to foster our fisheries as nurseries to navigation for the nurture of man, and to protect the manufactures adapted to our circumstances, these are the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselvs."

These quotations are sufficient, but I might multiply them indefinitly, however. I will end with the words of General Garfield. In his letter accepting the Republican nomination for the presidency in 1880, he said: "In reference to our customs laws a policy should be pursued which will bring revenues to the treasury, and will enable the laborer and capital employed in our great industries to compete fairly in our own markets with the labor and capital of foreign producers. We legislate for the people of the United States and not for the whole world, and it is our glory that the American laborer is more intelligent and better paid than his foreign competitor. Our country cannot be independent unless its people with their abundant natural resources possess the requisit skill at any time to clothe, arm, and equip themselvs for war, and in time of peace to produce all the necessary implements of labor. It was the manifest intention of the founders of the government to provide for the common defense—not by standing armies alone, but by raising among the people a greater army of artisans, whose intelligence and skill should powerfully contribute to the safety and glory of the nation."

I do not know what Mr. Holland has said in The Truth Seeker before the 14th of July issue about the prosperity of the country under low tariffs; but I do know, and so should everyone know who is familiar with the history of the United States, the financial condition of the country from 1848 to 1860, when the country had free trade. Money was scarce, people were unable to pay their debts—commercial distress and a bankrupted government in the end. This is the brilliant record of free trade which the Democratic party compliment themselvs in following.

If Mr. Holland will study the financial records of our country from the beginning, he will find that in 1860, the close of the last period of a low tariff, our exports were only $336,576,057, and imports $356 616,119, leaving a balance of trade against us of $20,040,062. In 1880 our exports had risen to $835,638,658, and imports to $667,954,746, leaving a balance of trade in our favor of $167,683,912, an amount one-half as large as our entire export trade in 1860. Our total commerce in 1860 aggregated only $687,000,000, while in 1880 it reached $1,500,000,000.

It is an interesting fact that during the period of a low tariff, from 1848 to 1860 inclusiv, there was but one year in which the balance of trade was in our favor, and the net balance against us in these thirteen years was $396,216,161, drawn out of the country in gold to pay for foreign goods. Yet during the last thirteen years under a protectiv tariff only one year has the balance of trade been against us, while the aggregate in our favor has reached the magnificent sum of $1,612,659,755.

Mr. Holland is very decided about which party he will join, because he is in favor of the workingman and no other party and the Democratic party exactly meets his wishes. I do not see how one's ideas can be so inconsistent—so absurd and unjust. But before we approve what he says, let us examin one of the late acts of that party and we shall be surprised that it is quite opposit to what he writes.

Senators Hoar, Blair, and Stewart, three Republican members of the United States Senate, hav interested themselvs in protecting government laborers from the encroachments of officials. The Blair bill provides that all laborers who hav worked more than eight hours per day since the Hoar bill passed shall be allowed pay for the extra time. And the Stewart amendment provides that it shall be unlawful for any agent or officer of the government to make a contract with any laborer to work more than eight hours per day except under certain conditions, or contract for any lower rate of wages on account of such lessened hours of work. This eight-hour labor bill passed the United States Senate, every Democratic senator but four voting against it.

Now, I say that the Democratic party is against the poor people, the laboring people—in fact, the American people. Being in with the Cobden Club, they are against the American and for the English and foreign manufacturers, English and foreign capitalists—in fact, in favor of every country but their own. They want our well-paid workmen to work for foreign wages. Where they now get $2 a day and are able to make fortunes, to work for twenty cents a day and die serfs. Instead of having millions of money coming into our country annually, to hav millions of money going out.

I now ask Mr. Cleveland's legatus pro prætore to make a more thorough investigation of the subject he has been writing on, and to be more satisfactory in his demonstrations.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Death of Jerry.

[Jerry was the name of a beautiful skylark, a great pet of its owner, James Warburton, proprietor of Crossbrook greenhouses. The bird was much admired by all who had the pleasure of listening to its wonderful and melodious notes.]

No more we list thy matin song,
O minstrel bright and fair!
No more shall thy clear notes resound
Upon the perfumed air.

Thou gavest freely music sweet,
In full, unstinted measure;
Thy mission great and grand and good—
To giv to others pleasure.

Thy notes grew sweeter every day,
Nearing the shore of rest;
Deep, rich, and full, with cadence clear,
Thy last song was thy best.

But now a hush is on thy breast,
Mute is thy tender throat;
No more 'mid Cressbrook's buds and flowers
Will float thy thrilling note.

No more the rounds of daily toil
Thou'lt cheer with woodnotes soft,
Or bear the thought of wearied brain
On wings of hope aloft.

No more thou'lt greet with happy chirp
The tread of welcome feet.
The film of death is on thine eyes;
Thy heart has ceased to beat.

Whence came that glorious gift of song,
Poured forth on rising wing?
Whence the wealth of echoing trill
That made the welkin ring?

Alas! we know not. We but know
Thou'st lived thy life, like man—
Fulfilled thy destiny, like him,
A part of nature's plan.

I question all of time and space,
All that we learn and know,
If I'm forevermore to liv,
Why shouldst not thou, also?

Thou canst not tell, nor need we seek
With speculativ thought,
The mysteries of life to break—
To solve the common lot.

But may we take to heart and heed
The lesson of the lark—
With hope and trust, with love and truth,
The hours of life to mark.

To rise above all things that harm,
All clouds that dim the light;
With flood of song to greet the dawn,
After the stormy night.

Skyward to soar from fretful ills,
From wounds that hurt and bind;
Earthward to seek for good to do,
For help to human kind.

Thus, may we grow in tender grace,
By making others blest;
And our last songs, so sweet, so true,
Shall, like the lark's, be best.

Fall River, Mass. S. H. W.

High-Chair Philosophy.

From Babyhood.

The pastor's little girl, three years old, had been running up and down the room for some time, when she suddenly tumbled down. Papa looked up from his book, expecting her accustomed yell, when, to his surprise, she repeated in her indescribably droll manner the Golden text of the previous Sabbath: "God is the judge; he putteth down one and setteth up another."

It is well known that pins grow yellow with age, but little Georgie B—— has a new name for them. The other day his mamma sent him to her toilet cushion in great haste, exclaiming: "Run, Georgie, and see if you can find me a pin of any kind." Georgie returned pinless, and demurely reported: "Mamma, I can't find a pin of any kind, neither white, black, nor cream-colored."

Ruth, three years old, had patiently committed to memory the twenty-third Psalm. One day, at the table, as was frequently the case, she upset her cup of milk. Mamma's reproval was arrested by her quaint application of scripture: "Mamma, that's my cup that runneth over."—Mrs. M. E. B., Lowell, Mass.

"Tommy," said the teacher, "if you should eat two-thirds of that apple and giv one-third to your little sister, how much would be left for me?" "I guess, ma'am, you would hav to eat the core."

A bright little girl of three, seeing a cloud envelop the moon, said: "Auntie, the moon is going to sleep now; see 'em pull the sheet up over it."

A teacher was hearing a grammar class of small beginners, of which Jim was a member. She was trying to make them understand about nouns. "Can you tell me," she said to the little boy, "what 'Jim' is?" He answered: "Mamma says I'm a case."

A little fellow, who had never seen cake with coriander seed in it, went visiting with his mother, and such cakes were handed around. After a little it was discovered that he was picking his cake to pieces. "Don't you like it, sonny?" asked the lady. "Oh, yes'm," he replied, "and I am going to eat it, as soon as I pick all the fleas out."

Baby Fanny had been learning the catechism. So seeing a man pass who had but one arm, she called out: "Mamma, didn't God hav enough dirt to make that man another arm?"

A little boy laid his stick of candy on the mantel while he buttoned his shoes. His sister, seeing it, waltzed around the room, reaching the candy as she passed and hastily eating it. When her brother had finished buttoning his shoes and reached for it, lo! it was gone. "You hav my candy, miss; giv it to me," he cried. "Brother," she answered, "if you ever eat that candy, you will hav to be the whale and I'll hav to be Jonah."—Mrs. B. R. I., Lexington, Mo.

Our four-year-old thus settled the question of his whereabouts on a Sunday morning not long since. One of his special lady friends said to him: "Homan, I did not see you in church yesterday; were you there?" "Oh, yes. I was there." "Where did you sit?" "I sat with mamma." "Where did mamma sit?" "Why, she sat with me, of course." "Well, then, where did you both sit?" "Why, we sat together, of course." We enjoy watching his mental development, and are often amazed by his readiness to define some new word which he has added to his rapidly increasing vocabulary. The other day he used the word promis, and he was asked to tell its meaning. He replied: "To promis is to keep it in your mind, keep it in your mind, keep it in your mind till you do it." Webster givs no better definition, I am sure.—W., Medina, N. Y.

He Pawned His Baby's Clothes.

"No, I won't drink with you to-day, boys," said a well-dressed young man to several companions, as they settled down in an uptown café the other evening, when the decanter was passed. "The fact is, boys, I hav quit drinking; in fact, I hav sworn off." He was greeted with shouts of laughter by the jolly fellows around him; they put the decanter under his nose and indulged in many jokes at his expense, but he refused to drink, and was rather serious about it.

"What's the matter with you, old boy?" sang out one. "If you've quit drinking something's up. Tell us what it is."

"Well, boys, I will, though I know you'll laugh at me. But I'll tell you just the same. I hav been a hard drinker all my life; ever since I was married, as all you fellows know. I love whisky; it's as sweet to me as sugar, and God only knows how I'll quit it. For five years not a day has passed over my head that I didn't hav a cocktail before breakfast and many drinks through the day. But I'm done.

"Yesterday I was over on the East Side. Down in the Bowery a customer of mine keeps a pawnshop. I called on him, and while I was there a young man of not more than twenty-five, wearing seedy-looking clothes, and with the appearance of not having seen a sober day for a month, came in with a little parcel in his hand.

"Tremblingly he unwrapped it, and handed the article to the pawnbroker. 'Giv me ten cents.' And, boys, what do you suppose it was? A pair of baby shoes—little bits of things, with the bottoms only a trifle soiled, as if they had been worn once or twice.

"'Where did you get these?' asked the pawnbroker.

"'Got them at home,' replied the man, who had an intelligent face, despite his sad condition. 'My wife bought them for my baby. Giv me ten cents for them; I want a drink.'

"'You had better take these shoes back to your wife. The baby will need them,' said the pawnbroker.

"'No, she won't need them, because she's dead. She's lying in the house now; she died last night.'

"As he said this the poor fellow broke down, bowed his head on the counter, and wept like a child. Boys, you can laugh if you like, but I hav a little baby of my own up home, and I swear I'll never drink another drop." As he got up and went out his companions ceased laughing, and in a moment each was busily engaged in reading a newspaper. Even a Mail and Express reporter, who chanced to be in earshot, felt a moisture about his eyes.

Bootblacks Who Help One Another.

A reporter called to a little bootblack near the city hall to giv him a shine yesterday. The little fellow came rather slowly for one of that lively guild, and planted his box down under the reporter's feet. Before he could get his brushes out another larger boy ran up and calmly pushing the little one aside, said: "Here, you go sit down, Jimmy." The reporter at once became indignant at what he took to be a piece of outrageous bullying, and sharply told the newcomer to clear out. "Oh, dat's all right, boss!" was the reply. "I'm only goin' to do it fur him—you see he's been sick in the hospital for more'n a month, and can't do much work yet, so us boys all turn in and giv him a lift when we can, savy?" "Is that so, Jimmy?" asked the reporter, turning to the smaller boy.

"Yes, sir," wearily replied the boy, and as he looked up the pallid, pinched face could be discerned even through the grime that covered it. "He does it fur me, if you'll let him."

"Certainly, go ahead," and as the bootblack plied the brush, the reporter plied him with questions. "You say all the boys help him in this way?"

"Yes, sir. When they ain't got no job themselvs, and Jimmy gets one, they turns in and helps him, 'cause he ain't very strong yet, ye see."

"What percentage do you charge him on a job?"

"Hey?" queried the youngster. "I don't know what you mean?"

"I mean what part of the money do you giv Jimmy, and how much do you keep out of it?"

"You bet yer life I don't keep none; I ain't no such sneak as that."

"So you giv it all to him, do you?"

"Yes, I do. All the boys giv up what they gets on his job. I'd like to catch any feller sneaking it on a sick boy, I would."

The shine being complete, the reporter handed the urchin a quarter, saying: "I guess you're a pretty good fellow; so you keep ten cents and giv the rest to Jimmy there."

The Diet of Strong Men.

The Roman soldiers, who built such wonderful roads, and carried a weight of armor and luggage that would crush the average farm hand, lived on coarse brown bread and sour wine. They were temperate in diet and regular and constant in exercise. The Spanish peasant works every day and dances half the night, yet eats only his black bread, onion, and watermelon. The Smyrna porter eats only a little fruit and some olivs, yet he walks off with his load of a hundred pounds. The coolie, fed on rice, is more activ, and can endure more, than the negro, fed on fat meat. The heavy work of the world is not done by men who eat the greatest quantity. Moderation in diet seems to be the prerequisit of endurance.

Laughter.

Chavasse, an eminent surgeon, says: Encourage your child to be merry and to laugh aloud; a good, hearty laugh expands his chest and makes his blood bound merrily along. Commend me to a good laugh—not to a little snickering laugh, but to one that will sound through the house; it will not only do your child good, but will be a benefit to all who hear, and be an important means of driving the blues away from a dwelling. Merriment is very catching, and spreads in a remarkable manner, few being able to resist the contagion. A hearty laugh is delightful harmony; indeed, it is the best of all music.

Correspondence.

PACIFIC, MO., Aug. 8, 1888.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: Please pardon my intrusion. I am a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav read the letter of R. E. Tounsley to the children, Aug. 4, 1888. If ever the truth comes uppermost and ever is justice done, it will only be when people will cease to confuse, to misplace, here to deny, there to defame it. I am confident that no honest truth seeker knowingly will do either, least of all yourself.

We are afflicted with many evils, but the fact is, man is the greatest cause of all evil himself. In fact, there is nothing in this wide world, in this broad universe, from which life in general, and man particularly, suffers as much. He not only confuses his fellow-being by subjecting his thoughts to his own thoughts, his own ignorant assumptions of life and laws, but endangers the ways to liberty, and the finding out of the truth itself, of unity of action, and reform. Man throughout this world rules and designs. And yet this power with which he does this is made out to be, by some Liberal thinkers, a nonentity. It is made out that man is void of a soul.

Such is the drift of Mr. Tounsley's letter. And you, Miss Wixon, saw fit to lay it before the children. To convey an idea to a child that it has no soul, that there is no soul in things even, is barbaric, inhuman; is against oneself, against broad nature, does not tend to moral self-conviction, givs no incentiv to act and liv well. Man, as such, is the soul of the universe at large, of eternal matter. What is his thought, his consciousness, his reason, his volition? Is it not his soul that givs him mental sight, that makes him what he is, a man? Is man a man, a conscientious being, because of his physical constitution, or because of his brain, his intellectual capacity? Without that a child can hav no thought of duty, nor honor for its parents nor anything. Man to hav no soul! That idea has often found its vent through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Bennett had none, then; Paine had none; all the great, the noble, that ever lived had none; all whose thoughts are yet activ and inspiring. Ingersoll has none, and you, dear Miss Wixon, hav none, with all your hopes, your love, and inspiration. No, such doctrins are repulsiv and degrading, instead of elevating.

Yours truly, AUG. H. KRUGER.

LEADVILLE, COL., July 28, 1888.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: Inclosed you will find $1 which some little friends of mine wish placed against their names on the Father Hacker Fund: Jennie Dumphy, aged seven years, fifty cents; George Dumphy, aged thirteen years, twenty-five cents; Emma Dumphy, aged eleven years, twenty-five cents. Their father reads THE TRUTH SEEKER, and they became interested in the good old man because he is sick; they want to know how he is in health every week when the paper comes. Georgie works for a dairyman on a ranch; Emma helps her ma about the housework. When there is school, then they go to school. Jennie says to tell you that she has two brothers and three sisters; that she can write some, but not good enough to write to you. I am,

Respectfully, MRS. J. A. AKEAS.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

LOVE VENTURES.

A Novel with an Affidavit.

BY HARRY JULIAN.

Beautifully Illustrated Covers. Paper, 12mo, 226 pp., 25 cents; Boards, 50 cents.

A lively narrativ of adventures in a country of Arcadian simplicity and general delightfulness.—[N. Y. Evening Mail.

A story of life on islands of coral, fruit-trees, and cockatoos, where all the nativ men are Apollos and the women dreams of beauty.—[N. Y. Times.

Life on the Islands of Koro-kama and Launagola—"Summer isles of Eden lying in dim purple spheres of sea"—surrounded by beckoning palm-trees, foamy cascades, bread-fruit, cocoanuts, pineapples, figs, bananas; bathing in the surf on shining sands, basking on shores of eternal summer, attending moonlight banques, and seeing the peculiar dance called Ka-lu-lah—no more to do than the president of a life insurance company—seems very alluring to the careworn, overworked American of to-day.—Critical Review.

Religious Problems.

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

Poetry.

A Poetic Swing Around the Circle.

Now, all ye truth seekers, attend my tale.
I am not writing "no sech word as fale"
(Which, TRUTH SEEKER observes, is common sense, Beyond the average poem's just pretense),
But scribbling out a simple little story.
For any fibs you'll please giv God the glory,
For any merit please giv me the credit,
And render all due thanks when you hav read it.

There is a place that's called the Smoky City;
It has that reputation, more's the pity
That nicknames cling when we hav long outgrown them;
In cases like this people shouldn't own them;
For 'tis most undeserved—a clearer air,
A purer sky, you'll not find anywhere.
And when the "heathen" pilgrim's feet here roam
A faithful chorus bids him welcome home.

And so it was that when the glowing mist,
Hiding the rose-blush, where the sunrise kissed
The tender east, unveiled the morning light
Laughing the dewdrops into jewels bright;
When the long journey o'er the purple hills
Became a past, whose benison distils
The peace of Liberty, that dwells on hights
Lifted toward stars—heeding no lower lights;
When all that I hav written heretofore became
A part of yesterday's eternal claim,
I met again those veterans of wars
Whose peaceful battles left no hideous scars:
But yet upon each forehead sealed the seal
Of purpose highly wrought, of earnest zeal,
Of long endeavor in the cause that burns
Within their hearts, and gloriously turns
E'en dim-eyed Age into a lustrous glow,
Like glancing north-light on the Arctic snow.

And, a propos, our secretary's call
Bids all the faithful gather here next fall,
When the soft haze of Indian Summer reigns
About the hill-tops, like Love's tender chains.
Now, brethren—"sistern" too—from far and near
He that hath ears to hear, let him hear:
Don't fail to come! Miss it and you'll be sorry.
My word—I've been there! There's the stanch
"Old Harry,"
The "noble Roman," and our Mr. Grundy,
His wife too, God bless her—no outlandish Sunday
Of Pennsylvania Blue laws chains her nature;
No church can bind that democratic creature.
Then there's the jeweler with his Russian name—
'Twould take too long for me to write the same,
And even if I did, 'twere sad to tell
Whether 'twere harder to pronounce or spell.
However, this is all a moonshine matter—
A name's a name—no more; of course rose-attar
Would smell as sweet if 'twere written sk——
Oh, now I've done it! Pardon—didn't "thunk!")
Well, when you feel a trifle too important,
As if you owned a few worlds more or less,
Had solved all problems in and out of court, and
Had some knowledge to throw in, address
This modest, unpretentious little Russian,
And get yourself into a good discussion.
Just lay your theories out coolly, slowly
(Be careful not to put in any "holy,"
For by the gods you'll find you've holes enough in Before you finish with your mental scufflin');
Elaborate, with all due ostentation,
On every detail giv full explanation,
And when you've finished to your satisfaction,
Giv him his cue. O Lord! A double, back-action,
Two-edged, three-ply play of forked lightning
Were slow beside his cuts! To put in writing
The naive and gentle way he asks a question
That sets you spinning, like a last year's nest on Fall winds borne, is more than I can hit off;
It must be heard—it can't be read or writ off.
But, Marc-us, mark me, though I cannot catch you,
You're growing up some children that'll fetch you.

Yet do you know the last day of the season
(I lectured on replacing God with reason)
This modern Socrates liked the discourse
So well he moved a vote of thanks; of course,
The Union seconded and said Amen,
"Old Harry" handed me the vote, and then—
I hate to own it, I'm not sentimental—
But somehow that did touch me—it unbent all
My small dignity, and a big wink dropped!
Do you suppose they thanked because I stopped?
Maybe 'twas so—the day was awful hot;
'Twas weather most unrighteous, freshly brought
By some Calvinian crank from Old Nick's kitchen,
With broiling smells, such as God's word is rich in.
Yet that conclusion makes my vain heart grieve;
it
Isn't flattering, and I shan't believe it.
I've very little faith in myth or fable;
But I believe those people wear the label
Of clear, deep candor in their honest eyes;
They can't be roasted into telling lies.
They won't be scared—more than one preacher's tried it.
Each owns his mind; no other can decide it.
And so, by putting this and that together,
I don't believe it was the sweaty weather:
I don't believe that vote misrepresented.
Think what you like, but I believe they meant it.
For I believe the long-contested battle
With God's hot-shot, and hell's infernal rattle
Dinned in their ears by Presbyterian preachers,
Has made them honest toward their fellow-creatures,
Hating the fraud, the shallow, base pretension,
Of those who offer prayerful intervention
To save the soul from Christ's paternal yearning
To show his love by an eternal burning;
Whose panacea for desire is "Pray for it,"
Then pass the hat that you may meekly pay for it
The prayer, I mean); who tell of gold-paved streets,
And feather-legged angels, piteous bleats
Of Agnus Dei's, till John's "towers of jasper"
Turn into hitch-posts in a big sheep-pasture—
Hating these things, I say, the Pittsburgh Union
Has, by sheer opposition, earned a boon, one
Can but envy them—a disposition
To uphold truth. It is an acquisition
All Liberals are proud of! It will pierce
Like Voltaire's dagger, polished, steel-like, fierce,
Into the marrow of the church's bones.
En parenthese, it's run by Pierce and Jones,
Not Davy, but the other.

Ah, dear Truth!
Bright as the glance of starbeams, strong like youth,
Flashing thy splendor through the heavy night,
Heraldic emblem of the coming light!
How many, struggling for thy glorious prize,
Hav breathed their lives out like a sacrifice!
How willingly hav laid at thy fair feet
Their little all that it might be complete;
And had no hope, no thought of petty gain,
No care that all the world mocked it as vain.
'Twas not in vain! Nay, while the rolling world
Sweeps down the cycles—while the shadows curl'd
And gray and shrunken, like a rim of smoke,
Volcanic whisper from the rock-lips broke,
Are torn and shredded by thy lightning-stroke!
Long as the east shall womb her suns unborn
And night's trailed splendors rush to meet the morn,
So long their deeds will liv in heart and brain,
Pointing the higher way! No truth is vain.

But here am I up in a peroration!
I'll clip my wings and get back to narration.
The long and short is this—these, in truth, rich ones,
Hav had so many tussles with the Christians,
And worsted them so oft, that, though their hell
Has lost all flavor save an oldish smell.
They've aped so well their God—pray hav no doubt of 'em—
With little hells they've cooked the lies all out of 'em.

And yet to hint that 'tis their sole attraction,
This creed of truthfulness, were base detraction.
They've all the romance of the blue-bent skies
Lanced, like a Moorish veil, by starry eyes;
And all the music of swift-running waters,
Like laughter rippling from Joy's bright-lipped daughters;
And all the majesty of solemn hills
Whose rocky echo like a deep song thrills,
Kingly, sublime, yet all uncrowned of men,
Wearing the sun-gold for a diadem.
And all the gifts that breathe poetic passion
Fall free from Nature's hand, as rain-drops plash on
The fair green earth, which brightens into bloom
Even as hope which blossoms on a tomb
Where tears hav fallen.

'Tis a pretty sight
To stand upon Mount Washington at night,
And look away over the glowing stage
Whereon these thousands play their parts. Fierce Rage,
Pride and Ambition, Anger, Hate, and Lust
Are stalking there Want gnaws his meager crust,
Red Murder lurks in hollow, caverned eyes,
Grief, Sorrow, and Despair breathe unheard sighs.
And still the stage is lit! Love drops her smiles,
And Gaiety whirls down the brilliant aisles:
Joy treads with happy feet and laughs at tears,
Hope points her hand and bids good-bye to fears.
What need hav they, these happy ones, to know
The pain that rends the suffering hearts below?
Why should they see the gaunt and shadowy things
Cowering and cursing in the darkened wings?
Trip "down the front"—your act, O Joy, is brief,
And all too soon you'll play the part of Grief!
And all too soon you'll feel the dagger-dart
Driven by woe into your very heart!
The wave is light, but down beneath the wave
Lies the dark ocean-bed, a giant grave!
Life's wine waves laugh, but down beneath the laugh
Lies the dark misery no throat can quaff!
And well for him who dwells upon the hights
Untouched by joy or grief. The red stage lights
Show to his clearer gaze the coming time
When the "drop" bell will peal a deadly chime
To ring the curtain down upon an awful crime.

But here again my wings are growing out;
It is remarkable how fast they sprout!
I've serious thoughts of making application
To God, or Beelzebub, for a situation,
To hunt up comets, or waylay the preachers
And scare 'em on dark nights. The holy teachers
Might think about that song the faithful sing:
"Take me beneath the shadow of thy wing;"
And then, again, they might, which is more likely,
Run like a sinner, hollering, "God almighty!"

I hope my nonsense doesn't "make you tired;"
This poem's what John Byers calls inspired,
Though not to spoil it by anticipation
I'll tell that further on in the narration.
You see, Friend Byers, a long time ago,
Pulled himself out of superstition's slough,
And feeling, as God did, that "it was good,"
Wanted to help his neighbors all he could.
And so, last June-time, he secured a hall,
Engaged your scribe, made the thing free to all,
And one bright evening in the perfumed weather
A crowd of solemn Christians got together.
(Of course, there was a sprinkling of the heathen, Doubtful of soul—waiting for God to breathe one.)
Well, the good people put on nice, long faces,
Like they were going to twang off David's praises, Puckered their foreheads, scanned me with their eyes,
Folded their arms, and looked, oh, very wise!
I thought: "Dear Christians, if looks don't disguise us,
You're fairly stupid and most awfully righteous."
And do you know, I talked for one straight hour
Before they felt their livers turning sour?
For fact, they would hav swallowed the whole dose,
Had I not shocked them just about the close,
And never known but what 'twas good, sound
preaching,
Until their stomachs gave a mighty retching.
I spoke about that lie, "In God we trust,"
Hoping the time was coming, as it must,
When money'll be on such a solid basis
No trust's required in God. Oh my, the faces!
The livers all at once began to frolic,
And out they went as if they'd all the colic!
Of course, the Liberals were all amused,
Myself among them. May I be excused,
Dear Christians—I don't like the game of trust;
But clearly in your case it's "trust or bust."

This lecture was delivered in the country
Six miles from Greensburg; 'tis a pretty place,
But when the Ghost-killer is on the hunt, he Can't do better than to run a chase
Around these hills and kill a few old ghosts,
Such as the churches hoard here, by the hosts.
I met my pleasant friend old Mr. Null
(Though void's no name for what's inside his skull)
And had a chatty time on various topics,
Including crops and gods, frigids and tropics;
On politics we struck a different note—
He votes for Ingersoll, and I—don't vote.
A good, tried thinker, though; been through the fires
Of fierce church hatred; so has Mr. Byers.
About that theory of inspiration,
The best I ever heard. "Moses's creation,
And Josh and Jim and Peter, all inspired!"
"Yes," says our friend, "and here's the thought he's sired.
One day while talking with a Christian neighbor,
Trying to get his thinking powers to labor,
Which, by the way, was rather a newish field,
The Christian said: "Our law has been revealed
By inspired writers."
"Well, what's to inspire?"
"Oh, to be filled up with God's holy fire."
"Not so, my friend; 'tis to draw in one's breath,
A thing we'll all do, till we're choked by Death.
An *in*spired man, then, is a man that's living;
An *ex*pired man is dead. The thing is plain,
Of course you're right—don't hav the least misgiving,
No dead man wrote it." Comment would be vain.

I passed some pleasant days at Frankfort Springs,
Days when the sunlight spread his golden wings
And rested softly on the rose-wreathed earth,
Kissing the buds until the bloom came forth.
And when the night queen's silver shining bark
Sailed slowly up the long blue bays of dark,
Gliding serenely o'er the heavenly lake,
The star-foam rushing in her whitening wake;
When every blade of grass a shining tear
Dropped, like sad lashes, on the dead Day's bier;
When the warm breezes nestled in each tree,
As children nestle 'gainst their mother's knee,
As sleepy children, weary with their play,
Close their sweet eyes, while Slumber steals away
Their tired senses, so the breezes creep
Into the silence of a dewy sleep;
Only the lit leaves' gentle flutterings seem
The quivering smile of childhood's happy dream;
When all the soothing sounds that fold and press
And fill the soul full of life's blessedness,
Stole o'er the landscape like a tide of peace,
Hushing all harshness with a gentle "Cease,"
The better life, the higher hopings, came
Like speaking things, and gently called my name,
And bade me look forever toward the best,
So a wide love might ever be my guest:
Might steal from hatred all its keenest sting,
And take from life its every bitter thing.
For who can know each joyless circumstance,
Each fair deceit, that served but to enhance
The struggles for the Right, misunderstood,
Misnamed, misplaced, the bad accounted good?
And who can know the years of lonely strife,
Or by a single act, dare judge a life?
Hatred is garish—'neath its yellow ray
Acts gleam like points; the rest is torn away.
But Love's white radiance throws a mystic veil
That puts all action from our judgment's pale.

Long, long I shall remember those clear springs
Under the rock shades, where the water sings.
Nor less recall the gentle poet guide
Who showed the wonders of that country-side.
A man whom nature gifted with a pen
Which might hav stirred all that is best in men;
But yet, so simple, modest are his words,
They fall unconscious as the song of birds;
And like the bird whose sweetest music rings
Where solitude its freest echo flings,
The soul which breathes these thoughts where genius thrills,
Livs all unnoticed, 'mong these green-crowned hills:
Loving the lowly, toiling with the poor,
Asking the right to lift and help—no more.

And then, oh, then, that blessed Christian lady
Who used to tell me when my meals were ready!
Look at this picture of religious folly!
A visage sallow, lean, and melancholy,
The most lugubrious eyes, a prayerful pose,
Mouth like a trap, a hatchet for a nose,
As pleasant to converse with as a dummy,
The tout ensemble like an Egyptian mummy!
Heavens! what a lot of God she did hav in her!
I know she must; no ordinary sinner
Could hav withstood my long attempts to win her.
But when one day the milk was sour at dinner,
I gave it up—I knew it was no use;
Defeat is odious, but I couldn't choose.
It is so strange that, to be good, these people
Hav to make faces long as a Christian steeple,
And hate themselves and everybody else,
Turning their homes to ably patterned hells.

One Sunday, 'twas the twenty-fourth of June,
The broad Ohio's waters were in tune,
As down their bosom swept a picnic boat;
The Sabbath breaking wicked were afloat!
Our pious friends will please note this deduction:
Christians on board—that saved us from destruction.
The skurrying ripples laughed and danced and sung,
The naiads' arms about our craft were flung,
The people got the fever in their feet
And danced and laughed too. Down the watery street
We swept swift past the famed McKeesport rocks;
Presto! they had us shut within the locks.

Ah, what rare music's in a waterfall!
Down, down it shivers like a silver wall,
Above, the foam curls like a snowy smoke,
Below, the chimes ring like a clear bell's stroke;
Down, down we float between the shimmering banks,
Where Nature's Antony marshals his shining ranks,
Assaults the shadows, puts them all to rout,
Then finds his Cleopatra in a cloud.
Ah, many another conqueror finds it sweet
To yield his triumph for love's dear defeat!
We talked, played cards, and ate, and ate, and ate,
And ate again; and got home very late.
Moral: Successful picnics ground in this short sum-up,
A lot of viands, and a hungry stomach.

The Tuesday after, having packed my grip,
(And got the train-time right), prepared to "skip:"
Said Au revoir until the coming fall,
When, once again, I hope to meet you all.
Be sure and come, now—you will be delighted;
Besides, refusal's rude when one's invited.
Hotels are good—the bedsteads hav nice springs—
Not too many of the "get there's" "without wings."
To set a stylish, neat, and tempting table
There's no one better than our Pittsburgh Abel;
Always obliging, ready to meet your wishes
With widest choice—foreign and nativ dishes,
With pretty titles that are most delicious.
And then, if opposition's what you crave,
There's lots of that—churches enough to save,
If that would do it, the whole population
The earth has witnessed since her first formation.
You'll find Christ's braves with all their bright war-paint on,
Plotting to slay a thing that doesn't exist,
Praying you'll put God's armor of restraint on,
And swearing you're possessed if you resist:
Fools, frauds, fanatics cutting up their capers,
And any saints' amount of lying papers.

I met some Liberals at Ashtabula,
Had a discussion on the Greek in school, a Series of nice naps, and altogether
A pleasant time, in spite of rainy weather.
At Cleveland, on the Fourth, we celebrated
By visiting the graves—to get elated.
So quiet is it in that solemn city,
Where the pale headstones gleam like white-armed Pity,
Seems the great silence of the sacred dead
An altar dear, where Hope and Sorrow wed.
From that tall monument, whose sad gray stone
Marks where a nation's friend finds his last home,
We look upon the peaceful streets below,
Where, soft as flakes, Time's footfalls come and go,
Leaving no touch upon the reflex face,
Whose lineaments our memories still must trace
As we hav known them, when the light showered round,
Ere we consigned them to the underground.
The grasses sleep, and gently o'er their sleep
The breezes pause and sigh, "O Grave, thou'rt deep!"
Far off the waters roll; in their dim blue
The eye sees, till it sees no more; they strew
On the near shore, vague fragments, torn and tossed,
Like half-remembered deeds in distance lost;
And then they go out on the endless surge
That rolls and breaks on the horizon's verge:
Little we know the near, and less can tell
What things are floating on the far-off swell:
Little we know of Life; still less can say
Whether Death laps the shores of Night or Day.

Out upon Erie's waves—the gliding Dark
Puts out her lamps; the east shoots up a spark
That kindles to a flame—the dawn is lit!
Anon dark clouds roll sullen over it.
The Storm is on the water—its great feet
Pass with wide trampling, like an army's beat;
The white caps rise, the foam is whirled like snow.
Sudden athwart the gray, a brilliant glow
Streams like a meteor, dazzles, disappears,
Gleams out again; the sunlight's fiery spears
Hav pierced the Storm-heart! A wide-gushing flood
Pours as he dies, and tints the sky with blood.
The red light pales into an amber hue,
Morn opes her eyes, and lifts their glorious blue!

And with the trust that still through ev'ry cloud
May shine the radiance no gloom can shroud,
That each of us may still behold "the true,
The good, the beautiful," I bid adieu.

V. DE C.

Obituary.

Sarah, wife of G. J. Trullinger, died at her home, Union Mills, Ore., July 27, 1888, aged fifty-five years—a true and loving wife, a good mother, a genuin Liberal, who lived up to the ennobling principles THE TRUTH SEEKER inculcates.

She worshiped at the shrine of Truth, her god was Nature, her church was all humanity, her creed Justice, and her constant endeavor to make a heaven of her home for her dear loved ones.

She rejoiced in the glorious freedom and ennobling truths of Liberalism, scorning empty professions of faith; bigotry and fanaticism grieved her gentle nature. She was an Infidel, and had the courage to avow it.

The very large attendance at her funeral proved the high esteem in which she was held by the community. Hers was the first funeral in the county without a minister and without a prayer—the oration by a Liberal lecturer. Thus the wishes of the deceased and of her loved and loving husband were gratified. Her death and burial, even as had her life, tended to awake honest hearts to earnest thought, and inspired desire to liv more useful, kindlier, happier lives.

Back to the bosom of her Mother Earth we consigned this noble wife and mother. Ever more to sweetly sleep—rest! perfect, peaceful, eternal rest. Let the birds sing above her, the flowers bloom over her, the sighing wind sing her requiem.

In the bright golden season of fruits and flowers,
With changing season and changeless sun,

With voiceless stars and tuneful birds,
With whispering zephyrs and gentle dews,
We leave this loved wife and mother
Sweetly sleeping, sweetly sleeping, never
To wake again to pain and sorrow.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

THE Evangelical Messenger urges religious dominance of politics, and says: "The people of God ought to control this country. Then Christianity may 'mold a mighty state's decrees, and shake the whisper of the throne.'"

CHRISTIANS are taking sides on the utility of praying for rain. "But the only way," remarks the New York Tribune, "to reform the Christians whose scientific studies hav led them to distrust the utility of prayers for rain or fair weather would be to keep them from all knowledge of science."

A NATIONAL party called the American party has been organized, and has nominated for president James Langdon Curtis, of New York. It wishes to limit the voting of foreigners, tax church property, and advance our free schools. Catholic papers are alarmed "that the old Knownothing viper should rear his cursed crest again."

A COMPANION TO THAT FISH STORY.

And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants, and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight.—Num. xiii, 33.

Odds and Ends.

IT is a cold day when the bald-headed spectator gets left. If there is no ballet at the theater there is surf bathing at the beach.

CITIZEN (to stranger): "What are your politics, my friend?" Stranger: "I hav no politics this year; I'm leader of a brass band."

THE small boy may not hav a general knowledge of Shakspere; but if he has a mother he can giv you a definition of "the slippered pantaloon."

A WOMAN in Georgia, while smoking a pipe, was struck by lightning and killed. Lightning shows very poor judgment, considering the number of boys that may be seen smoking cigarets.

HE (gazing at the recent eclipse of the moon): "Ah, dear, isn't it wonderfnl, wonderful?" She (sad and disappointed): "Yes, George; but it isn't nearly so dark as I thought it would be."

BROWN (an editor): "They say half the reading done by the public is of fiction. How dreadful!" Jones (a novelist): "Frightful! I did not suppose the newspapers were perused so extensivly."

MINISTER'S wife (whom illness has kept home from church): "You look tired, my dear." Minister: "Yes; I preached a very short sermon today, and such an unusual exertion has rather exhausted me."

SOME one is advocating gardens on the roof. This will be convenient, at least. When your wife wants a mess of potatoes for dinner, all she will hav to do is to go to the garret and pick them off the ceiling.

FIRST New Yorker (on Broadway): "What's your hurry, Brown?" Second New Yorker (breathlessly): "Hanged if I know! What's yours?" First New Yorker: "Hanged if I know! Let's go and take something."

ALL the pope's jubilee wine is to be distributed among the Italian hospitals, and the orders for extra cots, fire-escape bedrooms, roof facilities, etc., for these institutions are coming in with the precipitancy which might be expected.

"Now, Tommy, don't you feel sorry for all the naughty things you've done to-day?" "Not now, teacher." "You don't?" "I shall be sorry, though, at bedtime, teacher." "Tommy!" "Well, you wouldn't hav me spoil the day bein' sorry, would you? At night I can be sorry for all my sins at once, and save time."

"MY friends," shouted a frenzied temperance orator, "Boston sent last year to Africa one million gallons of rum—accursed rum—while the missionaries on that dark and benighted continent can almost be counted on one's fingers!" "How many—hic—gallons o' rum?" hiccoughed a listener. "One million gallons, sir." "Gra—gracious! An' only few missionaries?" "Yea, friend!" "Gra-gracious! Missionaries in—hic—big luck!"

HIGGINS (meeting his friend Wiggins in restaurant): "By Jove, Tom! I should think you'd be afraid to eat that dish. It's fatal!" Wiggins: "What's the matter? It's only spare-rib and apple sauce." Higgins: "Well, isn't that just what knocked out Adam?"

PRETTY cousin: "And what are you going to do, Bob, when you grow up to be a man?" Bob: "Oh, I mean to be a park policeman, and you shall be my nurse." Cousin: "But policemen don't hav nurses, Bob." Bob: "Oh, don't they, though?" That shows you've never been in the park."

REGINALD: "Elsie, I love you. I——" Elsie (interrupting): "Really, Mr. Regin——" Reginald (interrupting): "Before you finish, come out and hav some wine-jelly, ice-cream, cocoanuts, lemonade, fried oysters, and a sherbet." Elsie (fondly): "Reginald, I always loved you."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher: "Johnny, you did splendidly to-day." "Yes, ma'am." "I wish all the little boys in the class would study their lessons as you do. Are you struggling to win the prize?" "Naw. Dad said he'd gimme a ticket to the circus if I got off my lesson without a break."

COUNTRYMAN (to dealer): "I see ye advertise outside 'everythin' supplied fer weddin's.'" "Oh, yes, sir." Countryman: "Ye go the hull business?" Dealer: "Yes, sir." Countryman (earnestly): "I say, mister, how much would ye tax me fer a good, healthy gal what kin milk, an' ain't afraid of work."

THE Rev. T. Dewitt Talmage, the great pulpit athlete of Brooklyn, always did expect too much. While preaching to the Thirteenth Regiment the other Sunday at the Peekskill encampment, he cried: "Come up, Robespierre, Talleyrand, Henry the Fifth! Come up from the depths of hell, and with your ashen lips shout a warning against evil doings!" Now, according to the theology expounded by Dr. Talmage himself, the three gentlemen he appealed to could not come up, even if they cared to see the Thirteenth drill: and, if they did, the very circumstance that their lips are ashen would prevent their shouting. Was Dr. Talmage making a bluff?

I MEET him on the corner
Every day in sunny weather.
How he has changed! Why, yes, the man
Is different altogether.
"My family?" 'Tis very queer,
I never thought he knew them.
"He wonders if there's any Little kindness he can do them?"
"How is my business?" Why, yes;
He's really philanthropic.
He chats on this and that with me,
But lets me choose the topic.
Perhaps he's had a change of heart,
Or is the fellow crazy?
For commonly he is distrait
(Another name for lazy).
At last he asks for my "support,"
And "Am I for protection?"
Oh, yes! I'm sure of one warm friend—
Till after next election.

Gems of Thought.

CHRISTIANITY has always opposed every forward movement of the human race. Across the highway of progress it has always been building breastworks of Bibles, tracts, commentaries, prayer-books, creeds, dogmas, and platforms, and at every advance the Christians hav gathered together behind these heaps of rubbish and shot the poisoned arrows of malice at the soldiers of freedom.—Ingersoll.

BRUNO, Campanella, Kepler, Vanini, Galilei, Copernicus, Descartes, and Spinoza had to force their way through a snapping and howling pack of monkish fanatics who beset the path of every reformer, and overcame the heroism of all but the stoutest champions of light and freedom. From the tenth to the end of the sixteenth century not less than three million "heretics," i. e., scholars and free inquirers, had to expiate their love of truth in the flames of the stake.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald in The Bible of Nature.

THE affections of the higher animals are not less tender and warm than those of man. The fidelity and devotion of the dog, the maternal love of the lioness, the conjugal love and connubial fidelity of doves and love-birds are proverbial, and might serve as examples to many men. If these virtues are to be called "instincts," then they deserve the same name in mankind. Lastly, with regard to thought, the comparativ consideration of which doubtless presents the most difficulties, this much may with certainty be inferred—especially from an examination of the comparativ psychology of cultivated domestic animals—that the processes of thinking here follow the same laws as in ourselvs. Experiences everywhere form the foundation of conceptions, and lead to the recognition of the connection between cause and effect. . . . Many Christian missionaries, who, after long years of fruitless endeavor to civilize these lowest races, hav abandoned the attempt, express the same harsh judgment, and maintain that it would be easier to train the most intelligent domestic animals to a moral and civilized life, than these unreasoning, brute-like men. For instance, the able Austrian missionary Morlang, who tried for many years without the slightest success to civilize the ape-like negro tribes on the upper Nile, expressly says "that any mission to such savages is absolutely useless. They stand far below unreasoning animals; the latter at least show signs of affection toward those who are kind toward them, whereas these brutal nativs are utterly incapable of any feeling of gratitude."—Haeckel.

MAN is possessed by superstition, and scarcely one in a generation has been found, till modern times, totally destitute of it. We hav, I believe, no proof that the animals are superstitious, except those that regard man with so much misplaced reverence. Sir John Lubbock throws out the suspicion that possibly some ants may be superstitious since they keep in their nests, and tend, with the utmost solicitude, certain insect that seem to be absolutely useless to them. This seems very much like the folly of men, who carefully keep and pamper gods, priests, kings, and other nuisances.—J. Symes.

HIS majesty in a sixth audience, consulting his notes, proposed many doubts, queries, and objections upon every article. He asked: What methods were used to cultivate the minds and bodies of our young nobility, and in what kind of business they commonly spent the first and teachable part of their lives? What course was taken to supply that assembly when any noble family became extinct? What qualifications were necessary in those who were to be created new lords: whether the humor of the prince, a sum of money to a court lady or a prime minister, or a design of strengthening a party opposit to the public interest, ever happened to be motivs in those advancements? What share of knowledge those lords had in the laws of their country, and how they came by it, so as to enable them to decide the properties of their fellow-subjects in the last resort? Whether they were always so free from avarice, partialities, or want that a bribe, or some other sinister view, could hav no place among them? Whether those holy lords [bishops] I spoke of were always promoted to that rank upon account of their knowledge in religious matters, and the sanctity of their lives; had never been compliers with the times while they were common priests; or slavish prostitute chaplains to some nobleman, whose opinions they continued servilly to follow after they were admitted into that assembly?—Swift.

IN Swift's eyes, "ignorance, idleness, and vice are the proper ingredients for qualifying a legislator; laws are best explained, interpreted, and applied by those whose interest and abilities lie in perverting, confounding, and eluding them." A noble is a wretch, corrupted body and soul, "combining in himself all the diseases and vices transmitted by ten generations of rakes and rascals." A lawyer is a hired liar, wont by twenty years of roguery to pervert the truth if he is an advocate, and sell it if he is a judge. A minister of state is a go-between, who, having disposed of his wife, or brawled for the public good, is master of all offices; and who, in order better to rob the money of the nation, buys members of the House of Commons with the same money. A prince is a practicer of all the vices, unable to employ or love an honest man, persuaded that "the royal throne could not be supported without corruption, because that confident, positiv, restiv temper, which virtue infused into a man, was a perpetual clog to public business."—M. Taine.

STAY at home in your mind. Don't recite other people's opinions. See how it lies there in you, and if there is no counsel, offer none.—Emerson.

WHAT is defeat? Nothing but education, nothing but the first to something better.—Wendell Phillips.

THE resolute alone can be truly good-natured; those who commonly seem so are weak, and easily soured.—Rochefoucauld.

Notes and Clippings.

ARCHITECTS complain that church committees are the most dishonest of all classes with whom they hav dealings.

DURING the present session Congressmen hav already sent out eleven million speeches. The two great national committees are now sending out thousands of documents every day.

WALT WHITMAN is feeling much stronger. He is able to sit up, and works every day on what he calls his "booklet." "November Boughs" is the title, and he hopes to hav it ready for the public in September. It will be made up of short poems and prose articles.

A BUDDHIST priest who came to this country to beg money to build a Buddhist temple has gone back to Japan with empty pockets, having discovered that it is no time to talk religion in this country during a presidential campaign.

THE statistics of suicides in France show for the past twelve months 7,572, one-fifth of these being in and around Paris. Poverty caused only 483, and this figure includes a morbid fear of impending misery without actual privation; 1,975 cases may be traced to mental aberration, and 1,228 to physical suffering. Among the moral causes, domestic trouble stands first and alcoholism next. There are 200 cases of disappointed love, 27 from jealousy, and dislike of military service givs 25.

THE shah has caused a great stir in Persia by issuing an imperial edict telling his people that "they may engage with perfect confidence in all industries and enterprises which are the basis of civilization and the sources of happiness and prosperity;" that they "may without fear or apprehension of any kind exercise all rights of ownership over their property;" and that they "may undertake any enterprise requiring the combination of capital or the formation of companies, such as the construction of public works, roads, etc."

THE Infidel weekly of this city has its first-page picture of last week showing the commanding maiden, Freethought, before whom the clergy flee away into the darkness; for she holds in one hand the blazing torch of "Science," and in the other a "roll of honor," with the names inscribed on it of "Paine, Ingersoll, Voltaire, Volney, Shelley, Humboldt, Darwin, Draper, Huxley, Tyndall," etc. The order shows that Freethinking has more honor than scientific thinking.—H. C. Bowen's Independent.

HERE IS OUR GOLIATH.—BRING ON YOUR DAVID.

THE members of the Nineteenth Century Club, says the Sun, hav already begun to realize that the death of its founder will interfere with the carrying out of its original objects, and that Courtlandt Palmer could do things that cannot be done by a board of trustees. It was Mr. Palmer's personal and social qualities, aided by his inherited fortune, that enabled him to form that remarkable club. He brought together under the roof of his mansion in Gramercy square, or, upon certain occasions, in more spacious quarters, groups of people of the most varied kinds—Agnostics and believers, Jews and gentiles, rich and poor, radicals and conservativs. "White spirits and black, brown spirits and gray," mingled in peace at the Nineteenth Century Club, and held high debate upon questions about which they differed in every possible way. Mr. Palmer knew them all, was on friendly terms with all, and enjoyed the respect of all. Upon one occasion, and it was not an unusual occasion, a noted Socialist gave a discourse upon his theories, and his chief antagonist was the wealthy president of a great corporation. Both Lazarus and Dives had a fair show before an audience numbering about one hundred, twenty of whom were possessors of fortunes that aggregated over $300,000,000. After the battle of the two chief combatants there was a free field, opened to all comers, and it was well filled. On another occasion, and it was not an unusual occasion, Infidelity, orthodoxy, Judaism, and Liberalism confronted one another in argument before an audience that differed in belief as much as the speakers did. These were not exceptional incidents, but were among the ordinary experiences of the Nineteenth Century Club under the presidency of Mr. Palmer. There is no likelihood of another president being found who can bring together such heterogeneous groups as he formed, or get up such rare debates as characterized the management of the club's founder.

JUDGE BREGY, of Philadelphia, has refused naturalization papers to an applicant who didn't know what the Constitution was, and was possessor of the information that a king, name unknown, was the ruler of this country. To this information the Sun adds these caustic comments: "A sweet variety of citizen lunkheads like that would make! The fact is getting painfully protuberant that a good many of the people sent over here to grow up with the country don't grow."

THE new German emperor is troubled by the Socialists as his grandfather was, and strenuous efforts are being made to defeat their candidates in the elections for the Prussian Landtag. These Socialists are not of the Anarchist type, but desire to gain their ends through legislation by peaceful means. But the young kaiser is aware that if these ends were gained there would be no kaiser in Germany.

ACCORDING to the Roman Catholic returns for 1888, there are in England and Wales 2,314 priests, as against 1,728 in 1875, serving 1,304 churches, chapels, and missionary stations. In Scotland there are 5 bishops and 334 priests, serving 327 chapels, churches, and stations. The estimated Catholic population in England and Wales is 1,354,000; in Scotland, 326,000; in Ireland, 3,961,000; total, 5,641,000.

God and the Bible.

1 SAMUEL.

Now, Uncle Sammy, it comes your turn to be laid on the gridiron. Let us punch up the fires, for you are to be "done brown."

Chap. i, 2: "And he had two wives." Very moderate for Bible times. If old Solomon had been restricted to that number, he would hav cried out like Cain, "My punishment is greater than I can bear."

Verse 5. I cannot quote it. I want you to read it. God had so much of this "shutting up" and "opening" business on hand that it is no wonder he left much important business unattended to. It is a great pity that he did not "shut up" on most of the Bible writers.

Chap. xi, 21: "And the Lord visited Hannah so that she bare three sons and two daughters." It beats all how many women in Bible times "bare" children in due time after the visits of these heavenly agents. It may seem a little insipid to refer so many times to these peculiar visitors and the nature of their missions, but I want the reader to understand how possible it is for a spiritual visitor to become the father of flesh and blood.

Chap. xviii, 25. Worse and worse. Was this savage balderdash spread before the people by the fiat of a supreme ruler? Is not this interesting literature for the nineteenth century? Some things we can let pass by saying they are silly, but this is savage. Read it, gentle Christian, and then say your prayers.

Verse 27. Not quoted, but to be read. Wasn't he a scalper? These trophies would hav made David a chief among a tribe of redskins. Such passages may hav been written for the glory of God, but they would disgrace any author of modern times.

Chap. xix, 24: "And he stripped off his clothes also, and prophesied before Samuel in like manner, and lay down naked all that day and all night." I wonder what Christians think about such a bare-buff prophet as that? He must hav prophesied the naked truth, and no mistake!

Chap. xxi, 5: "Of a truth women hav been kept from us about these three days." What a long fast for old David! Too bad, too bad!

Verse 13: "And he changed his behavior before them, and feigned himself mad in their hands, and scribbled on the doors of the gate, and let his spittle fall down on his beard." Is such driveling nonsense of any benefit to the people? David no doubt drew his inspiration from God, but I hav known men to act in the same way who were inspired by John Barleycorn.

Chap. xxv, 22. Isn't that a dainty morsel to drop from the "great white throne?" Must I be eternally tormented because I do not believe that such slang was written by the finger of the almighty? I guess there were no societies formed in David's time for the suppression of slang phrases. A half dozen times this indecent expression is used in the Bible. It is without point or purpose, and only shows that the mind of the writer, whoever he may hav been, was of the lowest order. Can writings be inspired when they are so loaded with vulgarism and animalism that they would be nowhere tolerated in decent society?

Verse 42: And "Abigail hastened and arose, and rode upon an ass, with five handmaids of hers that went after her, and she went after the messengers of David and became his wife."

Verse 43: "David also took Ahinoam of Jezreel, and they were also both of them his wives."

Christians, don't you think that was pretty business for one of God's right-hand men? Don't you think if you had more wives you would be more acceptable to God? No doubt David and Brigham Young are on God's staff to-day, assigned special duties, with full rations. If it be true that what is loose on earth shall be loose in heaven, both are surrounded with a retinue of fancy women, singing hallelujah to the great Jew and having a good time generally. It would seem that in the good old times, the nearer men were to God the more wives and concubines they were allowed.

2 SAMUEL.

Chap. v, 13: "And David took him more concubines and wives out of Jerusalem, and there were yet sons and daughters born to him."

One would think that David must hav been considerably married by this time. If his conduct was pleasing to God, should good Christians fight the Mormons? Has God changed?

Chap. vi, 20: "How glorious was the king of Israel to-day, who uncovered himself in the eyes of the handmaids of his servants, as one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncovereth himself."

Solomon was the wisest of men in all the earth, and David was the embodiment of goodness. As the thousand fancy women whom Solomon sported must be taken as evidence of his wisdom, so this naked exhibition of David before the women must be taken as evidence of his goodness. If David was a man after God's own heart, this act must be worthy of imitation. What say you, Anthony? No man left with his natural reason would believe that a man void of humanity and decency could be the best man that ever lived. That men do so believe simply shows the power of the church and the priesthood to pervert the minds of men.

Chap. xi, 2: "And from the roof he saw a woman washing herself. And the woman was very beautiful to look upon." Verse 4: "And David sent messengers and took her, and she came in unto him and he lay with her." Verse 6: "And Joab sent Uriah to David." Verse 14: "And David wrote a letter to Joab, and sent it by the hand of Uriah." Verse 15: "And he wrote in the letter, saying, Set ye Uriah in the fore front of the hottest battle, and retire ye from him, that he may be smitten and die." Verse 26: "And when the wife of Uriah heard that he was dead she mourned for her husband." Verse 27: "David sent and fetched her to his house, and she became his wife and bore him a son."

For hellish depravity and sneaking perfidy this infamous act has no parallel in history, as far as I am informed.

Christian, do you believe that David was a man after God's own heart? If you do, then you believe that a man can be guilty of the most heinous crimes and still be on good terms with God. But you will say that David repented of this crime. But did he not cling to Uriah's wife? Can a man be forgiven and still retain the offense?

It will be found by consulting chapter xii, verses 4 and 5, that a man stole a lamb, and for this act David said: "As the Lord liveth, the man who hath done this thing shall surely die." Yes, this bloody old criminal and hypocrit, who had killed a man and taken his wife, was ready to kill another for stealing a lamb. Such are the ideas of justice derived from the Bible. And yet we are told that all our ideas of right and justice are derived from the Bible. Priests and ministers are mainly responsible for such teachings. But a license to preach includes a license to lie and deceive.

Verse 13: "And Nathan said unto David, The Lord also hath put away thy sins. Thou shalt not die." Though David had wives and concubines too numerous to mention—though he was one of the bloodiest warriors that ever trod the earth—though he robbed and plundered and murdered those taken captiv—though he murdered a man and stole his wife—yet we do not read that he was ever brought before any tribunal to answer for his crimes. And even the Lord "put away his sins." If such a man can escape, who should be afraid of hell?

If the thirteenth chapter be read, it will be found that Amnon, the son of David, committed a rape on his sister Tamar and then turned her out of doors. Then Absalom, another son of David, killed Amnon. And then, chapter xvi, 22, he lay with his "father's concubines on the top of the house in sight of all Israel." And then David took the concubines which Absalom had debauched and shut them up "unto the day of their death."

If God sanctioned these acts, would he not sanction them to-day? If he did not sanction them, should he not put a curse upon them instead of saying that David was a man after his own heart? The story of David simply shows the moral and intellectual standing of the people in the ancient time. The masses believed that their leaders and rulers were under the immediate direction of the gods, and that many of them were born of the gods. The common herd were very ignorant, and were greatly imposed upon by the rich and powerful. David was a great man in his day, and notwithstanding his numerous wives and concubines, and his marauding life, he wanted his people to think that he was good—he told them that he was good and they believed him. But God had no more to do with him than with many another plundering tyrant.

1 KINGS.

In 1 Kings i, 1–5, will be found the last scene in the great drama of this holy sprig of the heavenly kingdom, and it shows the ruling passion strong in death. Like an old miser whose last gaze must rest upon his gold, David, who had taken to himself many wives and concubines, must die in sight of a beautiful woman.

The vast number of women which he had around him, including the beautiful Bathsheba, did not satisfy the old lecher, and so, when he was "old and stricken in years," even on his dying bed, he must needs hav a new woman. So they rummaged "throughout all Israel" to find a "fair damsel" to cherish the king, but he "gat no heat."

Look upon this picture, ye pious hucksters and Bible bangers! ye pious dames who teach the young that the Bible is the holy word of God, and say if you want your sons to pattern after this scourge of man and blister on humanity. Would you keep polecats in your parlor, or lions' whelps for your children's pets? If King David is in heaven, Brigham Young is in heaven. If the history of David is proper mental food for your daughters, send them among the Mormons, for Mormonism is purity itself compared with the sickening story of David.

What an interesting group old Mose and Abe and Sol and Davy and Josh would make in heaven! I would ask no better fortune than to get in with a thousand fancy women—they would be at a premium among the old patriarchs.

Chap. xi, 1: "But Solomon loved many strange women." The devil he did. Is Solomon in heaven? Then heaven is the reward for polygamy. Was Solomon the wisest man? Then ungovernable lust and licentiousness must be taken as evidence of wisdom.

Chap. xv, 10; chap. xvi, 11; chap. xxi, 21, and 2 Kings ix, 8. I cannot quote these passages, but please turn to them and you will find language that must hav dripped right through the throne of God. Was God compelled to use such low-down language? Would not the language hav been as impressiv if these low expressions had been left out? Ask yourself if God ever used such phrases. It is only by calling attention to such vulgar stuff that the people will ever rid themselvs of the Bible craze; otherwise I would pass it with silent contempt. It is my object in calling attention to these passages to show their hideous deformity, and to show how unreasonable it is to believe that God ever used language so utterly at variance with every idea of decency and propriety.

Chap. xi, 3: "And he had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines." Let Christians keep up the fight with Mormon polygamy; the blacker they make the picture the better it will suit me. But where is the consistency in keeping up this fight and at the same time holding up King David as the best man, and King Solomon as the wisest man, in the world?

2 KINGS.

Chap. iv, 14: "And Gehazi answered, Verily she hath no child, and her husband is old." Verse 16: "And he said, About this season, according to the time of life, thou shalt embrace a son." Verse 17: "And the woman conceived and bare a son, at that season that Elisha had said unto her."

It is not at all likely that Elisha had anything to do with that "conception," and he was too holy a man. It may be a good thing after all that men in latter-times are kept in ignorance of the many "conceptions" which take place on account of visits from men in white chokers. How many lessons does the Christian want to understand the nature of these conceptions which followed these prophesies and the visits from heavenly messengers.

2 CHRONICLES.

Chap. xi, 21: "For he took eighteen wives and threescore concubines, and begat twenty and eight sons and threescore daughters."

Such a man is all right in the Bible, but Christians would giv him "l" in Utah.

Chap. xi, 21: "But Abijah waxed mighty and married fourteen wives, and begat twenty and two sons and sixteen daughters."

God must hav paid considerable attention to those men, for in those days he favored the men who had the greatest number of wives and concubines.

In Bible times the rank of a man could be determined by the number of eunuchs and prophets and fancy women a man was able to keep around him. Solomon kept the greatest number of women of any men of whom we hav any account, and it must be on that account that he was called the wisest man. It certainly was not on account of his acquired knowledge.

It will be seen from the last text quoted that Abijah was considered "mighty" for no other reason only that he had many wives and begat many sons and daughters. It is said that the hair of a dog cures the bite, and that one must fight the devil with fire. And I think if Christians would go among the Mormons armed with some of these passages of scripture they could shame every Mormon out of Utah.

JOB.

Chap. x, 18 and 19: "Wherefore, then, hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? Oh, that I had given up the ghost and no eye had seen me! I should hav been as though I had not been."

Did Job know whereof he affirmed? The Christians are bound to take his word, and he says if he had given up the ghost he would hav been as though he never had been. If this is true, what becomes of the Christians' New Jerusalem and golden streets? Why trade off the good things of earth for golden harps and crowns? Why not make the very best of this life if there is no soul to enjoy heaven? Why build costly churches and pay an idle herd of ministers to save souls when there are none to save?

Chap. xl, 16, 17: My eyes! What would hav become of the human family if this silly stuff had never been written? I could refer to numerous passages of scripture which never hav been and never can be of any value to the race. They are simply low, vulgar, and beastly. If printed on cardboard, I know of no place low enough to allow them to be suspended from the wall. And yet Christian ladies carry this abominable filth to church every Sabbath, and display it conspicuously, as if to say to others:

> Pure let them be, and free from taint of vice;
> I, for a few slight spots, am not so nice.

The Christian's eye is constantly turned toward heaven. He cares but little about conditions in this life. The more filth he wades through here, the purer he will be in heaven. Selah.

PSALMS.

Psalm cix, 12: "Let there be none to extend mercy unto him, neither let there be any to favor his fatherless children."

There is scarcely a savage who would not favor a fatherless child. If God is the author of such language he is not worthy of recognition by a Comanche chief. Are such passages calculated to soften the heart or wake up sympathy for suffering humanity? Where would we all be if there were none to show mercy? Will the Christian ever learn that he has been imposed upon—that God never gave such a command—that some man with brutal instincts, in half-civilized society, gave the command, and then, to giv force to his command, said that it came from God? Can he not see that this view is more easy and rational than to rob God of his mercy?

Naples, N. Y. JOHN PECK.

(TO BE CONCLUDED.)

My Second Experience at the Revivalist's.

Last Friday, while crowds gathered opposit the Equitable Building to watch how nearly their timepieces coincided with the sliding ball, the sample rooms in John street were equally crowded with men, saying, "Drink it up and hav another, as the hour for the business men's jubilee is near at hand." A clove tossed in the mouth, and a pretzel prematurely masticated, the business men marched out in Indian file and took a bee-line for the church. Following the crowd, I entered, and stationed myself behind the stove and the last pew. Turning to my next standing neighbor, I inquired whether drunkenness and other crimes hav diminished on account of this jubileeing business. This was overheard by an elderly gentleman sitting right in front of me. He turned around and began to explain to me the beauties of this revival. But as his explanation did not bear upon my question, I held on to my original inquiry. The gentleman, after scrutinizing me more closely, exclaimed: "I see you are a Jew. I would, therefore, recommend you to visit a gentleman by the name of Freshman, who is especially engaged to promote Christianity among the Jews. Not only will he make a good Christian out of you, but a good man as well."

"My dear sir, in order to convince you that I am a Jew not only by birth but also by action, I will not mislead you. Here's a two-column article in which I exposed, not only Rev. Mr. Freshman's infamous mode of operation, but also the depravity of his own character and that of his converts."

The gentleman, adjusting his spectacles when through reading the clipping, suddenly remembered an important engagement and left. Seeing no special interest in store for me, I, too, made a move for the streets, but was stopped by a bald-headed, smooth-faced individual, in whom I recognized the elder with whom I had a pleasant conversation at the last jubilee in Jane street church.

"Allow me to welcome you to our twenty-five-hundred jubilee. Glory! hallelujah! amen! I hope that the extraordinary success in our revival has awakened in your heart the truth, the only truth of our blessed savior. Hallelu——"

"But pardon my interruption. I fail to see how the figures '2,500' worked out by the florist should affect my heart. An additional floral cipher would increase it to twenty-five thousand."

"You must be indeed a hardened sinner, impugning our veracity. Do you suppose we would present the figures to the public if we did not hav so many names in our register? If for nothing else, you ought to be converted so as to increase your faith in both God and man."

"My friend," I replied, "I hav all the implicit confidence as regards the number of the converts, but I doubt whether their conversion accomplished any good. In fact, I hav reason to believe that it does more harm than good."

"Only those who force themselvs to be blind could fail to see the good achieved. While the converts caught by the Jane street church consisted of a miscellaneous crowd, the net spread in these quarters is especially adapted for the fishing of moneyed sinners. The ferocious bulls and bears of Wall street, after participating in a few love-feasts here, become transformed into harmless lambs and loving doves."

"Here is just where I differ with you. In my opinion, there is too much Christianity in Wall street already. Look how all those bank presidents, cashiers, boodlers, et al, occupying prominent places as church dignitaries and Sunday-school superintendents, helped to the increase of confidence placed in them by their dupes, with the inevitable result—instead of instilling religion into the Sunday-school children, they are now promoting cleanliness by laundrying the clothes of their fellow-convicts at Sing Sing. Since you are determined to hav revivals, they should be to help the decrease of Christianity and the increasing of manliness among the Wall street gentry. At present you hav bad modus operandi, telling people that, no matter how corrupt they may be, by only kneeling before the altar, singing a few hymns, and contributing a few coins regularly he or she is cleansed of all past, present, and future iniquities. The revivalists are flourishing over sea and land, with what result? Murders in Asbury Park—the hotbed of religious fervor—elopements, fighting, drunkenness, and every conceivable crime are the results everywhere. Two weeks ago an officer of the Salvation Army forfeited his life on the gallows for willfully murdering his sweetheart, a Salvationist lass. The unprecedented crimes committed by clergymen of the gospel in particular, and religious laymen in general, are something appalling. Though it would be folly to charge all such un-Christian conduct as the outgrowth of the revivals and other Christian fanaticism, yet I firmly believe they hav an indirect influence, and no wonder. That same Friday, when one thousand converts were jubileeing, six executions were chronicled by the press, but happily they all died Christians on the gallows. But nobody ever troubled himself to inform us how the victims died. Nay! If the victim of his Catholic assassin happened to be a Protestant he is denied consecrated ground by his religious opponent, the Catholic, and vice versa.

"The lesson derived from your present Christianity is that the murderer or assassin who, besides extinguishing the light of his victim, also obscures the light of the surrounding widow and orphans, having perfunctorily professed Christianity on the gallows, is furnished, in addition to a pair of wings, a harp, a hand-organ, or a brass trombone, according to the gallows candidate's nationality, and is playing and jubileeing in the celestial resorts, while his victim is weeping and gnashing his teeth in an uncomfortable, overheated abode, because his sudden departure from earth prevented him from choosing his religion.

"But let me not dwell upon things at the gallows. I will confine myself to matters within the church. Should Gabriel blow his trumpet and bring down Christ to this very spot, I doubt whether he will recognize in any of the twenty-five hundred converts a single follower of his teachings. How many will he find who after being smitten on the right cheek, will turn the left also? How many who after having been forced to part with their coat, offered the cloak also? How many who relieved themselvs of their earthly possessions in order to enter the heavenly kingdom with ease? He no doubt would ascertain how much out of the tens of thousands spent on the revivals was devoted toward paying the rent of poor widows and orphans, so as to prevent their Christian landlords from turning them out in the streets. Should you reply, 'Master, we are glorifying thy name, which we incessantly chant,' his answer would be, pointing out your neglect of the study of his Testament, 'Not everyone that sayeth unto me, Lord! Lord! shall enter unto the kingdom of heaven.' Especially will he complain to you about the Jew who, though you despise and persecute him for his non-conversion to Christianity, is more faithfully following Christ's teachings. He who is smitten by a Russian, drunken mob, when celebrating Christmas and Easter, on the right cheek, before he has time to turn over his left is covered with bruises from head to foot. He is also made to part with both his garments, coat and cloak. Is it to be wondered why he does not bear the cross when he is loaded with so many counterfeit crosses, manufactured by every so-called Christian sect, thus misleading him as to which is the genuin one? Unlike the Jews, who form missionary societies, revivals, and camp-meetings to impart to the Christians lessons in sobriety, family sanctity, and forbearance, Christianity forces itself upon the oppressed Jew, engaging all sorts of trickery—the Russian knout, the German anti-Semitism.

My friend, the elder, in his confusion blurted out: "I wish I had not prevented you from going. I am too weak to refute your arguments. What do you want me to do?"

"It is you who want everything from me," I replied. "You want me to emulate the Freshman clique, to profess Christianity for so much with my mouth minus the heart. You want me to join the Protestant church so as to add one more enemy to Catholicism."

By this time we were interrupted by a uniformed official depositing a small envelope with printed directions how to utilize it for free contributions. "You see," I resumed, "you want me to join your forces so as to avail myself of the use of the envelope."

"Hush!" he whispered in my ear; "the Boy Preacher, Harrison, is leading a man to the altar, where my presence is indispensable. Do leave me at present. Here is my card. Call upon me at any time, but leave me now. Do."

And I did. A. BENJAMIN.

Wool or Whisky?

This is the great question in politics. The Democrats want to giv the factory cheap wool and the people cheap cloth. Rather than allow this, the Republicans are willing to let whisky drop to one-fifth of its present price, which would, as Mr. Blaine has recently acknowledged, "increase its consumption enormously." Such promotion of drunkenness would be a much worse evil than can even be predicted as a result of having cheap wool.

My own belief is that the Cleveland plan will giv the laborer more dollars for his work, as well as more goods for his dollar. The wages problem is so important that I mean to take it up by itself; but as what I hav said about the burden imposed on poor people by the tax on woolen goods has been misunderstood by at least one reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will try to state the facts as plainly as possible. There are two taxes on woolen cloth, one according to value, which both parties are willing to keep up, and the other according to weight, which the Republicans would retain and the Democrats would abolish. This latter tax is the same on all woolen cloth of the same weight, however much or little it may cost. The rates, thirty-five cents a pound on cloth and forty on ready-made clothing, are fixed by the law of 1883 as may be seen from the printed copies to be found in any large public library. If this tax does not affect prices, it is of no benefit to anyone, and no one can object to abolishing it. The very fact that so much opposition is made to the Mills bill proves that the price of American woolens is higher than it would be if imported cloth were not taxed per weight. Why some grades are as cheap as Mr. Griffith says, is a question which I cannot answer until I see samples and know the weight. There can be no reasonable doubt about the fact that prices are increased by this tax, or that it weighs most heavily upon the buyers of the cheapest goods. Purchase cloth at $2 a yard, and you are thus taxed thirty cents on the dollar. Take cloth which is of the same warmth, but double the price, and your tax is reduced to fifteen cents on the dollar. The buyer of a $10 suit has to pay $2 more on account of this weight tax than he otherwise would, and he is thus taxed twenty cents on the dollar; whereas, if he could afford to buy a $50 suit of equal warmth, he would be taxed only four cents on the dollar. Such a discrimination against the poor is plainly an iniquity. The platform which insists on prolonging this outrage, and is willing, rather than hav it cease, to encourage drunkenness, is dangerously wicked.

As for the manufacturer, this weight tax on cloth merely repays him for what he loses by the tax on wool. The Democrats propose to take off both these taxes and thus enable the manufacturer to make just as much profit as at present per yard. The only difference is that he could afford to sell cloth much cheaper, especially such as is bought by the poor.

That he will be able to export more cloth if he can thus reduce the price without changing the quality is so certain a result that I am surprised to find the statement misunderstood. What I hav said about the wool tax, is simply that it hinders the exportation of our woolen goods, by making them too dear for foreign markets. This is just as bad as an export tax would be. As proof, we hav the fact that we now export three times as many dollars' worth of leather goods as we did when there was a duty on hides. As soon as they were let in free boots and shoes were made more cheaply, and thus it has become possible to sell them in Canada and other markets which hav been closed by the tariff. Precisely the same thing will happen as soon as wool, too, is let in free of duty. The Democrats would hav wool treated like hides. Would the Republicans treat hides like wool, and giv up exporting boots and shoes? Why not follow the same rule in both cases?

And I must add a word in reply to the argument that, as has been often urged in THE TRUTH SEEKER, "The fact of our manufacturing and selling goods cheaper than the tariff precludes the idea that the tariff interferes with our export trade." Is that really the fact with any article at the present day? It certainly is not the case to any great extent. Steel rails were sold below the duty a dozen years ago, when the home market was glutted in consequence of the over-production resulting from excessivly high duties. A few years earlier, we had so many blast-furnaces, in consequence of high protection, that pig iron was sold for less than the duty. The result was that half the furnaces shut up and the laborers had to go on the tramp. Is that a state of things to be proud of? Does anyone want to bring it back?

Nothing of the sort has happened, so far as I know, of late years; and the reason is that the trusts keep prices up by keeping production down. This, too, is an evil; and the only way to get rid of it is to allow more competition from abroad. There is, however, one class of articles with which the market is likely to be glutted. If the Republicans ever manage to carry out the plan they announced at Chicago, of "the entire repeal of internal taxes, rather than the surrender of any part of our protectiv systems at the joint behest of the whisky ring and of the agents of foreign manufacturers." The whisky ring works with the internal taxes to make whisky dear. The Republicans are going to work in the opposit direction—that is, to make whisky cheap. Distillation is so cheap and simple a process that no ring can prevent a great reduction in whisky and brandy as soon as the internal tax on distilleries is taken off. If anyone wishes to see the market glutted with brandy and whisky, and the gutters lined with their consumers, he knows how to vote.

Official Call for Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Local Secular Unions, Life, Charter, and Annual Members, and all Liberal citizens who support the Nine Demands of Secularism, Greeting:

You are hereby invited to attend the Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, which will convene at Lafayette Hall, Wood street, near 4th, Pittsburgh, Pa., Friday, October 5, 1888, at 10 A.M., for a four days' session—5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th inclusiv.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State or Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Unions are entitled to seats and votes in this Annual Congress. Each Local Secular Union is entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates. Annual Members who pay or hav paid $1 in the national treasury are entitled to seats, but not to votes, except by unanimous consent of the Congress.

This Congress will specially consider practical questions tending to further agitation for taxation of church property; the abrogation of state aid to sectarian institutions; abolition of state, national, military, and prison chaplaincies; repeal of judicial oaths, Sunday and other oppressiv and unjust ecclesiastical laws; nullification of attempts to subvert our Constitution by a legal recognition of Theism in the American Magna Charta, and such other measures as will not merely thwart intended theological encroachments, but will absolutely expunge from our laws, state and federal, such insidious acts as hav already crept in to blot out mental freedom from our republic.

It is to be hoped that the addresses delivered will deal with the practical issues of the organization, so that there will be such an awakening of the people to these vital questions of the hour that a revival of the instinct of liberty and justice for all will necessarily result; that again from the Keystone state—the birthplace of our association—the clarion voice of freedom shall vibrate throughout the land.

Pittsburgh being situated almost in the center of a district containing many of our most distinguished workers, thinkers, and writers, besides the activ host within its limits, there is little doubt but that this Congress will be a glorious gathering of the forces who stand for mental liberty, as expressed in the desire for complete Secularization of the government.

Instructions to Members, Delegates, and Visitors to the Congress.

Through the courtesy of the Central Traffic Association, persons attending the twelfth annual Congress, to be held at Pittsburgh, commencing October 5th, will be granted a reduction in their return railroad fare only, under the following circumstances and conditions:

1. Each person must purchase (not more than three days prior to the date of the meeting) a first-class ticket (either unlimited or limited) to the place of meeting, for which he will pay the regular fare, and upon request the ticket agent will issue a certificate of such purchase, properly filled up and signed by said ticket agent.

2. If through tickets cannot be procured at the starting-point, parties will purchase to the most convenient point where such through tickets can be obtained, and repurchase through to place of meeting, requesting a certificate from ticket agent at the point where repurchase is made.

3. Tickets for the return journey will be sold by the ticket agents at Pittsburgh, at one-third the highest limited fare, only to those holding certificates, signed by the ticket agent at point where through ticket to the place of meeting was purchased, and countersigned by myself, certifying that the holder has been in attendance upon the Congress.

4. It is absolutely necessary that a certificate be procured, as it indicates that full fare has been paid for the going journey, and that the person is therefore entitled to the excursion fare returning. It will also determin the route via which the ticket for return journey should be sold, and without it no reduction will be made, as the rule of the Association is that "no refund of fare will be made, on any account whatever, because of failure of the parties to obtain certificates."

5. Tickets for return journey will be furnished only on certificates procured not more than three days before the meeting assembles, and will be available for continuous passage only; no stop-over privileges being allowed on tickets sold at less than full fares. Certificates will not be honored unless presented within three days after the date of adjournment of the Congress.

6. Ticket agents will be instructed that excursion fares will not be available for return journey unless the holders of certificates are properly identified, as above described, by the secretary, on the certificate, which identification includes the statement that one hundred or more persons, who hav purchased full-fare tickets for the going passage, and hold properly receipted certificates, hav been in attendance at the meeting.

The certificates are not transferable, and the signature affixed at the starting-point, compared with the signature to the receipt, will enable the ticket agent to detect any attempted transfer.

N.B.—Please read carefully the above instructions. Be particular to hav the certificates properly filled and certified by the railroad agent from whom you purchase your going ticket to the place of meeting, as the reduction on return will apply only to the point at which such through ticket was purchased.

Secular vs. Religious Education.

[B. H. Marlett was the first president of the Young People's Secular Mutual Improvement Society of Chicago, and gave several excellent addresses. The following struck me as worthy of being read by THE TRUTH SEEKER family. Brother Marlett is activ not only in the junior society but also among the older folks. He is an American Express messenger, which accounts for the reference to the weight of golden ingots. The address contains much sound sense. —E. A. S.]

The subject I hav chosen was suggested by a conversation with a friend a few days ago in regard to the respectiv values of secular or religious education for the young. He entertains some very Liberal ideas, and a few that are decidedly illiberal. His wife, being a Roman Catholic, desires to rear their children in the faith of that church, and he asked me for my honest opinion and advice whether it would be advisable to teach them the principles of Liberalism while young, or allow them to be brought up under the teachings of the church and instruct them in Liberalism when they grow older. I outlined my views as here written.

I told him that I once heard of a priest who said that if he could control the education of a child until he attained the age of ten years, he cared not who had him afterward.

I told him to teach them to be honest; teach them to be temperate; teach them to be truthful. Love them if you wish to be loved; do not deceive them. Teach them facts in nature as demonstrated by science. Do not fill their young minds with fear because of an angry God or a hideous devil. Tell them honestly these are myths born of ignorant superstitions and simpering credulity. Place in their hands such pure books and papers as are absolutely free from the corroding influence of superstitious fears and dogmas. Teach them to become honorable men and women. Teach them to deal honestly with their fellow-men, and that such a course is followed by rewards here in this life, rather than in a life beyond the clouds.

When they see that beautiful bow stretched across the heavens and ask from whence it came, tell them the truth. Don't say that it was placed in the heavens as a promis that God would never drown the world again. Tell them the natural causes that produce it—that it is the refraction and reflection of light through drops of falling water, and had reared its graceful arch from zenith to zenith for thousands, yea, millions of years, before Noah was born, and will ever exist as long as there be sunshine and shower.

When he sees a vivid flash of lightning and hears the mumble of distant thunder, and asks concerning it, do not lie about it and say that God is angry with him because of some sin he has committed; tell him it is the rush of air into a vacuum made vacant by the discharge of electricity. When he sees the gladdening and refreshing shower, and asks if God sent it in answer to prayer, don't deceive him and say Yes, but tell him that when conditions are favorable, when the mists hav been gathered up from the face of the oceans into vapors and clouds, they are condensed and fall in copious showers on the just and unjust alike, only to return in the same manner and fall again and again forever and ever. When he feels the earth tremble beneath him, and hears the mighty mutterings of an earthquake, and sees the toppling towers and shattered cities, do not lie to him and say that it is a visitation of God's wrath upon his children, or that it is the struggles of countless devils in the earth's center, the future home of the wicked. Do not teach him such stuff, but tell him it is the gradual settling of the earth's surface, or crust, as it follows the receding and cooling fires in its center. Do not fill his young mind with such insane nonsense as that holy angels guard his bed, or ideas of the New Jerusalem with streets of glittering gold, walls of rubies and precious stones, palaces of pearls and jasper, fountains of sparkling waters, and the grandest of imaginable flowers exhaling eternal perfume.

Some weeks ago I saw in one of our theaters some beautiful stereoscopic views, and among them was one that represented two angels having in their spirit arms the spirit of a child. I admit the picture is indeed beautiful, and appeals to the emotional nature of man, but is it true? What is the spirit? I answer, If it is anything, it is nothing. I repeat and insist, if it is anything, it is nothing. It is without body, shape, or form; it is indestructible, indivisible, without force or resistance; it is absolutely nothing, and yet the Christian mythologists clothe this nothing with long, shining robes of spotless purity, and attach to this nothing great, graceful, sweeping wings, and place in its hands a golden harp and on its head a crown.

Now, about this golden harp. I hav handled vast quantities of gold. Long before the Chicago and Northwestern extended its lines up the Elkhorn and Niobrara valleys into Deadwood, the products of three gold-mines were forwarded by stage across the plains to St. Pierre and there delivered to us. A brick of gold, about 12 inches long by 8 inches wide and thick, will weigh about 132 pounds. If the heavenly harps are of the same size as those of earth, it would require the united efforts of three strong men to lift it, and yet you tell the child that this "nothing" picks it up and flits about from flower to flower and fountain to fountain, singing and playing heavenly strains.

I don't know, but I suppose the strings of those heavenly instruments are of the same material as earthly strings, and, if so, it's a little rough on those nocturnal, flower-climbing warriors. Now, I can't play any kind of a musical instrument. There is no music in me, and when I'm called upon—but probably I will be down below industriously fanning myself—just suppose that I am with that angelic host and asked to join in the grand chorus by the musical director. I would be as liable to knock out "Marching Through Georgia" or "We Won't Go Home Till Morning" as anything else, and I am of the opinion it would be anything but delectable music.

I maintain that a tenacious, dogmatic belief in the Bible theory of the creation and the birth of man and the presumably sacred character of Christian relics stultifies the mind and retards mental progress and enlightenment. The cross has long been considered a Christian emblem—an emblem to which the eyes of all Christendom look up in adoration and love. A belief in this precludes the belief that the cross was used for centuries and centuries before the Christian era by many nations as an object of veneration and worship, and by others upon which to execute their criminals. 332 B.C., Alexander ordered the execution of two thousand citizens of Tyre to degrade this religious emblem.

A belief that Eden was the birthplace of the human family bars the door to mental investigation. There flourished a civilization in Central America that antedates that of the Old World, as, when we free our minds from the myths of biblical lore, we may learn from the inscriptions on the monuments and temples of Copan, etc. We may yet learn that America gave birth to the originators of the human family, and that a continent lying between Africa and America, now submerged, afforded easy communication between the New and Old Worlds.

Don't burden his young mind with that vicious fear of hell. Don't reward error with eternal life. I hav but little faith in the honesty of him who is honest through fear of punishment if he transgresses. Teach him that good results necessarily follow good deeds, and that we should be honest, kind, affectionate, and charitable for the good fruits they bear in this life. Tell the child honestly that when the lamp of his life faintly flickers in its socket—when the sands of his time are run—when his eyelids close in death—he simply returns to the elements from which he came.

Fame Enduring and Fame Ephemeral.

As a certain aspiring youth who, with no fear of eternal punishment before his eyes, set fire to a certain pretentious structure in Ephesus devoted to religious mummery, outlivs in fame a certain pious fool who reared the edifice, so

The founders of the journals two, the old Express and Mail—
The two consolidated now, say wedded, if 'twere fit—
Will long outliv, in envied fame, the pious dinglefag
Who owns the double-header now, and thinks he edits it!

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

CANBY, ORE., July 24th, 25th, 26th.—The bills were out, the lectures very thoroughly advertised, but I confess to having entertained fears of failure when I found I was advertised to lecture afternoons and evenings July 24th, 25th, 26th, at Lee's Grove. Canby is a very small place; no time of the year could hav been more unpropitious; it was the very busiest season of the year for farmers—they were all working early and late; had to make the very most of every hour, and work so hard that, when the day's work was done, exhausted strength demanded immediate sleep and much-needed rest. I was most agreeably surprised at the good attendance every afternoon and crowds each evening. The afternoons were very profitable seasons, for a large proportion of those present were women and children, for the first time interested in hearing on "the other side." Facts were impressed on the minds of the young that can never be effaced. Just think what grand results may be accomplished, even under most discouraging conditions, by a little self-sacrifice and energetic effort.

Brother Heman Lee's health is not good, but his devotion to the cause of human progress is very hearty. He fixed up his grove very nicely—no hall was obtainable—arranged comfortable seats, and built a speaker's stand which the ladies very tastefully decorated with evergreens and mottoes.

The Lee family are Spiritualists, but not the orthodox kind; on the contrary, they are bright, cultured, intelligent devotees of genuin Liberalism, making sure of heaven here and now by lives of love and ministrations of benevolence, as the only sure preparation for the highest and best possible conditions in spirit land, their hoped-for heaven of the future.

Quite a number of Liberals came from a distance, and the hospitable Lee mansion was crowded with welcomed guests. Mrs. L. E. Wright and friends came from Union Mills; Mr. B. F. Linn from Oregon City. I had a short but most enjoyable visit at the happy home of George Knight, the postmaster of Canby. He and his good wife are united in the good work, and their dear children make their home a gleesome paradise—a very Eden of peace, love, and comfort.

I felt to cordially second the many wishes that Mrs. Reynolds could hav been there, and kept the meetings going for three more days. An able woman lecturer, following up the work, could hav won over the entire community. I left the dear friends with interchange of kindest wishes, and promised to return, if possible, with Mrs. Reynolds in the fall of 1889.

SILVERTON, ORE., July 28th, 29th.—This is the Gibraltar of Freethought in Oregon. The impetus imparted to Liberalism here by the wonderful energy and enthusiasm of S. P. Putnam at his first visit has had grand results. Infidels are in the majority in this place, and love, peace, and unity prevail. The Universal Mental Liberty Hall, built and owned by the Liberals, is a splendid, large brick building—an immense, very handsomely fitted up store below, and a splendid hall, fitted with stage, scenery, etc., with a magnificent, smooth dancing-floor and abundance of most comfortable seats. It is the handsomest and best property in the town.

On Saturday, Mr. Reuben Wright, of Union Mills, came to see me at the home of Lewis Ames, where I was reveling in cosy comfort, and informed me of the death of Mrs. Sarah Trullinger, and delivered the message of entreaty from the bereaved and sorrowing husband for me to go out there and conduct the funeral services on Sunday. The advertisments were out for an all-day meeting and basket-picnic in the grove at Silverton on Sunday; but on consultation with friends, and learning that by fast driving and vigorous push I could make it, so that I could deliver a lecture at the grove in the morning at 11:30, as advertised, and return in time for a lecture at the hall at 8 P.M., they gave up the day's picnic. If it spoiled my opportunity to make acquaintance with the kind friends of Silverton and vicinity, and deprived them of enjoyment of their anticipated grand holiday, it proved to the Christians that we practice what we teach, and at self-sacrifice are ever desirous to minister to others in their time of need or sorrow. The occasion will be tenderly remembered by all alike at Silverton and Union Mills.

So on Sunday, immediately after delivering a lecture at the grove, concluded at 12:35, I stepped into a buggy, and with genial young Brother Reuben Wright for Jehu, we at once sped over the rough and rugged mountains—eighteen miles—on an errand of mercy. The funeral had been postponed till 3:30 P.M., and at 3:35 we arrived. I at once delivered the oration. It was not known who was to preside. The high esteem in which Mrs. Trullinger and her husband were held brought an immense gathering. Many Christians who never had listened—who under no other circumstances would hav been induced to listen—to a Liberal lecture, learned many truths. It was the first funeral in that section ever conducted by an Infidel lecturer—a burial without prayer, priest, or parson.

After leading the procession to the grave, and consigning our sister to the sweet, eternal, peaceful sleep, to know awakening to pain and sorrow nevermore—omitting the horrid barbarism of throwing clods of earth upon the coffin when in the grave, to jar upon the bruised and bleeding hearts of the mourners—I bade the bereaved husband and friends adieu and again entered the buggy, and Brother Wright made such good time and drove so rapidly that we had four minutes ahead on the arrival at his mother's house. She had with loving hospitality intent provided us a nice lunch and a most refreshing and much-needed cup of coffee. With brief but kind adieus, again on, on, on, and we arrived at Silverton at 8 P.M., and I at once delivered a lecture to an eager, expectant crowd, and all seemed greatly pleased. I slept that night without need of rocking, lulled to sweetest repose in the glad thought that I had not lived that day in vain. C. B. REYNOLDS.

A Movement to be Watched.

From the Nashville Christian Advocate.

In our issue of March 31st, we gave an account of a proposed Romish movement to propagandize the South. The particulars we gave were taken from an interview of the Catholic priest at Rome, Ga., Rev. J. M. Clifford, with a reporter of the Tribune, the daily paper of that city.

In the account it was set forth that the Romanists had a scheme on foot for planting several colonies in the South; that the bishops east of the Mississippi river had the matter in charge; that the plan was to be fully developed at a convention of these bishops to be held at Hot Springs, N. C., just after Easter, at which Cardinal Gibbons would be present to aid in the matter; that it was proposed to form a company with a capital of $2,000,000 to be raised by issuing two hundred thousand shares of stock at $10 per share; that wealthy Romanists and outsiders were to aid the movement; that immigrants were to be sought from the Northwestern states in this country, and from England, Ireland, Germany, and France, in the Old World; that points in north Georgia, north Alabama, north Mississippi, Tennessee, and North Carolina were to be selected for these colonists, and tracts of land secured to them in lots of ten to one hundred acres, allowing them ten years in which to pay for the property, etc.

The account was, in the main, confirmed by published utterances of Romish authorities in Nashville soon afterward, and is now further confirmed by the correspondent of the Chicago News, who was sent to observe the proceedings of the meeting and ascertain further particulars of the movement. From the correspondent's account it seems the convention finished its labors April 25th, though his account did not appear in the press dispatches until May 6th.

It appears an association was organized to be called by the taking title, the "Southern Immigration Association." Of the composition of the body forming this association the correspondent of the News says it "was unique." Cardinal Gibbons, the archbishop of Baltimore; the bishops of Nashville and Savannah, and many other priests were present, representing the Romish hierarchy. Besides these, he says, "the Southern states were represented by General Fitzhugh Lee, governor of Virginia, who presided; by Governor Gordon, of Georgia; by the governor of South Carolina, and by delegates appointed by the executivs of eight other states. In addition to these prelates and priests, there were at least two hundred gentlemen from all parts of the South, representing their respectiv communities; also a very considerable number of the foremost railroad officials of the trunk lines east of the Mississippi river."

Concerning the moving spirit of the convention he affirms:

> The speech of Cardinal Gibbons was a masterpiece of policy. From the moment he took his seat until the convention adjourned all the proceedings were in harmony with his thoughts. The resolutions adopted provide for the organization of the Southern Immigration Association, with headquarters in New York, and for the raising of a large fund by $1,000 subscriptions from railroads, from public and private corporations, and from trade and industrial organization in all the Southern states east of the Mississippi river.

Of the aims and motivs involved in the meeting the News correspondent speaks as follows:

> Why has Rome developed such an interest in the South as to hav Cardinal Gibbons, her bishops of Nashville, of Savannah, and a halfscore of growing cities in the South, leave their labors to attend a convention that ordinarily would hav drawn to it none but business men and railroad magnates? The intention is clear. Rome has decided to propagandize the South. The Southern states are aroused to their need of greater populations, of an increased diversity of industries. The railroads desire to swell the volume of travel and freight transportation. Rome, ever watchful, has noted these things carefully, and in them sees her opportunity. The future wealth of the South is assured. Europe is overcrowded. Tens of thousands of Rome's children could be influenced by the church to leave their nativ lands and settle in the South. They could be planted in colonies in all the states, and thus form the nucleus for the spread of Catholicism.

In conclusion, the correspondent sets forth the shrewdness with which the Romanists pursued these aims:

> Rome's plans hav been kept out of sight. Immigration from Europe was suggested, nothing more. Had the idea been made conspicuous that the work in hand was to bring as many colonists as possible from Europe to the South, there would hav been some dissent, for there were many members of the convention who represented communities that are totally opposed to an influx of foreigners. Had it been boldly put forth that special efforts would be made among European Roman Catholics, there would hav been many objections, for the South, as a whole, is overwhelmingly Protestant. But corporations are soulless. All these powers will naturally join the organization. Evidently the hierarchy studied the situation carefully, and enters upon its work with reasonable hopes of success.

Having given our readers an insight into the true inwardness of the movement, we desire to add some observations.

We suppose the governors of Georgia, Virginia, and South Carolina, and perhaps the eight other state executivs who appointed delegates to the convention, were kept in the dark as to the real purposes of the meeting. They surely would not knowingly ally their official positions with a sectarian movement, and it is preposterous to think they hav gone to Canossa for political purposes.

The railway magnates hardly stopped to inquire what the movement meant. They are ready to serve without question anything, from a circus to a camp-meeting, which offers passengers or freights to their lines.

But the Romanists understood clearly why they had come together, and we of the South who hav hitherto escaped the worst evils of Romanism had as well view the case from the standpoint of their intentions, and govern ourselvs accordingly.

Much as we may desire to treat the church of Rome with the same tolerance and fraternity as we extend to other denominations, the facts of its own making do not allow us to do so with safety. It is a political body as well as a religious organization, and it is a political body which persecutes for religion's sake. It votes solidly—which means its attitude givs it power to compel parties to treat with it. It is worse than folly to interpose in behalf of such a body a plea of charity. Charity cannot tolerate uncharity, and toleration ceases to be a virtue when it is invoked that intolerance may go unrebuked.

This movement is a part of a series of schemes which hav been going on some time to secure the balance of power in the United States. Archbishop Lynch, of Toronto, not a great while ago reminded Lord Randolph Churchill that the Romanists held the balance of power in Canada, and thereby controled elections. And he went on further to say that in due time presidential elections in this country would be determined in the same way. It is not difficult to see how necessary to such a plan is a good round vote in "the solid South."

Let no man say our words are the utterances of an alarmist. What Rome openly avows as a purpose is not to be pooh-poohed as a nightmare. As a matter of fact Romanism is already a political factor in this country. Just the other day a dispatch from Washington said: "The House Committee on Indian Affairs yesterday considered the Indian Appropriation bill. Among other items adopted was one to appropriate $150,000 to provide for the education of one hundred and fifty boys and girls at St. John's University at College Grove, Minn., and St. Benedict's Academy at St. Joseph, Minn. From one hundred to one hundred and fifty boys and girls hav been educated at these schools yearly, but the Indian commissioner has been steadily decreasing the price allowed for them, until it now reaches $108 a year." These are both Roman Catholic schools. The allowance of $108 per capita for their Indian pupils is an extravagant sum, but it has been larger in the past, and now it is proposed to raise it to $1,000. It would be interesting to know the history of this item in the Indian Appropriation bill, as it would also be to know why the Romanists receive from the general government more money for Indian schools than all the other denominations put together.

Romanism has lived in the Old World so long at public expense it has acquired the habits of a political parasite, which we might well despise except for its deadly bite.

But what remedy shall we adopt to meet this movement? Can we forbid these people buying and occupying lands? No; but we can unite our Protestant forces so perfectly to defeat the ends they aim at that we can make it undesirable for them to come with such designs among us. This we can do, and this we ought to do, both for their good and our own.

We say for their good as well as our own, and the point is well taken. Romanism, if we may trust Lord Macaulay, has blighted some of the fairest sections in Europe and pauperized the people. If we permit them to control our country it will soon be unfit even as a refuge for the unhappy peasants now sought to be brought among us.

New Testament Miracles and Evolution.

The alleged miracles of Jesus are fairly numerous, but upon the assumption that he was the very God, their utilitarian or moral value is open to doubt. The gospel writers not only believed that Jesus was capable of performing miracles, but that any of his disciples who possessed the necessary faith might acquire the power by the help of deity.

Jesus may be applauded for curing a man of leprosy, for healing the centurion's servant, or even "removing" the fever from Peter's mother-in-law, but if Jesus were God it is difficult to understand why such persons should be afflicted with these diseases at all, especially if their conduct was meritorious, and if such diseases were sent as a punishment, it is equally hard to understand why Jesus should select these among so many for cure, and leave all other afflicted persons to deal with the diseases by natural methods or perish. These were undoubtedly useful miracles if they occurred, but as no amount of evidence would prove them to hav been performed by supernatural means—no man being able to set a limit to nature's capabilities—we are open either to believe that those who recorded these events were mistaken or that they were deceived, or that they were accomplished in a purely natural way.

Jesus is said to hav turned devils out of two men possessed. But what are devils? Theologians do not know. They profess to know something about a personal being whom they describe with this name, but devils in the plural they know nothing about.

Some say that the devils referred to were "fits." But fits are not entities—they are a physical condition resulting from a derangement of the nervous system.

In the same chapter we are told of devils that were transferred from the stomach of a man to the bodies of some poor pigs, whose constitutions were so disturbed by such extraordinary and unexpected internal sensations that they, with one accord, made an end to their existence (the pigs, not the devils) by rushing furiously down a steep place into the sea. Now, if it were a good thing to turn devils out of the stomach of a man, how can it be regarded as a moral act to giv them a temporary lodging in the stomachs of a number of poor pigs? And if these devils were "fits," is it possible to transfer the fits of a man to pigs?

It is said that Jesus "stilled the tempest." But though this would be in itself a meritorious performance, there were very few lives at stake. And if it was a good thing for Jesus to still the tempest, by rebuking the winds and the sea, to save a few disciples, it is not unnatural to ask if it would not be still more praiseworthy on his part to calm the fury of the waves when some great vessel heavily laden with human beings was about to be engulfed.

Do we not all in our best moments feel with Miranda when she exclaimed:

> If by your art, my dearest father, you hav
> Put the wild waters in this roar, allay them;
> The sky it seems would pour down stinking pitch,
> But that the sea mounting to the welkin's cheek,
> Dashes the fire out. O, I hav suffered
> With those that I saw suffer! A brave vessel
> Who had no doubt some noble creatures in her,
> Dashed all to pieces. O, the cry did knock
> Against my very heart! Poor souls, they perished!
> Had I been any god of power I would
> Hav sunk the sea within the earth, or e'er
> It should the good ship so hav swallowed, and
> The freighting souls within her.

Now, if Jesus, as a God, wished to demonstrate his power over the winds and the waves, surely he might hav selected an opportunity when more lives were at stake than a few favored apostles. When the London went down, heavily laden with young and hopeful emigrants, or when the Princess Alice was cut in twain by a massiv iron vessel—on such occasions as these a big miracle would hav been of undoubted utility. But when miracles are most needed, then are they most conspicuous by their absence.

But Jesus is said to hav opened the eyes of the blind. A useful miracle undoubtedly, if it were ever performed.

With no more difficult surgical operation than daubing some clay upon the sightless eyes, and calling upon the man to see, Jesus is alleged to hav wrought this change.

Jesus did not giv the man new eyes, nor supply any deficiency in the aqueous or vitreous humors.

No. He went through a singular performance with some soft clay, and, calling upon the man to receive his sight, the trick was done.

The gospel narrativ, however, itself throws grave doubt upon the genuinness of this miracle, for it goes on to declare that Jesus himself adjured the man on no account to divulge to any man the secret of how his sight had been restored.

Imagin a surgeon who, having performed a successful operation, should implore his patient to tell no man, lest his practice should increase beyond his power to cope with it! If Jesus could restore the vision of one blind man, why not of a thousand? Or, indeed, why not of all? And if it was a moral act to cure one, would it not be more moral to cure all?

It will ever appear strange to the thoughtful that, in a world governed by a good, just, and almighty being, there should be any blind persons at all. Why should a God make organs that are useless? Upon the theological hypothesis, there can be no rational answer to this question. But upon the evolution theory—the theory that organs develop by use, and decay from disuse—the explanation is easy enough. Two other miracles of Jesus may now be considered before summing up. The first was the miracle of feeding five thousand hungry persons on five loaves and two fishes—a very useful miracle of its kind—and the alleged raising of Lazarus to life.

In the feeding of five thousand, we are told that they sat down in hundreds and fifties, and that when Jesus "had looked up to heaven, and blessed and brake the loaves, he gave them to his disciples to set before them."

Now, whether the loaves expanded before leaving the hands of Jesus or after, the writer of Mark does not say. But if neither the loaves nor the fishes were increased in size, we must assume either that they were of enormous dimensions at the start, or that the people could not hav received more than a crumb of bread apiece, and a bit of fish of such infinitesimal proportions as to require the aid of the most powerful microscope in order that they might grasp it.

In my debate with the Scotch novelist Agnes Rollo Wilkie ("Was Jesus an Impostor?"), my gifted antagonist suggested an explanation which she imagined to be of a rational character. She affirmed in her grandiloquent way that Jesus did not feed the five thousand on five loaves and two fishes. Certainly not. He supplied them with something far better than that—for he "fed them with the imperishable bread of wisdom and truth." But Mrs. Wilkie did not say whether the twelve baskets of fragments which were taken up after the feast were of the same unsubstantial character.

Feeding five thousand hungry people is, without a doubt, a moral act. But feeding thousands of people who probably had food enough at home, who could easily obtain it if they chose, is scarcely so useful as supplying those who, in the time of famin, are entirely destitute of the means of existence.

The resurrection of Lazarus is regarded by Christians as the very best example of the great love of Jesus for his friend and compassion for the bereaved sisters, Martha and Mary. Looked at with the clear eye of reason, the alleged event bears a very different complexion. Jesus knew that Lazarus was going to die, yet he went away and did not return until Lazarus had been dead some days. Then, although he knew he could raise him from the dead, he came down to the grave-side and wept. Why these tears? Was Jesus sincere, or was he but enacting a wretched farce? But Jesus called Lazarus from the grave. With a "loud voice" presumably. The dead take no heed to soft voices. Jesus bade him "Come forth." Although Lazarus was "bound hand and foot with graveclothes," he managed to dextrously wriggle out of the grave.

It may hav been gratifying to Martha and Mary to hav their brother restored to them. It may hav excited wonder and admiration in the crowd who are alleged to hav witnessed the event; but it certainly was rather hard on poor Lazarus, who had suffered the agony of pain that invariably precedes the passage to the "valley of the shadow of death," to be called to life again only to endure a little later on a repetition of these sufferings. And the morality of such a miracle, viewed in this light, is very questionable.

The resurrection of Lazarus seemed to hav no perceptible effect on the people—it converted none, and Lazarus took no steps to demonstrate the genuinness of the miracle by going among the people and proclaiming the wonder that had been performed upon him.

The alleged resurrection of Jesus is a miracle into the utility of which we need not inquire, since if Jesus were God he could not die, and if he were a man he could not raise himself from the dead.

We hav seen that the miracles of Jesus were mainly of a useful character, supposing they were performed; for, with the exception of the cursing of the fig-tree, a wholly useless and silly performance, the rest of the wonders said to hav been wrought by the Nazarene were performed for distinctly desirable purposes—for ends the consummation of which meant the increase of human happiness.

But whether we are dealing with the miracles recorded in the Old or in the New Testament, whether with the wonders performed by Jahveh or by Jesus, or by less prominent "instruments," such as Moses, Joshua, or Samson, there is one fatal error running through them all. They all assume that the laws of nature are variable; that they may be changed, varied, or broken at the mere fiat of deity—a purely gratuitous assumption—to which human experience, common sense, and, above all, the great doctrin of evolution, are utterly opposed. The study of the evolution doctrin demonstrates that all the phenomena of nature are natural; that effects follow causes in a never-ending succession; that natural forces go straight to their end, mowing down whoever or whatever happens to be in the way with perfect impartiality; and that, if miracles had ever happened or were ever likely to happen, man would be the most miserable of all beings—the sport and toy of nature, or of any being that happened to be behind natural forces—for, unless the laws of nature were fixed and unalterable, he would be unable to calculate for a single instant what was likely to happen about him; he would be unable to pursue his daily avocation, but, in abject fear, stand in idleness day by day awaiting the fatal force that would deprive him of existence.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Angels.

Laurence Sterne has put it on record—in "Tristram Shandy," I think—that the recording angel one day, while making an entry in his journal, dropped a tear upon a certain word and blotted it out forever. Laurence is a bit hazy as to whether it was the tear or the word which was obliterated by the angelic weep, but, not to be too hypercritical, we will suppose it was the word. The kernel of Sterne's little incident is the consoling intelligence that angels, like teething children and defendants in breach-of-promis cases, can occasionally indulge in the luxury of a thorough good cry. From biblical sources, too, we learn that angels can peck a bit when occasion demands, for does not the venerable lady-killer who wrote the Psalms make a remark that, once on a time, "man did eat angels' food?" The "angels' food" would, I fear, hardly satisfy the epicurean of A.D. 1888, for coriander seed doesn't come within miles of roast beef and plum pudding, pâté de foie gras, or ham boiled in champagne. Still, it was "grub" of a sort, and the fact that it constitutes the angelic menu ought to be a sufficient barricade to the caviling of the "scoffer." Thus far we hav learned that angels can weep and, if needs be, utilize their masticators—if they hav any. Besides this, it is on record that an angel has before now shut the mouths of a few refractory lions, and that his brother and sister angels hav driven chariots and blown trumpets, while it is distinctly stated that one of their number was, on one occasion, by no means averse to taking the brag out of Jacob by a pretty little maneuver of the early days of the prize-ring. Further, we hav it on the authority of Campbell, in his "Pleasures of Hope," that angels can blush if necessary, and that they are also capable of paying visits at intervals few and far between. Here, then, is a whole pile of angelic possibilities—they can eat, weep, muzzle lions, tool chariots, cornetize, wrestle, blush, and pay afternoon calls—and yet, with all our knowledge of angelic characteristics, there isn't one of us would recognize a heavenly messenger if we met him in the street to morrow, if he had taken the precaution to discard his wings and white surplice for an orthodox black coat and stovepipe hat. Such is fame!

But do angels wear a $20 suit of surplice and a pair of wings as their ordinary work-a-day apparel? Or is it only when they step into cheap engravings and carry a little boy through the roof, while the same little boy, wrapped in "the dreamless draperies of eternal peace," lies in his little cot below? Or do they really dress up for the occasion when they visit a sleeping seamstress and finish her work for her as she slumbers? And how do they get their surplices on over their wings? And how—— But there, if I go on with conundrums of this sort you will think I want to play at being a member of a Christy minstrel troupe, instead of concentrating my attention on the subject in hand. Still, angelic costume is really a matter of a good deal of speculativ interest. Father Henriques, the Jesuit, was of opinion that angels were in the habit of cavorting around in the dress peculiar to the female portion of the community. It is only fair, however, to the good old Jesuit to suppose that, had he lived a century or two later, and been present at an "at home," "reception," or ball of our own day, he would probably hav qualified his opinion on angels' dress. The good father further believed that the heavenly messengers wore their hair curled, affected waistcoats, farthingales, and such-like human vanities, and that up in heaven there were plenty of beautiful baths, where the angels swam about like celestial gold-fish; and enlivened the Beckwithian performance by singing "melodious madrigals." To the intelligent readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER—one can hardly imagin an *un*intelligent reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER—Father Henriques's idea of the dress and doings of the inhabitants of heaven must appear quaint, to say the least of it. Yet, after all, is there anything more than a difference of degree between the quaint ideas of the author of "The Business of the Saints in Heaven" and the popular superstitions of A.D. 1888? Is the idea of a farthingaled fish singing a merry madrigal so very much more ridiculous than that of a feathered lady blowing a horn?

The idea of wings forming a portion of an angel's traveling impedimenta has probably arisen from the early accepted notion that angels liv in "the sky"—whatever that may mean—and that, as "the sky" seems scarcely solid enough to lay a tram-line on, it was probably imagined by our early ancestors, who had no knowledge of ballooning, that some propelling power was necessary for the conveyance of the "guardian spirits" from place to place. In early days folks were in the habit of limiting their ideas of the unknowable to their acquaintance with the knowable. Birds, they reasoned, were the only animals which could utilize the atmosphere for traveling purposes. To so utilize it they required wings; ergo, angels must hav wings. And so the old myth has come down through the ages. Famous painters hav pandered to the superstition, and daubed their angels after the conception of early man. Andrea Orcagna, in his fresco at Pisa, painted his angels as prettily colored birds, whose heads were heads of beautiful women; while he made his devils, as per the stereotyped idea, in the forms of beasts and snakes. Old Saxon artists clothed their "guardian spirits" in shirts and undershirts, a far more sensible notion than that usually adopted by would-be "great" masters. In literature, as in art, the changes hav been so constantly rung on the ideal angel that the popular mind—though it would probably deny the soft impeachment if challenged in black and white—actually accepts ideality for reality, and tutors the juvenil intellect to believe in the feathered lady who hovers over the cot. Milton's angels were an angry, forbidding crowd; Longfellow's were decent souls, if we take the one mixed up with Rabbi Ben Levi as a sample. Yet both Milton and Longfellow hav helped not a little to fix in the popular mind a myth as a reality. In our churches to-day the same idea covers all the available stained glass of the establishment. Good, sensible church-going people, of course, would laugh at you if you suggested that the angelic pictures were anything more than poetic representations. But, all the same, there isn't a mother's son of them would like to be shut up in a church for a night with nothing to engage his attention but the feathered folk on the stained-glass window.

Of course, as good Christians, you and I, dear reader, expect to become angels some day or other, though I am sorry to say that most of us don't seem to care how long that day may be in coming. All the same, however, there is no earthly necessity for our aspirations to be damped by the prospect of wings and coriander seed. We can still be good Christians, and still believe in, or, more correctly, wish for, a happy hereafter, without tacking on to it absurd costumes and occupations. It is not absolutely compulsory for us to believe either in a devil with a tail or in an angel with ærial propellors.

When two-legged man was a very little boy, he believed that the spirit when it left the body departed into some far-off isle of the blessed, and enjoyed to a fuller extent all that made life worth living here. Whether man's pleasures were coarse or otherwise, he expected to enjoy them tenfold, and he created his gods and his heaven to suit his own uneducated taste. Man has grown up now—to a certain extent—yet he still holds to the material hereafter with a perseverance worthy of a better cause. Let us, by all means, stick as long as we can to the hope of meeting those we hav "loved long since and lost awhile." It is a hope which, whether reasonable or not, will lead us on to higher and better and purer life here; but now that we hav banished our witches and men in the moon and churchyard ghosts, the time has surely arrived when bodiless cherubim and golden-haired ladies may be relegated to the oblivion of rejected myth.

Here endeth my sermon on Angels—written entirely in the interests of Christianity. Ahem!

WHYTE TIGHE.

The Present Cloud.

The so called civilized world speak of "the Dark Ages," as though they thought that the present age with them was as clear as the sun in a cloudless sky.

If we had all been without eyes from the beginning our sense of perfect joy would hav been fully realized upon the most dim and misty vision of Nature and our surroundings.

What do we mean when we speak of the Dark Ages?

Do we not mean the time when the world was not allowed to think, but was compelled by law to use the brain of one man, the head of the Christian church?

Why are we not to-day in the same darkness?

All will say, because of that great hero Martin Luther. He broke the shackles that bound the world to the dogmas of the pope at Rome. All must admit that what we call the Reformation was the coming from darkness to light by the appeal of Martin Luther to the reason of mankind. But I ask: Are we yet out of the darkness? Luther only started us toward the light.

Must we stop and say because Luther was a great and brave man that there is nothing better? Must we say that a man that lived three hundred years ago has done all the thinking we need? Was it enough of astronomy when Bruno said there was a plurality of worlds? Was it enough of electricity when Morse proved it a means of communication? Is it enough of light that it enables us to see each other? or of water that we quench our thirst?

Because Martin Luther discovered that the pope at Rome was not infallible, and denied his authority, must we stop there and deny the right to all others to think on this subject of Christianity?

We are told that we must not use our reason; that we must believe by faith alone.

That is just what the pope at Rome said. But Martin Luther gave light to the world through reason, which we call the Reformation, and our greatest joy.

My Christian friend, hav you not a right to think as much as Martin Luther? Can you not see that the world moves by thought? Can you deny me the right to question the justice of Christ's suffering on the cross for my sins?

Your answer is: There is no justice in it, but it had to be to fill the law of God.

Was it moral or reasonable?

No, you say, but we must accept it, because it is the law of God.

The pope at Rome said the same thing to Martin Luther.

The pope said to Luther: "I command you by the power sent me direct from Jesus Christ through St. Peter, his chosen apostle, in whose name I carry the keys to the kingdom of heaven, and whosoever I shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, to stop this talk about me and my business."

Did Martin Luther stop his talk? No. He had a thought, and persisted in telling it to the world.

Shall we stop thinking, because Martin Luther three hundred years ago had a good thought? Is this the end and aim of the Christian religion?

Must the Christian religion mean now, in this nineteenth century, the same as it did in the fifteenth century—the end of progress? If so, why do we glory in the work of Luther? Hav not we the right to think as Luther did?

Hav we not as much right to question the ideas of Luther as he had to question the pope at Rome? Why, in this enlightened age, will our sense allow a priest to stand before the people and say that faith is better than reason? Why should our sense allow a man to stand before the public and proclaim that Jesus Christ died that we might hav a future life?

Even if the Bible is the word of God, it is plain that it never was intended to teach us of a future life.

The old Bible does not say anything of it, and Jesus Christ seldom spoke of it.

The blood shed under the Jewish law was only to satisfy an angry God. Abraham never had a promis of a future life, even for the giving of his only begotten son to God.

Is it reasonable to think of a law that was not known to the Jews as coming from God, while Christ always said: "To the Jew first and after that to the gentiles."

Is it not plain that this future life is of modern birth, for the purpose of establishing the Christian church?

Is it not a fact that all that exists in any church worth anything is embodied in morality?

Is it right to teach our children of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, while we know the thought to be immoral, unjust, and unreasonable? If it was to fill a law of God, why did not he tell the Jews of a future life?

Is it not plain to all Bible readers that this story was got up as a scheme to establish the church?

My Christian friends, allow no man or priest to tell you that faith is better than reason. Follow the example of Luther. The church told him the same thing. Will you persist in doing what you honor him for not having done?

This is an age of rapid progress. Thought and reason hav been partly let free and the cloud is slowly passing.

W. H. PENFIELD.

Some Contrasts.

I hav before me the War Cry, a Salvation Army paper which some one was kind enough to send me, the sender no doubt thinking that I was much in need of salvation. While I am not disposed to accept their offers of "salvation without money and without price," yet, whoever the person is that sent me the paper, he has my thanks, for it furnished me something to think about—furnished me something to contrast with the indifference of Freethinkers.

The War Cry is filled with reports of their meetings from New York to the Pacific ocean. I particularly noticed the "Wisconsin Division." Means can be furnished these fanatical bigots to travel all over our state shouting their crazy religion in numerous and important towns, beating drums and blowing horns for Christ's sake. The towns that hav been blessed with a call from the Salvationists are Beloit, Brodhead, Evansville, Monroe, Browntown, Chippewa Falls, Eau Claire, and Ashland.

The first sentence of the report from Ashland is: "The Salvation Army just suits Ashland." If this be true, then Ashland must be allowed the privilege of having just as much salvation as it wants.

Is it really possible that ninety-nine of every hundred people must be fed upon the marvelous—is it possible that even in this age of learning and science superstition is more congenial to the mind of the average man than Rationalism? I can not help contrasting the successful efforts of the most irrational religionists with the unsuccessful attempts of Liberal lecturers to secure engagements on the most generous terms. A Freethinker may write a hundred letters for engagements to lecture, and, business-like, inclose stamps for reply, and if he gets answers to one-fifth of his letters he is quite fortunate indeed.

Another publication lying on my writing table is the "Methodist Year Book," 1888, in which I find generous, magnificent sums given for the purpose of spreading the religion of "believe or be damned" among the heathen and unbelievers in Methodism. Their sums apportioned for missionary purposes, foreign and domestic, foot up the grand total of $1,201,819. And this great sum is raised and expended by the Methodist church alone in one year. I find, too, that $10,000 is appropriated for missionary purposes in the heathen state of Wisconsin. What an unfavorable contrast these figures make with the reports of the funds raised and disbursed by the American Secular Union! Why is it that a religious organization can be so generously sustained and a Liberal organization be allowed to perish for lack of finances? Is it that there are principles in Christianity that are more enduring and more to be commended than in Liberalism? Or is it that Christians are more earnest and sincere than Liberals Or is it that Christians as a class are generous and free to giv and that Liberals are niggardly and mean?

No, it is none of these reasons.

Liberals as a class are generous and free—hold to their principles as honestly as Christians do to theirs. True, there are many half-hearted Liberals who care nothing for the ignorance and bigotry of the world There are also too many Liberals who are intimidated by Mother Grundy. So there are Christians who are careless and indifferent—who are thoroughly selfish.

What then is the difference between orthodox success and the abortiv efforts of Freethought? If we study the history of any religion, or any Secular movement, we will see how little its success depends upon the nature of its doctrins, and how much success depends upon effectiv organization. If Liberals wish to succeed—if we wish to get a respectful hearing—we must organize to accomplish our purpose. There are sufficient numbers of Liberals in almos every town to hav an organization and well-conducted meetings. Then we would be as respectable as any of the churches. In this way we would command the respect of our opponents, and the petty persecutions of the church would cease.

Pittsville, Wis. GEO. H. DAWES.

A Christian Giv-Away.

In the Commercial of August 18th appears an extract from the Contemporary Review, from an article called "The Future of Religion," in which occurs the following remarkable passage:

> An Atheist, if he argues consistently, will not expose his life to defend either his country or his fellow-man; for, if all really dies with the body, why should he sacrifice that by which he enjoys all the rest? Abnegation such as this would be absolute folly, and the sacrifice complete trickery. The denial of the spirituality of the soul uproots all reasonable motivs for being just and honest. If I can enrich myself and escape the penal code, why should I not do so? The blaze of gold soon makes men forget a slur on the moral character. I see no good reason for abstaining from any indelicacy of conduct, from an abuse of another's confidence, or even from theft, if all this may go unpunished and be profitable to myself. Apart from religion, what influence is there to encourage good and withstand evil propensities?

Can there be a more glaring illustration of the deadening moral effect of Christian teaching than this?

Note the opacity of moral perception which prevents the writer from even seeing his own self-condemnation through his own words.

This is about the "freshest," the most naïf giv-away of the gospel system that can be found anywhere.

Without some selfish motiv of direct personal interest, he says, there is nothing in patriotism and right to induce their practice.

If he were an Atheist, he would lie, rob, seduce, murder, and betray his country because he would hav no expectation of being paid for not doing so.

Why! love of offspring, love of his master, will cause even a beast to risk and also sacrifice his life.

Here, Freethinkers, is your opportunity. You are forever being twitted with being negativ, with pulling down. Let it be shown that the true believers, who believe in the power of goodness over man for its own sake, can do more to raise man than the real infidels who are utterly devoid of confidence in the noble's being in any way, in itself, preferable to the base.

Liberal or Secular.

We hav found in the Investigator during the past few weeks an animated and ardent discussion as to whether the word Liberal or Secular best described the work of the American Secular Union. Mr. Seaver and most of his correspondents seem to favor the word Liberal because Secular "may refer to trade, commerce, politics, shops, manufactures, or anything else; but Liberal relates to mental reform, to free thought, free speech, opposition to bigotry, priestcraft, and every species of tyranny over the mind of man."

The writers of these kinds of reasons seem to forget that Liberal is used in politics in England and Canada, and means not at all what Freethinkers mean when they call themselvs Liberal. In fact, the Liberal party of England is exceedingly il-Liberal toward Infidels. So when we say in this country that such a party has adopted a Liberal policy, it does not follow that it has adopted the policy of the Liberals. Again, the word is used to denote a heretical portion of the church people—pale phantoms eternally suspended between heaven and earth—"Liberal Christians." On the other hand, the word Secular always means, of this world and its affairs, and must necessarily exclude the other world, and is consequently opposed to Christianity or any other-world religion. Of course, it expresses no opinion as to the truth or falsity of other-world religions, but simply denotes that he who is a Secularist is attending to this world and separating its affairs from the other. Under a secular government, no union of church and state is possible.

Moreover, there is a broader ground in favor of the word Secular in describing the Union formed to enforce the Nine Demands. Mr. Putnam, president of the Union, states them admirably in a communication which Brother Seaver prints in the Investigator. He points out:

"The reason for the name is found in the Nine Demands of Liberalism, wherein it is stated that the supreme purpose of the Union is the establishment of a 'purely secular government' in the American republic. The word Secular in this case is thoroughly plain in its meaning. It means a total separation of church and state. There is no other word that means this exactly.

"'Liberal' does not mean it. 'Infidel' does not mean it. 'Freethought' does not mean it—that is, exclusivly. These terms are general terms, and include Secularism, though not necessarily; and if they include that, they also include many other things, and therefore they are not defining words of the intent and sole intent of the American Secular Union. This Union is organized for a particular purpose—not a general purpose—as were the old antislavery societies. It proposes to do one thing, and only one thing, and when this one thing is accomplished the function of the Secular Union is over. It has no need of further existence as an organization.

"Liberalism, in its broad and deep meaning, is something far more than this. It includes the whole of life and thought, and its universal aims are as lasting as the human race. It has a mightier function outside of the state than in it, in the development and education of humanity in every realm of mental, moral, and social activity. It is a general, all-comprehensiv word, and for that very reason is not the word we want. We want a particular word, a defining word, a business word, a word that shows just what the organization means—no more, no less. We want a specific term, not a generic. No one organization can include the whole of Liberalism. Specialization is the law of progress, and thus is the law of Liberalism. It must hav many instrumentalities for its growth, and the American Secular Union is one of these instruments. The attempt to combine Liberalism into one vast organization would be a stupendous failure. This is the curse of the church—that it tries to do too many things, to include the whole of life. The only way for the church to save itself, in the vastness of modern civilization, is to specialize its efforts, confine itself to a few things.

"So with the American Secular Union. It must be a special organization, not a general organization. It represents the concentration of Liberalism upon one point, and the word Secular expresses the concentration and the meaning of the concentration, and therefore it becomes a grand rallying cry like the cry, 'On to Richmond!' That did not mean everything to the cause of the American republic, but it meant a mighty advance to the universal victory. A secular government is not all. Grander ideals are in the future, but it represents a tremendous gain."

The difference may also be stated in another way. Liberal means our religion, or professions as to religious belief. Secular means our politics, or political objects. And as the Union is formed for political work, Secular is obviously a better word to describe the organization. If we say we desire a Liberal government, no one knows just what we want. Liberal may mean liberal in expenditures, liberal, or broad, in policy, or liberal in law-making. Secular government, however, always means, and is so understood, a government without church entanglements or religious bias. The word Liberal, therefore, conceals our political objects, while Secular defines them boldly.

But unless the Union is supported a little more unitedly, enthusiastically, and Liberally in the future than in the immediate past, it will not make much difference as to the name. The organization will lapse back into that state of helpless desuetude in which it was found by the annual Congress at Cassadaga.

An English Institution.

In England, as is well known, there still linger, amid all the wealth of knowledge and intelligence of thought that we hav secured for our age, certain fragmentary remains of ancient superstitions that used to flourish strangely and balefully among old and semi-civilized peoples. These remnants of superstition, it also appears, are not to be observed in a great part of the population; and in the portion where they are found they present varying degrees of harmfulness and intensity.

Indeed, the particular supernaturalism fallen to the English is of a nature so antagonistic to human welfare—so incomparably more ruinous and deadly than any other on the wide earth—so opposed to nature, inimical to reason, incompatible with peace, obstructiv to progress, and fatal to health and to life itself—that obviously the attainments and advancement of that people could hav been made possible only by an ignoring of all its essential principles and a limitation of its duties by most to a mere mechanical routine of ceremonies and unmeaning forms. This is the course that the masses, thanks to their nearness to nature and a bit of leavening common sense, hav followed.

A considerable portion of the professed adherents of the irrationality seem almost totally uninfluenced by it in their conduct of life. Its formulas repeated, its genuflexions made, its payments placed in the right hands, they are seen proceeding to their vocations, their civil affairs, their investigations and works of utility, substantially unimpeded and unpoisoned by the fixed averments and noxious fantasies of their creed.

Another portion of the followers of the faith are evidently more under its dominion. They devote some money and effort to its advance, regulate their acquaintance by it, and endeavor, with the usual unfortunate effects, to adjust to it some of the functions of their daily life.

Still others present a more deplorable aspect of the aberration. Its singular antinatural impulses seem engrafted into their natures, by early training, to a great depth, and they exhibit a lamentable diminution of that openness to new thought and conviction so necessary to progress.

Yet, through all these classes, there is much of healthful recognition of rational principle, much of liberality of conduct, of amenability to reason, of wholesome holding by nature and the known, of love of progress and the right. With that strange but fortunate faculty of mankind for honestly holding in words and profession a formal belief and at the same time unconsciously regulating their conduct upon principles absolutely interdicted by that belief, all of these classes, even the backward and bigoted class last enumerated, hav, though with slow and painful surmounting of traditional and supernatural obstacles, yet made a considerable and distinct advance in civilization. The truth is, there is in nearly all of them a tacit recognition of the pernicious and impracticable nature of their creed. Though unconscious to its exhibitors, and though they would indignantly deny its existence, this recognition, this admission of the folly and evil of their faith, is evident in their every act. Recognizing, then, as they do, in their tacit, practical way—by the kind of double consciousness mentioned—the folly and mischief of their creed, the people, it might reasonably be supposed, would instantly unite to suppress as insane and perilous a class even more deeply sunk into groveling superstition than any of their own number—more incased and hardened against social change, more bitter and malignant toward free inquiry and popular rights, more determined in reactionary measures and class rule and venomously hostil to progress and science. At least, it might confidently be presumed that the people, if by their principles prevented from disarming by political disability such dangerous foes of the state, would concentrate upon them a storm of contempt, and brand them as among the lowest and most reprobate of mankind.

Well, there is in England just such a class. Let us see what it is, and then what the people do with it.

Beyond the many who adhere to Christianity in name but practice few of its precepts and enter willingly any liberal and rational reform; beyond the numbers who furnish attendance and money at churches and are mildly shocked at aught heretical; beyond the more devoted supporters who bend with energy to their work, but though blinded and misguided retain some conscience and justice—beyond all these, there is in England a class of Christians irremovably rooted in fixed opinions received from barbaric ages; utterly devoid of principle; uniformly antagonizing every innovation; influencing and intriguing against every move for liberty either political or religious; invariably bent upon thwarting education and enlightenment; unfailingly abetting governmental injustice and tyranny; conscienceless and sycophantic, insidious and deceiving, hypocritical and tyrannical, corrupt and dangerous; oppressors of all that is manly and free, maintainers of ignorance and its pain, foes to every condition that can bring forth intelligence and joy.

What do the people do with such a class?

They constitute it a governing house of legislature for the realm. It is called the House of Bishops.

It may be said: But do the bishops really vote and intrigue in the directions charged? Let us review the history of the Established church and House of Bishops and see.

Commencing from the Reformation, the Anglican church, through the whole of the struggles for constitutional liberty against kingly despotism, exerted in every period and every conflict the whole of its tremendous power for the maintenance of tyranny and wrong. Every history of every reign tells this; it is a matter of common ascertainment and overwhelming proof, and though the duplicity of the church still diverts from it the attention of the uninformed masses, it is as household words to every scholar in the world.

When Charles I. attempted to convert the monarchy into a despotism, the church gave him its constant and enthusiastic support.

When after the Restoration the current of opinion set in against all liberal opinions, the church directed the stream, allied herself in the closest union with a court of unexampled corruption, and exhausted her anathemas, not upon the tyranny and extortion surrounding her, but upon the patriotic principles of Hampden and his friends.

Through the continual encroachments of the Stuarts on the people's liberties, she maintained the same course.

The University of Oxford solemnly condemned the democratic writings of Buchanan and others, and proclaimed it unlawful "on any pretense whatever to take up arms against the king."

During the reign of William the whole energies of the church were directed to the subversion of the constitutional liberty that was then firmly established.

Through the movement against public rights under Queen Anne, through the still stronger movement under George III., the same spirit shaped all her acts.

Of all supporting the wars against America and against the French Revolution, the Anglican clergy were the most ardent. From first to last their conduct was the same, and every victory of liberty was their defeat.

For the space of two hundred years there flowed from the Christian dignitaries a stream of volumes inculcating support of whatever monarchy was in power, and denouncing upon all reformers the flames of hell. Everywhere the priest called down the wrath of his God on opponents to the king, and everywhere was the scripture cited as proof and warning. That no tyranny, however gross, that no violation of the constitution, however flagrant, can justify resistance; that all those principles concerning the rights of peoples on which constitutional government is based are false, and all those efforts of resistance by which constitutional government is achieved are deadly sins, was her emphatic and unchanging teaching. "Heaven," said the "Homily on Willful Rebellion," "is the place of good, obedient subjects, and hell the prison and dungeon of rebels against God and their prince." "We may not in any wise," said the "Homily on Obedience," "withstand violently or rebel against rulers, or make any insurrection, sedition, or tumults, either by force of arms or otherwise, against the anointed of the Lord." Jeremy Taylor and Ussher vied in denouncing the man "who can think it lawful to fight against the supreme power of his nation." Berkeley attempted ("Discourse on Passiv Obedience") to show that obedience to royalty was ordained by the law of nature.

During all these generations there were just two instances of the church's taking an attitude of opposition to royalty. Who needs to be told the cause of these departures from her course? When her own dignity and property were touched by James, she suddenly forgot her teachings of submission; when Mary threatened persecution, she rose in convulsions of rage, sowing sedition and advocating tyrannicide ("A Short Treatis of Politique Power," by the bishop of Winchester, 1558).

Now let us examin the votes of the House of Bishops in our own time. And let it be remembered that though in its now weakening condition this House has no direct legislativ power save in so far as what its convocations agree upon may be made the subject of an act of Parliament, these convocations, as is testified by the Encyclopedia Britannica, hav by influence and as "spiritual advisers" in many instances procured their determinations to become the law of the land.

In 1810 they procured the defeat of the bill abolishing capital punishment for stealing from shops property of the value of five shillings.

In 1807 they procured the defeat of the appointment of a Privy Council committee to forward the education of the people.

In 1833 they procured the defeat of the bill rendering Jews eligible to sit in Parliament.

In 1834 they procured the defeat of the bill admitting Dissenters to the Universities.

In 1839 they procured the defeat of the national education bill.

In 1867 and 1869 they procured the defeat of the bill abolishing ecclesiastical tests preventing Nonconformists from enjoying the rights and privileges of the Universities.

In 1860, 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1865 they procured the defeat of the Qualification for Offices Abolition bill, which abrogated the declaration "not to exercise power, authority, or influence, possessed in virtue of any office, to interfere with or weaken the Protestant church as it is by law established in England, or to disturb said church, or the bishops and clergy of the said church, in the possession of any rights or privileges to which the said church and the said bishops and clergy are or may be by law entitled."

In 1876, and three times in 1877, they procured the defeat of the bill permitting in churchyards "Christian and orderly" funeral services other than those of the Church of England.

In 1883 they twice procured the defeat of the bill allowing a man to marry his deceased wife's sister.

"The Church of England," says Macaulay, "continued to be for more than one hundred and fifty years the servil handmaid of monarchy, the steady enemy of public liberty. The divine right of kings and the duty of passivly obeying all their commands were her favorit tenets." "Anglicanism," says Lecky, "was from the beginning at once the most servil and the most efficient agent of tyranny. In all those fiery trials which English liberty has passed since the Reformation, she invariably cast her influence into the scale of tyranny, supported and eulogized every attempt to violate the constitution, and wrote the fearful sentence of eternal condemnation upon the tombs of the martyrs of freedom." "Every inch of ground," says Samuel Morley, "toward the religious liberty now enjoyed in these kingdoms, has been won by hard fighting against prelates, clergy, and against the powerful landed aristocracy, whose pliant servants the former hav always been." "Hav we found Bishops," asks Joseph Hume, "standing between the government and the people to prevent the exercise of arbitrary power? No; they hav been aiders and abettors of every tyranny and oppression which the people hav been compelled to endure. When did they rise to oppose an act intended to abridge liberty? They hav always been the political tools of a designing ministry, and ready to sacrifice every principle in the support of arbitrary power."

This, the Anglican church, headed and managed by these bishops, is the institution to which the people of Great Britain in their wisdom annually pay through their government, according to the total estimates of the Financial Reform Association, the sum of nine million five hundred thousand pounds, or over forty-five million dollars.

Mr. Everett and the Knights of Labor.

It seems that at last Arthur C. Everett will be able to get his case against the Knights of Labor of Indiana taken up and investigated, though it will be strange if justice shall be finally done him.

The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will remember the circumstances connected with the trouble, related in detail in these columns months ago, but now being for the first time noticed by the general press. Mr. Everett objected to the use of the Bible in the lodge room, on the ground that the order is secular and composed of both Infidels and Christians. The Bible was retained, the Christians being in the majority, and an appeal from Mr. Everett to Mr. Powderly produced no good effects.

Mr. Everett was perhaps the most earnest and enthusiastic worker in the cause of labor in Wabash, and he began the publication of a little journal in the interests of the order. But he is also an indefatigable Freethought advocate, and the official presence of the Bible in the lodge room was excessivly distasteful to him. In his paper he each week protested, and published besides heretical editorials and communications. The Knights resented this, and tried to force him to stop. As he would not stop under threats they tried bribery, offering to buy him a new press if he would join the Methodist church and cease printing Freethought articles in connection with labor intelligence. His refusal to listen to these overtures was followed by threats and persecution on the part of the Knights. He was stoned as he sat upon the porch in front of his residence. He was threatened with tar and feathers, and assured that his type would be dumped into the streets. They made it so hot for him that he moved to Mt. Vernon, Ind. They followed him there with the boycott, writing to the prosecuting attorney there that they were going not only to ruin his business, but to drive him out of the state. He did go to Grand Rapids, Mich., but failing to support himself returned to his old home at Wabash, where he livs in constant fear, not daring to venture upon the streets at night, and unable to obtain employment, as all are afraid that the Knights will boycott them if they giv the heretic work.

The matter will be taken by Mr. Everett to the state assembly of Knights, soon to convene. Mr. Powderly, to whom Mr. Everett has written several times asking to hav the trouble adjusted, has at last got off his knees before Cardinal Gibbons long enough to write: "If the case stands as reported by you, then a wrong has been done. I will cause an investigation to be made. You will hear from me later on."

The Louisville Courier-Journal says that Mr. Everett is in a bad way financially, with no money, few personal friends, and unable to get a day's work whereby he could earn even a few dollars. He is in pressing need, and suffering because the meek and lowly followers of Jesus hav so much love of God in their hearts that there is no room for justice and decency.

That the investigation will help Mr. Everett, we hav doubts. Powderly is too closely pressed under the thumb of Cardinal Gibbons to do justice to an Infidel; but whether the boycott is removed or not, the public agitation of the injustice will tend to prevent other like instances.

The Thievery of Credit.

A good many thoughts are suggested by the following paragraph in a recent issue of the San Francisco Freethought:

"Those were queer ceremonies that attended the transfer of the Lick Observatory to the State University of California at Berkeley last week. In the first place there was prayer, and afterward Professor LeConte, in accepting the gift on behalf of the board of regents, defended the study of astronomy on the ground that it is an investigation into the "modes of the divine intelligence." His address, as reported, was as much an exhortation to piety as to the study of science. In consideration of the fact that James Lick was a Freethinker, and made this contribution to science because he believed that science would be the death of superstition, it is to be deeply regretted that the ceremonies could not hav been secular, even if the orators of the occasion had not generosity enough to pay to Freethought the tribute which was its due."

In a few years we shall probably be told that James Lick left his magnificent bequest for the sole purpose of aiding Christianity. Like Girard College, the ghouls will steal the institution and use it to propagate the very superstition that the founder most heartily detested.

But it will be only one more instance of the church's claiming the credit for a good work which she strenuously opposed, and approved only when she was forced to or found there was money in it which she could steal and put to her own uses.

Editorial Notes.

THE ghost of Thomas Paine is said to be wandering around New Rochelle, and occasionally visiting this city. The story goes around New Rochelle that the ghost flits around the Mount Paine milk farm every twenty-four hours. It is, however, a circumstance worthy of note that it has not visited any of Paine's admirers, but is seen only by the Christians.

THERE are some pious people whose zeal outruns their discretion. Of such appears to be Dr. Arnold, proprietor of a music school in Chicago, who was fined $10 by a justice of the peace, on a charge of assault and battery committed on a young lady pupil for refusal to attend prayers in the parlor. Dr. Arnold's militant religious zeal will yet get him into trouble, though it is by no means certain that it will get him into heaven.

THE Northern Weekly Leader, England, says of Mr. Bradlaugh's explanation to his Northampton constituents of his course on the Oaths bill: "The address was a masterpiece and model of political sincerity. It was something more than that, however—it was a conclusiv vindication of the course which he has adopted in the House of Commons with regard to the Oaths bill. The fate of that measure depended, as he explained to his audience, on his being able to secure a majority for it in face of a Government which was really hostil, and of an Opposition which by itself was powerless. It says much for Mr. Bradlaugh's management that under such circumstances he has saved the bill in principle and in effect. On Wednesday Northampton Liberals showed that they know when they are well off." While not wishing to detract from Mr. Bradlaugh's reputation as a bold and skilful leader, we cannot see how the true secular principle of government is preserved when a man has to say a word about religion, either negativly or affirmativly, before performing a public duty. If the bill is accepted as the best that can be done at present, as a compromise unwillingly entered into by the Infidels, then its passage is a question of opportunism to be determined by the necessities of the oppressed.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Kent, O., Secular Union will hold a mass meeting on the Old Pioneer Grounds, Kent, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, September 1st, 2d, and 3d, two sessions each day at 2 o'clock and 7:30 P.M. The evening meetings will be held in Kent's Hall. Miss Voltairine de Cleyre is engaged to unveil convent life, and J. H. Burnham to compare constructiv Secularism with other systems of morality. There will be both vocal and instrumental music at each meeting. The admission is free. All people in that vicinity and other vicinities are cordially invited to attend.

GEORGE H. DAWES will lecture at Deuster, Wis., September 9th; at New Lisbon, Wis., September 10th, and at Merrilon, Wis., September 12th. All the Freethinkers in the vicinity should go and hear him, and take their Christian neighbors along.

Letters from Friends.

GENESEO, ILL., Aug. 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I understand a good Liberal of Orion, Ill., had the misfortune to lose one of his children, and that he had an orthodox minister to preach his funeral. I thought perhaps he did not know where he could get a Liberal to speak a few kind words in the dark hour of his trouble and that that was the reason he had to do as he did.

The lady who informed me seemed to think, even boasted, that Liberals under such circumstances would come to the preachers or the Bible for consolation. I regret to hear our brother Liberal would or did hav anything to do in that way with orthodox ministers. Now, I hope you or some of the TRUTH SEEKER family will tell all Liberals where they can procure a Liberal speaker, in case his or her services are needed. Many good wishes for you and all the TRUTH SEEKER family.

AUBURN, N. Y., Aug. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: If your rules will admit, please giv in your paper the purport or substance of the following:

Rev. J. H. Harter, of Auburn, N. Y., who has for weeks been confined to his bed from severe and painful illness, will, on the 31st of August, 1888, celebrate the fortieth anniversary of his ordination as an evangelist, the sermon on that occasion being preached in Herkimer, N. Y. (his nativ town), by Rev. Dolphus Skinner, then of Utica, N. Y., but now in spirit life, the text being, "Go preach the gospel to every creature." As far as able Mr. Harter has done so, almost without money and without price. And now, in his disabled condition, he humbly asks his friends, "divine fragments" and "divine helpers," to lift up, in his behalf, holy, financial, substantial prayers, of deeds rather than words, on the 31st of August, 1888, and forward the result to him or to Mrs. J. H. Harter, at Auburn, N. Y., as soon as convenient after the prayers hav taken a materialized form, in the shape of provisions, greenbacks, silver, or gold.

J. H. HARTER.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Aug. 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: From present indications it would seem that Freethought in Utah is on the eve of a veritable boom. Never before in the history of our territory hav the prospects seemed so flattering for the Liberal cause.

The lecture season will be opened on the 26th of the present month by S. P. Putnam, who is a thorough organizer, a deep thinker, and a polished speaker, who always commands the respect of his auditors be they Radical or otherwise. He lectures in other parts of the territory before going East.

Mr. C. B. Reynolds follows, commencing the last of September and will hold the boards for four weeks, giving four lectures in this city. Of Mr. Reynolds we know but little; he seems to be meeting with marked success on his present lecture tour.

The executiv committee hav completed arrangements with B. F. Underwood for a course of twelve lectures, commencing January 6th.

Mr. Chas. Watts has signified his willingness to giv a like number of lectures immediately after the conclusion of Mr. Underwood's engagement, and the committee hav accepted his proposition.

The scholarly attainments, gentlemanly deportment, and refined and polished manners of these lecturers will contrast pleasantly with the buffoonery that has characterized our lectures of late. We may look for splendid results in the near future. B.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Aug. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am afraid Jennie Doan did not quite catch my meaning concerning the great paintings produced by or through mediums. I did not mean that no medium had painted good pictures, but meant that none had yet painted any that had made the impression upon the eye that those of Rubens, the great Flemish painter of some two hundred and forty-eight years ago, did, or those of the Dutch painter Rembrandt, who died two hundred and nineteen years ago. Now, if these dead painters, with all the accumulated aids of life in the summerland, and the study and practice of over two hundred years more upon them, should giv us pictures through a medium, they ought to far excel anything ever done by mere mortal skill, and make a world-wide reputation for themselvs—in fine, to be so superlativly excellent as to create a furor in art circles beyond anything we can possibly conceive of.

Clairvoyant doctors may diagnose diseases and cure them, but where are the millions of remarkable cures that should startle the world, and find place in all medical works—cures excelling all that could be done by a doctor who has only had seventy or eighty years of study and practice here on earth?

Several hundred years over there, spent in such superior schools, should giv us remedial appliances such as would confound, startle, and convince the most skeptical. It is not miracle that I ask, but simply the results of hundreds of years of study and practice, as it would naturally crop out in the work of the greatest doctors of the past, could they still be students and practitioners, and giv us the results and experiences thus gathered.

I do not wish to seem stubborn or bigoted, but I do want facts and realities just as they are—just as they would be did death end all, or not end all.

What really is, I desire to know. I feel a warm friendliness for all true believers, and if I could reconcile it with right would gladly let them enjoy even what I believe to be delusions and dreams. But, somehow, it seems wrong to me to let a single chance pass by of correcting an error or pointing a truth.

So, kindly yet earnestly, I giv my best and liv my best, hoping truth will win and happiness be the outcome.

Let us gather up the sunbeams
Lying all around our path,
Let us keep the wheat and roses,
Casting out the thorns and chaff.
Let us find out sweetest comfort
In the blessings of to-day,
With a patient hand removing
All the briars from the way.

MR. EDITOR: Could not some of your folks—or our folks—compile a list of Freethinkers, and what they hav done for the world and society—Freethinkers who hav been prominent in the various reforms—educational, temperance, anti-slavery, hygienic, sanitary, social, political, etc.? I am under the impression that the progress being made by humanity is due primarily to Freethought, while Christians claim all honors.

Bennett's great work, "Champions of the Church," and its companion, are out of the reach of many of us. The information we want might be given by some young person in need of practice who has access to biographical works, and not take much editorial time. It would be very handy to fire at the goody-goody people. J. TREFFRY.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Aug. 14, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of the 11th inst. there is a little story in the "Children's Corner" the philosophy of which I consider very bad. The story is of "Boy Billy and the Beer."

It strikes me that it would hav been just as appropriate for some one to hav taken Christian Zende in hand and said: "Ah, ha, Mr. Zende! so you like bread, do you? Well, you shall hav bread—all you want—but don't go to the bake-shop for it, where they cook and mix all the ingredients together, but stay at home and get your bread pure. See! I hav all the stuff here from the store, and you shall hav plenty of bread. Come, now; open your mouth!"

Mr. Zende's face opens; the artist puts in a teacupful of flour, then a spoonful of yeast, a pinch of alum, a bit of butter, a dab of molasses, and to make sure of having the kind of bread that Mr. Zende will like, he puts in a half teacup of salt emptyings, a little ginger and wheat middlings, and perhaps a little corn-meal; then, to make sure that the bread shall be light, he puts in some saleratus and baking-powder, and other ingredients too numerous to mention.

Now, to my mind, it is very plain that by this time Mr. Zende will cry out, in the language of the story: "Take them away! take them away! My mouth tastes awful now! I can't eat those things; they make me sick. I'll never eat bread any more!"

Now, it is a fact that will be recognized by all, after a moment's thought, that there are many compounds, both palatable and profitable, the ingredients of which could not be taken separately in a raw state with any great degree of relish; and my experience and observation teach me that lager beer and bread are some of them. M. L. NICHOLS.

COALING, ALA., Aug. 18, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER, August 11th, Mrs. Ritchey has replied to a letter I wrote some time ago. When Mrs. Ritchey wrote her first letter, I supposed, from its reading, she wanted to know the truth; but I find, from subsequent letters, she is fixed in her opinion, and proposes to instruct and seems to sneer at Infidels. Mrs. Ritchey refers me to Lev. xviii, 24, 25; xx, 23, to justify the slaying of the Midianites. That is in keeping with the God of the Hebrews. He never perceived the mistake in saving thirty-two thousand of the same women. It is not much worse than his mistake in the garden, and also in saving a few of the antediluvians for seed and one of them a drunkard. She also refers me to Psalms, Job, and Kings. The same books teach that this life is all. "If a tree is cut down there is hope for it; but man dieth and where is he?"

Mrs. Ritchey failed to answer where the pagan got his hell and heaven. I hav been a student of ancient, modern, profane, and sacred history, and I hav never read of a worse man than David. If he is a man after God's heart, I hope to never make his (God's) acquaintance. Mrs. Ritchey asks how I know the Midianites were industrious, peaceable, and virtuous. By the amount of spoil. Bishop Colenso estimates those killed at 116,000, and the saved at 32,000, making 148,000. Now, average the spoil according to our census rates, and we hav 20 odd head of sheep, nearly 3 beeves, and 2 asses to the family. The officers alone offered 16,750 shekels in gold, and there were only about 130 officers; the privates made no offerings of any moneys they had taken. You will admit they were industrious for that age. The number of virgins justifies the assertion of virtue; and we hav no account other than that they were peaceable. Will Mrs. Ritchey tell of what account the Bible has been to mankind in any way—what it has given they did not hav? Can she find a better lawgiver than Solon in any Christian land? Yet he lived 600 B.C. One day, at the court of Periander, the question was asked, Which is the best popular government? Seven wise men of the different countries of Greece gave their opinions. Can she point to a single government on this globe where their laws excel the sentiments embraced in either of those seven opinions? Yet they were not inspired, but pagan. This was 600 B.C. Solon declared that his code of laws were not the best, but the best Athens was capable of receiving, and history says his civil and criminal codes were so ably formed that the Romans made them the basis of their legislation, and from thence they hav been transferred into all the judicial systems of modern Europe. Yet Christians will say, If it was not for the Bible we had been savage yet. Will Mrs. Ritchey cease being so downright and short-off in her replies? When she converts one Freethinker I want to see it announced in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

H. J. WARD.

FONTHILL, CAN., Aug. 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I should hav liked to send you another subscriber, but this is a very God-fearing community—three preachers to guide them on the road to the kingdom, and they don't forget to giv it to the Infidels. But that is the way they make a living. I was passing one of the churches a short time ago. I heard the preacher say the Infidels had changed their name, for a few years ago they said that there was no God; now they call themselvs Agnostics and say that they do not know. But he was trying to make his hearers believe he knew all about it. They had a Union revival every night for about three months last winter. They converted upward of one hundred and thirty, and the most of them gave their experience, but I don't think they told it all. I found out the preachers don't believe what they preach, for we had two fires here last May that burnt a great part of the village and I noticed they did not hav much faith in prayer, for two of them were working away but I did not see them pray, and I remarked it at the time. I can't understand how men who hav been to college, and hav had the chance to read, can stand up in the pulpit and preach what they do. They must know it is all lies. I am down on the preachers, and they know it. I was having an argument with an ex-preacher, and I told him they were no good, and I argued like this: "If a man was to come round here with a book that you could not understand, saying there would be a man round here in a month that would explain the book for you for $2, would you buy the book?" He said, "No." "Well," I said, "you get people to buy a Bible, and then want the people to pay you to explain it. If it is in plain English, we can understand it for ourselvs, and when it says Samson, I don't expect it means Barnum's elephant."

There is only one more subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER in this village, but I hav hopes of living where there are a number of Liberals. I see, from the "Letters from Friends," they are farther advanced in Liberal ideas on the Pacific Coast than we are here. Perhaps the preachers are scarce there, for fear they might hav to work. Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER, Heston and the pictures, in which my wife and family heartily join. I am bringing my children up to Liberalism's principles. Kind regards to THE TRUTH SEEKER staff and all Liberal friends. I remain, Yours for this life, RAYMOND COLE.

IPAVA, ILL., Aug. 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I receive many papers and magazines, and they are all good, but I really enjoy THE TRUTH SEEKER more than any one of them. It seems to awaken thought and attemper the mind and fit it to receive things that are just and reasonable. It does not hesitate to speak the truth and rebuke the crimes of the pretended good. It teaches that true worth is the gem that should glitter on the throne. It fills up a vacancy that the majority of the papers leave.

The people hav elevated themselvs to the platform of inquiry. They are prone to investigate anything that is not reasonable, and reject that which is not good. Some of our citizens seem to think it is a crime to judge the history of the people four thousand years ago. They would hav us cultivate our voices so that when we speak of Moses or the God of the Bible the tone of our voices would be as sweet and soft as that of a prima donna.

I was at church on the 6th inst. In fact, I am a regular church-goer, and also a Sunday-school scholar—not as a believer, but as an investigator.

I love to read history and make comparisons. And I find by comparisons that the people are growing better all the time. We don't hav to look around long in our country to find men who are kinder than Abraham, Jacob, or Moses, and women who are more honorable and more truthful, with a greater pride in virtue, than Jacob's mother or his wives. A gentleman who taught me in school when I was a little boy spoke in Sunday-school on the 29th ult. He spoke quite lengthily on the terrible punishment in the future for those who do not believe. Believe what? That the creator of all things is the author of the Bible? I could not believe such a thing under any circumstances. He also spoke quite lengthily on the efficacy of prayer. He brought out the idea that earnest prayer would be answered. I asked him after Sunday-school if earnest prayer ever had been answered. He replied that certainly it had. I then asked why James A. Garfield was not saved. He replied that God thought it best for him to die. "Well," said I, "earnest prayer went up for him from every intelligent people on the globe." "True," said he, "but the people did not know what they were praying for." Now, if the people who prayed for Garfield did not know what they were praying for, how can anyone know when he is right? Again, does God hav to be asked to do right? Is it necessary to ask an unchangeable being to do right? Can man persuade a God to do what is outside of the natural course of events?

Then came the sermon, which was devoted to the missionary cause, and the noble men and women who go out to preach the word of God and how God was with them, and how very liberally we ought to giv. It seemed to me while the minister was talking that the people were hoodwinked more for Christ's sake than for any other one thing. The people are asked to support the preachers while they can preach, and then they are asked to contribute to the sinking fund for broken-down ministers. They are asked to support the missionaries while the latter are visiting the heathen, and then they are told they ought to giv liberally to the support of the missionaries after they are too old to work longer for the Lord. Then, we hav the Women's Christian Temperance Unions and the Young Men's Christian Associations and the Roll of Honor all working for Jesus and the missionaries.

Many of them are honest in their work and are good and kind citizens. I find no fault with the individuals that are honest, but the creeds that impel them on—how long, oh, how long must we endure such teaching? How long will it be? How long need we wait before the people will learn to liv for humanity instead of living for Jesus? If we could hav every church converted into a science hall and hav the pulpits filled by scientific men instead of by preachers, the congregations would be large. The people would be taught how to liv in this world to enjoy health. There is no reason why man's allotted time or natural life should not be one hundred instead of thirty-five years. Then men would become optimistic instead of pessimistic in their views. They would cease stealing from one another to be able to giv to Jesus. And then men would minister and giv to mankind instead of sacrificing so much time and money for God. If we hav a mission, that mission must needs be to our fellow-man.

I am a great admirer of Col. Robert Ingersoll, or any man or woman who believes as he does. I believe the world is better, I believe the world is more charitable, I believe the world has more wisdom, because Col. Robert Ingersoll is living in it. Yours truly, C. S. RANDOLPH.

GIDEON, KAN., Aug. 10, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Having a little time, I will put a few ideas of a young farmer on paper. One who has to work sixteen hours in a day hasn't much time to speculate or theorize, but we farmers do think a little, and there are quite a number of Liberals sandwiched in among the farmers. Of course we hav not the benefits derived from a large city with her libraries, etc., but, as a rule, take a large number of papers, which in a very large measure is an excellent school. Some of your writers seem to think that the tariff is all that needs fixing and if we only had it fixed—had free trade, or protection, as some claim—times would be good, and farmers and all laborers would be happy. Now, we say the tariff is a delusion, a snare thrown out to catch the votes of gudgeons by old party leaders. The Democrats in their platform declare for tariff reform; the Republicans are for a reasonable reduction of the tariff, and reform in tariff. Each party wants to take duty off some things and put a higher duty on others. Each old party gets down and crawls and cringes to the money power, and the Republicans, to go the Democrats a little better, who hav always been for free whisky, declare for both free whisky and tobacco to get the saloon element. Now, as to Anarchy, we think there is no need of it in this country, and if the overcrowded laborers of the cities will scatter out and get homes away out on the great and noble prairies of the great Northwest and New South, this question of Anarchy will then be about settled, and without bloodshed on either side.

Now a word about a revival we had in this valley last winter, held by a sky-pilot named Testaman, who preaches the old version of the New Testament with all the variations added. During one of his hottest revival meetings last winter one of our young Freethinkers, Mr. F. O. Hellstrom, happened to smile at some of this "New Testaman's" remarks or antics, we don't know which, when the aforesaid Testament, marching down the aisle and pointing his finger at the above-named Freethinker, said: "Every neighborhood has a baboon. This neighborhood has one, and there he stands with a grin on his face." When meeting closed young Hellstrom walked up to Old Version of the "New Testaman," and shaking him by the hand said, "I am glad to meet a brother baboon without having to go to Africa," when lo! this meek follower of Jesus lost his "reverential calm" and became irate, and seized him by the collar with all the power of Jesus to help him, and was going to wipe up the floor with the poor Infidel, but the Infidel simply stretched forth his arm and grasped this mighty juggler for Jesus (the almighty dollar), and held him fast until the little knot set upon his shoulders cooled off, while it is said Frank was as cool as a cucumber, and smiled all the time.

Now about Spiritualism, of which there has been heard so much in THE TRUTH SEEKER of late. It always seems strange to me that spirits never show themselvs or make manifestations without some medium, who must hav curtains, cabinet, etc., with lights turned down before the spooks will come out, and then you must pay him a big fee whether you are satisfied or not. There is so much similarity between Spiritualism and Christianity that I cannot help thinking and calling them twin sisters of superstition and ignorance. All the priests (mediums, et al) need is people who are gullible, and, we are sorry to say, a large majority of mankind are easily gulled, and they can be as easily gulled and made to believe in hells and devils, spooks and spirits, as it was for Moses to gull the Israelites in ancient days. Now, I make this offer through THE TRUTH SEEKER. If any medium or person in the United States who sees this will convince me (and I am open to conviction) that the dead liv after death, I will make him or her a present of $25 in cash.

I think the cartoons are just the things to amuse and instruct, and would continue them right along. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER gets better and brighter as the years roll by. This valley has some twenty outspoken Liberals; enough to form a Secular Union if they were only organized; but it is a pretty hard job to organize farmers. and then the most of us are hard up, can't afford to take many Liberal papers or buy books, as taxes, interest, etc, take about all of our surplus, and more too, some years. But the time is drawing near when all Liberals will hav to be brought together in an organization, or giv up all our liberties and let that infernal machine known as the Catholic church reign supreme.

J. W. WATKINS.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Aug. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The tariff question having been urged upon our attention, courtesy requires that we should giv it all the attention that can reasonably be desired. With a view to qualifying myself to discharge the duty of an American citizen understandingly, I hav endeavored to acquire a knowledge of the cardinal principles of our national politics, or political economy, on which party lines were originally drawn.

I hav found that on the question of national organization one side proposed federal union, that has made the states a national unit; the other side proposed a confederation of independent states that would not giv them even the name of a nationality.

On the currency question one side proposed a national system of issue that would giv us a currency worth a hundred cents on a dollar everywhere within the states; the other side proposed free or independent bank issue, and gave us a currency that was at a discount all the way from naught to one hundred per cent.

On the question of international commerce one side proposed a protectiv tariff that would enable and encourage our people to do their own manufacturing and save the entire cost of employing other nations to do it for us. A penny saved is the equivalent of twopence earned. The other side proposed free trade—to hav our manufacturing done by those who will do it for less than we are willing to do it for ourselvs. As a measure of economy that is worse than "saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung," for it will waste at both.

The advocates of free trade admit that high tariff will benefit manufacturers, but say it will ruin agricultural interests. Having a relativ who had been in the farming business more than half a century and made money at it, I applied to him for information on that point, and was informed that when we had high tariff he could obtain a ready market and good prices for his produce; but when the tariff was low he found it difficult to obtain a market for his produce at a price that would pay the cost of cultivation. He also suggested that some of the neighboring farmers were so bewildered by free trade sophistries that they doubted the evidence of their own experience and voted for free trade.

Your free trade correspondents hav contributed a liberal supply of those sophistries, and obligingly refuted most of them with their admissions, to which I will simply add the suggestions that, if we really deplore the overproduction and ruinous competition to which we are subject in spite of protection, I shall fail to see the consistency of desiring free trade with countries where overproduction and ruinous competition hav been so long chronic that their working population are forced over the verge of starvation, and are flying to this country for protection, of which the advocates of free trade would fain deprive them even here. Protection being indispensable to preservation, if self-preservation is the first law of nature, I shall think it absurd to assert that "protection violates the laws of nature."

One of your free trade correspondents contributes facts and figures that prove free trade to be a more villainous outrage upon the people than protectionists appear to hav suspected. They prove that the people of free trade countries pay about forty per cent more for imports than they get for their exports. It being obvious that a people who pay more for that they buy than they get for that they sell must inevitably become bankrupt, it is no wonder that the working people of free trade countries are miserably poor. Hence, it being a commercial necessity that a nation should obtain as much for their exports in the markets where sold as they pay for imports in the markets where purchased, I think it obvious that the figures given by your free trade correspondent prove conclusivly that the people of free trade countries are annually swindled out of hundreds of millions of dollars for the enrichment of importers. A desire to subject the people of this country to a like outrageous swindle, for a like purpose and on a much larger scale, appears to be the only rational incentiv to, or solution of, the free trade mania that is visible to an intelligent and fair-minded observer.

Nevertheless, I shall freely admit that neither high tariff, low tariff, nor no tariff can possibly protect us from the robbery and slavery that ownership of wealth subjects us to. That appears the only discoverable cause why protection fails to protect; for the advocates of free trade admit that a high tariff should protect us from the overproduction and ruinous competition of foreign manufacturers, and nobody pretends that it will protect us from overproduction and ruinous competition that ownership compels us to practice among ourselvs. Nothing but the entire abolition of the cause can cure that effect, political demagogs and economic quacks to the contrary notwithstanding. It being impolitic to propose and advocate abolition of the cause, the next best thing is to prove that complaining of and endeavoring to modify the effect is virtually condemning and protesting against the cause.

J. A. TUTTLE.

UPPER YARRA, VICTORIA, AUS., June 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The question of a future life at times engrosses the thoughts of almost everyone who thinks beyond the grave. Vague theories may be advanced, but no philosophy can substantiate the doctrin of immortality. In this paper I propose to giv my view as nearly in accordance with the laws of nature as reasonable assumption will admit, and in order to illustrate those views I will call in the aid of arithmetical progression. I suppose it is admitted by most philosophers that organic matter is an amalgamation of atoms that hav passed through animal and vegetable life millions of times within the infinit grasp of immutable law. There are no accidents in nature, and surely that which has been shall be repeated during the long ages of eternity. But all assumption goes for nothing in dealing with the immortality of the soul, which, I suppose, means the mind or memory. If such had been the case we should hav been conscious of all events during the past eternity. It is then evident that we hav only got to deal with the possibility of a series of lives unconnected by conscious memory. In reasoning thus, we must bear in mind that the dissolution and amalgamation of the atoms of worlds must take place, which finity must regard as a young eternity. This is the most difficult phase in the problem, although the longest thinkable time would neither increase nor diminish the duration of the infinit. Still, it stands very much in the way of finite calculation.

We can't conceive of eternity. To us it seems an imaginary point, round which revolve time's endless cycles, which mark on endless lines the records of events, and unless we are perpetual witnesses of those events we cannot be immortal. Immortal means eternal. Eternity had no beginning. We had a beginning, therefore we are not immortal. Viewed in this light an after life does not mean immortality—it mean a repetition of similar conditions, which I will endeavor to illustrate by arithmetical progression.

For convenience we select the first ten cards in the pack From ace to ten we mix them thoroughly as for dealing. Taking one from the top, we place it under the pack and turn one face up on the table. The third card is placed under, and one turned face up on the table, covering the one already turned up. Repeat the same until the cards are exhausted. The pack will then be inversely on the table. Take up the cards carefully, guarding against mistake, and subject them to the same manipulations, and at a given time they will turn up one, two, three, etc., in regular arithmetical progression. This operation represents the law of involution and evolution ad infinitum. Of course, it is impossible to giv an adequate idea of the infinit workings of nature by illustration. These evolutions are infinitly interwoven, and it would require infinit illustration and an infinit mind to comprehend them. We therefore assert nothing, but merely assume possibilities. Suppose, then, that the progression were carried out to countless billions? We need specify no commencement—we are always between two eternities, which is strong proof that the mind, memory, or soul of man is not immortal, or else we should hav carried the memories of the past eternity up to the present time. But suppose it took millions of years to pass the atoms through all the different forms? Is it not possible that the identical atoms which once constituted the physical body would be reunited in forms of physical life? But whither, oh, whither, has fled the boasted immortal mind? But it might be argued that the same identical body would produce the same identical mind. Such an argument would prove futil in the presence of the destructible. The mind is a creation. If the mind produced the body, then the body would be destructible and the mind immortal. This, we know, is not so. Matter is originless and eternal, therefore it is the body that is immortal—subject to change of condition. After all, it might be as well for even the Atheist to indulge in the illusiv but pleasing hope of a conscious future life connecting the memories of the present. Immortality is a beautiful picture painted by love on bright realms of hope and joy, and it is almost a pity to cast a blight on that fair paradise with the cold breath of philosophy.

I hav thus endeavored to giv my views of a future life in such language as I hav at command. I hav never been much enamored of the pedantic phraseology of the Middle Age philosophers, begotten of monarchical institutions, and so flippantly indulged in by their imitators of the nineteenth century. Why, the most insignificant ape who writes a one-page article would hav puzzled Ralph Waldo Emerson to tell what he was driving at. Tennyson, the poet, is of that type; but being the pet of royalty, no one takes any notice of him except the aristocracy and their flunkeys. We want a republican style of phraseology, that every man, woman, and child who can read will understand readily. It seems to me as though it was an effort on the part of some writers to bewilder the public at the expense of dead philosophers. In the present case, however, the total absence of books of reference rendered it a necessity to be extremely crude. Of what valuc are old, musty books to a modern thinker—such as the Hebrew Bible, compiled from nicks on sticks, marks on preserved leaves of trees, and all such authentic records, and then at the discretion of an ignorant savage compiler? If Jehovah was so poor a scholar that he couldn't write his own book, why not appear to all mankind as well as the Jews and giv verbal instructions until he had finished his education? Probably he had no room for a school-house before he created space, and having lived nowhere from all eternity he thought he would play the truant through all time. He was only a boy-God then; but surely he's a grown-up God by this time.

You will no doubt be surprised at receiving a correspondence from this far-off land of the bonyup and kangaroo; but although a storm of years hav swept across the plain of memory, I hav not been altogether a stranger to your great city; although I claim more familiarity with the city of Boston. I attended Mr. Seaver's lectures in 1852 Freethought lecturing was carried on in a rather modest way in those days—no mighty Ingersolls had swept through the orthodox camp like a pompero, placing hors de combat the whole host of superstition on the ruins of their favorit hell. Yet Mr. Seaver has lived to see the intellectual giant expose the theological sham to the gaze of an applauding world. I hav been a Freethinker since I can remember. In obedience to the laws of nature, it seemed a necessity of the mind. I hav been a gold-digger for thirty-five years, which was a vagary of the will. But I must continue for the remainder of this life. And if there is any other life they had better look out for the pavement of the new Jerusalem.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Baby Anarchist.

Around the house all day he goes,
By baby fancies led;
He sometimes stands upon his toes,
And sometimes on his head.

He takes the flower, pot and all,
And puts it in his lap;
He spills the syrup in the hall—
This naughty little chap.

Your silk umbrella, spick and span,
He sticks in deep rat-holes;
And with his mother's rarest fan
Hammers your frailest bowls.

He ties the pendulum with a string
While singing baby songs;
He's always sure to put one thing
Where something else belongs.

He'll take a match and light the cat,
He'll paint the poodle's head;
And pour frail crackers in your hat
And leave them in your bed.

Adown the register he'll throw
The spools with nimble wrist;
He's often wished in Jericho—
The baby Anarchist.

But never war upon him wage,
Nor whip him till he roar—
Suspend him in a roomy cage,
Five feet above the floor. —Puck.

Children and Good Behavior.

We often hear excuses made for the bad manners of children. "Oh, they will outgrow all those naughty tricks!" "They will learn better as they grow older!" are words often heard in regard to little folks. The better way is never to learn what must some day be unlearned; never to grow into habits that some time hav to be outgrown.

Good conduct is good behavior, and good behavior means good character, and children should be taught this as soon as they begin to observe and notice.

To know what children really are, we hav only to see them at home in their every-day clothes and their every-day behavior.

If they are gentle, kind, considerate at home, we need hav no fear of them abroad.

But mark that boy or girl who is rude and unkind at home. He may put on his, or she may put on her, company manners when meeting strangers, but it is like the tinsel covering of a defectiv image. It is not genuin.

The boy who is in the habit of saying to his mother or sisters, "Oh, hush up!" "I won't!" "I will!" "Shut up your head!" is not a well-behaved boy, no matter how nicely he may appear when in some other home. Nor is a girl possessed of good manners who snaps and snarls at home, but who is polite and agreeable when away from home.

If some children behaved as badly in a neighbor's house as in their own home, they would not be allowed to enter the doors.

What is good behavior? Some mothers always tell their children to "behave," but never explain the meaning of that word.

The best behavior is the being gentle and considerate toward others, thoughtful and kind to those in the home circle, and then these qualities will be sure to appear abroad. The best definition of politeness is this:

Politeness is to do and say
The kindest things in the kindest way.

A secular school situated in England does not open with prayer or reading the scripture, but begins every day with an exhortation that should be repeated in every home, school, and college in the world. The words are as follows: "Be good, be honorable, be true, and let your speech be pure."

This advice, if acted upon generally, would insure correct deportment, and giv to the world a superior order of human beings among grown people as well as children.

S. H. W.

A Ten Days' Drive.

It lacked but three weeks of September and the opening of school. So far they had contented themselvs with short drives, and gone on excursions for a day at a time.

That afternoon they sat in solemn council on the side piazza—a committee of ways and means for a longer trip. There were the children, Lizzie, Daisy, and Fred, and the "lady of the house." Plan after plan had been suggested and ruled out. Lizzie, however, was silent, such a change that they all began to wonder, when finally she showed signs of "coming to," and announced her plan.

Her eyes turned toward the stable and their eyes followed, and saw through the open door the carriage, its cover bearing the dust of days. With her head over the back fence was the horse—a great fat horse not used enough to giv her sufficient exercise.

Then Lizzie spoke: "I propose a plan that will doubtless cause some of these city friends to shake their heads. Attention! Means: Essie and the carriage, a pocket-book, a basket of lunch, and a few "duds." Plan: A ten-day carriage trip, starting from our city of Cleveland, state of Ohio, to-morrow morning at 7:30. Ladies and gentleman," gazing fixedly at Fred, "I pause for further suggestions."

Well! This was rather startling. The other plans had been a little vague, but here was one so definitly laid out and withal so practical; but "to-morrow morning at 7:30" was the most startling part. But still, as Lizzie said, that was the very point. "No puttings-off; no grand preparations. Only a regular gypsy trip."

Lizzie met the "gentleman of the house" first in the evening, and had told him the whole plan before he entered the gate, whereupon he said that they "might go for ten days, but expected he'd see them in a few over ten hours." Lizzie instantly resolved that her plan should not fall as flat as that.

Next morning they were off. The gentlest horse in Cleveland and a two-seated open carriage; two umbrellas and some rubber traps close against one side; under the front seat a basket of dry food for lunches; under the other seat a bag of grain, and under Daisy's feet a satchel containing as few clothes as possible.

That is how they drove out of the yard and left the "gentleman of the house" to keep "bachelor's hall."

Their destination was first the home of the brother of the "lady of the house." There were five cousins there. Their place was sixty miles east of Cleveland, on the lake. They calculated to considerably surprise these folks by driving there.

Just here I find I am having considerable trouble in writing "they," when I really mean "we," for it was mamma and we three children who started on this wild-goose trip two summers ago.

We drove out Euclid avenue, which is a continuous road to Buffalo, N. Y., passing Lake View Cemetery, where General Garfield lies, and where stands the great monument to his memory. Beyond there is a great grape country, where were acres of vines, with the fruit slowly ripening.

A few miles beyond we passed an old inn, which we still laugh over. One Sunday papa drove us out there, and we took dinner at the inn, but the old German landlord refused to receive payment. A few questions showed that papa had been mistaken for the Catholic priest, which is the best joke we hav ever had on him.

We lunched a little farther on, buying some milk and apples at a farm-house. In the afternoon we passed the Garfield home in Mentor, with the stone memorial addition, and proceeded toward Little Mountain, up which we drove—only we all walked! But that was always the way with all the hills. We would jump out and walk, until finally Essie would stop at the foot of every little incline, and look back at us, expecting it.

Reaching the top, we had a fine view of the surrounding farming land and little towns. Descending, we rode on toward Painesville, inquiring for room to stay over night, which we soon found—and how good the bed and board were it takes a thirty-mile drive to find out!

Next morning at 6 we were off. By 10 it began to rain, but we pushed on, wanting to reach the cousins that day. However, it came down so thick and fast by noon that we were glad to drive under shelter. Then we dried ourselvs by a strange fire—a sort of gas jet in a sheet-iron stove—the fuel being supplied by a natural gas well!

In three minutes after the fire was started the stove was red-hot and we were steaming, and were soon ready to start on, although the rain wasn't yet over, and the roads were very slippery, the soil being largely clay.

We had intended to surprise our folks, and I am sure we did, driving in solemnly with rain falling, mud splashing, and umbrellas in the air.

We had a first-rate time during our three days' stay—but how could eight cousins all together hav any other kind of time?

I guess they thought it rather a wild idea, but it had been pretty much all fun so far. We were even glad it had rained, because now we appreciated the fine weather.

Having been along the Lake road, east, so far, we determined to strike south toward Warren, Ravenna, Cuyahoga Falls, and Akron. From Warren we went quite out of our way to visit Nelson Ledges. We had thought Little Mountain rather nice for an Ohio hill, but this was "more like it." There were great rocks and caves, beautiful trees, moss, ferns, and wild flowers. I am tempted to say they are a very little like our Rocky Mountains on a small scale, but it would be a very small scale indeed.

We still hav two pictures in mind from the homeward trip. The first was beautiful. Essie had cast a shoe on the country road, but luckily enough we soon found a blacksmith, and then it was we saw the first of the pictures. An old house, of no particular color, amidst trees, covered with climbers of all sorts and set rather far back from the road. Close to the front fence the shop, with a smoldering fire, over which bent the gray and stoop-shouldered old smith. There was a large door, and directly back of it a square window containing no sash. An inquiring old cow had her head through the window, nestling comfortably against the barefooted little granddaughter, who was petting her softly, while for the background were green and yellow fields, bowed-down trees, and comfortable farm-houses.

The second picture was comical enough. It would make a good drawing for the ridicule of our "national game," as base-ball is now called. There were two "nines" in a large field by the road, and every man in each set had a different costume, picked out, we said to each other, from the wardrobe of his entire family, with the express desire that no two pieces should in the least match. One, we said, had on his grandmother's gaiters, his grandfather's long, knit stockings, and his little brother's knickerbockers. Nor were any two players of the same size, and the pitches were very wild. We named that picture "Home Talent," and I do not doubt but there was plenty of fun there, and only hope they enjoyed it as much as we did.

The Cuyahoga river, at Cleveland, is as ugly a stream as can be found—a very slow and dirty river, but certainly very useful. But the river there, just before losing itself in the lake, sees only tall ships, great bridges, immense lumber yards, and the filthy oil refineries, while it is still a youthful river at Cuyahoga Falls, has great times among green grass and trees and flowers and birds, playing hide-and-seek with itself among the rocks, and dashing headlong over the stone ledges.

We admired Akron very much, but thought it much too hilly for people who get out of their buggy and walk at every hard place. There are also great flouring-mills there, and many fine residences.

From there we took the Cleveland road, and reached the city just at dark.

Lucky it was dark, too, for a muddier, dirtier, dustier set never were seen in that most proper city.

We drove through the gate just ten days from the time we had driven out, having accomplished over two hundred miles, and were triumphant that our plan had not "fallen flat," but had come out of the oven "light as a honeycomb." Laura Prioe Stewart.

Correspondence.

Denver, Col., Aug. 12, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: Having been interested myself in Nettie Olds's story of their Oregon drive, I wrote a sketch of our long ride through Ohio, and now send it, hoping it may prove acceptable for our Corner.

With much love, Laura Prioe Stewart.

Tilden, Neb., Aug. 11, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: I thought I would write you a few lines. I havn't written to the Children's Corner for a long time. It has been very bad weather lately—raining and misting two or three days. We hav very bad crops here. My father is not going to thrash his wheat at all. His oats are very poor too—they were struck by rust. I was going to a picnic, but it rained. We hav fourteen kittens and seven old cats. It is vacation now, and school commences the first Monday in September. Our teacher's name is Peter McGinty.

Wishing success to the Corner, I remain,
Your true friend,
George Quintion Whitney.

Berlin, N. J., Aug. 19, 1888.

Miss Wixon: Your letter with the money from the children of the Corner came safe to hand. We thank you with all our hearts for your kind, cheering words, and the interest you take in our welfare, and hope you may ever find friends as kind.

We thank the children for their gifts and good wishes, and assure them that, if they cherish the virtues of humanity, benevolence, love, and kindness, they will never lack for friends. May they all continue to write for the Corner, and become as intelligent and useful as their teacher, for then the world will be the better for their having lived in it.

Now, if all the children who hav helped to make up the fund you sent me will write me, and giv their names and post-offices, I will send each a volume of my old Pleasure Boat, published long before they were born. Thanks to you all.

Your friend, Jeremiah Haoker.

Amusements for Children.

On stormy days the activ child resents his confinement within doors, and is more than usually troublesome. There is nothing which will afford him surer amusement than the making of scrap-books. Provide the little ones with a pair of blunt-pointed scissors, and let them cut out and trim neatly the pictures from papers you do not care to preserve, circulars of farm machinery, or anything they fancy, and then, armed with a cup of boiled starch and an old tooth-brush—if you hav one—let them exercise their ingenuity in filling the book with their collections. Quite small children find enchantment in this kind of work. A large picture may be put in the center of the page, and the space around it filled with small ones or short pieces of prose or poetry.

Very pretty ornaments for these juvenil scrap-books may be cut out of the illustrated books for children which hav become badly tattered with use, so that the pictures are all that are worth preserving. When two pages are full, the book should be left open until dry before going on. This amusement need not make much litter about the house, and the little workers can easily learn to pick up their scattering scraps after themselvs, and wash their starch-cup and brush after them, so that they will be ready for the next day to spend indoors.

A Burial in Algiers.

One day I witnessed here the burial of a child. The young boy was laid in the grave wrapped in a yard or two of white cotton; a small hole was dug at the bottom of the grave and served as a coffin, being covered with flat slabs of stone to prevent the earth from falling directly on the body. Twenty or thirty men stood round in silence, the earth was hastily replaced, and temporary stones were placed at the head and feet; the cushions and pieces of embroidery in which the body lay on the donkey which bore it to the final resting-place were put back on the animal, and the procession moved silently away. The women and girls always come afterward to weep on the grave and place flowers, and especially branches of myrtle. They often spend the greater part of three days round a new grave, sitting on matting and carpets.

An Experiment in Animal Magnetism.

A mysterious experiment in "animal magnetism," says La Nature, may be performed by taking a piece of paper two or three inches long and half an inch wide, and turning the opposit corners up and down. Balance it carefully on the point of a needle, which may be supported by a cork, and we hav a little windmill which, when the hand is brought near it, will revolve with more or less rapidity. The motion, of course, is due to the currents of air arising from the warm hand; and the varying rapidity of rotation with different persons is not due to any occult "magnetic" influence, but simply to the degrees of warmth in their hands. The movement is more rapid if both hands are placed around the apparatus instead of one.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE NINE DEMANDS

Poetry.

Faith vs. Reason.

Hard by a mean old hut down on the moor
  Our Abraham had toiled away his life.
He always loved the place, though 'twas so poor
  That to subsist there was a constant strife
With famin and distress, and yet his wife
Had liked it too, because they both were sure
Their farm contained a hidden mine of gold.
And he had dug for it till they were old.

His race was almost rnn: about to die,
  He called his son and said: "Before I go,
I want to tell you gold is very nigh
  To where we've just been diggin', that I know—
  I know it 'cause my daddy told me so!
You'll find it, Abe, in the 'sweet by and by,'
If you hav faith like your grandsires of yore,
And their grandsires who dug here years before."

So little Abe took up the pick and shovel,
  And delved in mire in which his grandsires dead
Long years before had loved to scratch and grovel.
  It never entered once his foolish head
  That what his poor, benignted sire had said
Might be a lie; and in his father's hovel—
That ancient, crumbling, orthodox old shack—
He took up his abode, and bent his back.

And years rolled by, and he was getting old,
  But his son Thomas didn't like to work
In "diggin's which panned out so little gold."
  As big an Infidel as any Turk
  When 'mongst the Christians, Tom was wont to shirk
His work entirely. "Old man, you've been sold!"
He told his father. "Nay, my son, believe!
Hav faith and we will mighty things achieve!"

"How do you know your daddy didn't lie,
  When he said this old ranch contained much gold?"
"Because, my son—it matters little why!—
  But he by his grandsires before was told.
  My boy, you see the fact was known of old;
And it is very wrong in you to pry
Around—to 'doubt' what by my 'faith' is truth.
For that my father whipped me in my youth."

Unrighteously the lad still shook his head.
  The torch of reason flashed a sudden beam
Across his brow, and pointedly he said,
"Tell me who told the first man?" "It would seem
  The first man learned it one night in a dream."
Their old abode—that orthodox old shed—
Fell down just then, and in the bitter cold
The old man died. His son doesn't dig for gold.

MORAL:

Credulity is oftentimes a curse.
  A lie's a lie, and faith can't make it true.
Faith that could save could surely fill a purse.
  A blind man may hav faith that black is blue;
  Some may believe by faith that two and two
Make half a dozen. Many believe worse
By that same faith by which they liv and die,
Yet truth, in spite of faith, is not a lie.

Cooperstown, Pa., Aug. 22 1888. M. H. Veon.

Joseph.

Joseph, the son of Jacob, the son of Isaac, the son of Abraham, the first recorded chum of Jahveh, if not born to greatness, or what he would hav accounted such, was certainly born to luck that led him to a tide that bore him on to very considerable greatness and fortune.

When Joe was put in a hole by his brothers, he thought it "hard lines," no doubt; when he was sold to the Ishmaelites, and at the paltry price, too, of twenty pieces of silver, the "pieces" equivalent to dollars perhaps, harder yet were the "lines;" when sold to the Egyptians, at an advance, of course—this was some consolation—and cleaning lamps and things in the Potiphar scullery, still harder were the "lines;" and when he was jugged on account of a "woman scorned," he having brought about this state of affairs by refusing to entertain a proposition which, assented to, would hav given him a soft snap in the Potiphar household, with no more lamp-cleaning, knife-scouring, etc., the "hard lines" could scarcely be harder, no doubt he thought. These jabs of fate, however, were but so many "reaches" on the tide that was to bear him on to fortune—to place, power, and persimmons, so to speak. Which goes to show that no man wots of that which is in store for him on the morrow, even though to-day may furnish him with gum-boils of "exceeding much" fervency of cussedness, as it were.

It is said that it is better to be born lucky than rich. I think so. He that is born with a gold spoon in his mouth is quite apt to go to the "demnition bowwows," via the Wall street maelstrom or gin cascade; while he that is born lucky ascendeth to the "high places," even unto the White House ascendeth he, and, if born very lucky, he goeth not forth at the end of the first term, but stayeth through a second, even unto the end of eight years stayeth he; therefore, I say unto ye, it is better to be born lucky than rich, and I'll lay ye shekels on it.

The sorriest jab of fate, as Joe no doubt considered it, the durance-vile racket, of which he put in two years, proved the immediate precursor of fortune's smiles. H. E. M.—this means His Egyptian Majesty—Pharaoh, a high liver, and fond of stealing awhile away to feed upon the mutton-pie when cold, before retiring to the royal couch, was, in consequence of these untimely feeds, much given to dreams of "exceeding much" pokiness of construction and more muchness of opacity, or insolubility. One night, after absorbing more mutton-pie than usual, he had one of those pokey dreams of his, and a double-header, so to speak; and not all the wise men of Egypt, and not all the sharps, maintained at the court of H. E. M. for soothsaying purposes, could expound the hokey-pokey dream or even get onto the trail thereof, their failure throwing the king into a state of mind bordering on despond, and upon the ragged edge of a paroxysmal anger that augured N. G. for the continued welfare of said sharps—even a king wants something for his money, you know, and soothsayers as well as sausage-stuffers are expected to earn their salaries.

While Joe was in jug, where he had as soft a thing as possible, a butler and baker of the royal household, cooped in the cooler for peccadilloes, dreamed dreams as queer as quills on quacking quahaugs quitting quadratures in quinquina, which dreams did Joe unfold as heat and light unfold the joyous cauliflower, it coming to pass as he the tales unfolded, he charging nothing for exercising his "second sight," in shekels, but charging the butler to remember him when restored to the good graces of the king, as he was three days later. And the butler remembered him. To be sure, it was not until two years later that he remembered Joseph; but it must be remembered that kings' butlers are busy men, and that grape-juice and things must be looked after though gratitude goes to the wall.

But he remembered Joseph on the occasion of the king's hokey-pokey dream, "insoluble to the understanding" of the seersuckers, and told the king of his dream and the baker's, and how Joe had foretold the things that came to pass, on being told the dreams, whereupon Pharaoh issued a writ of habeas corpus, and had Joe brought before him at once, telling him how he had dreamed of "seven kine, fat-fleshed and well-favored, that came out of a river and went to feeding in a meadow;" that the river then gave up seven rack-o'-bones of steers that the crows would laugh to scorn, which immediately gobbled up the "fat-fleshed kine," but still retained their gauntness, and hollow-eyed and hungry expression of countenance; also of a refracted vision in the cereal line—fat and lean ears of corn in lieu of kine—making his dream a double-header, as it were.

Joe braced up to the occasion, and told H. E. M. that that was an easy one, looking the assembled soothsayers over with a supercilious eye, then in an off-hand way telling the king that the seven fat cattle meant seven years of plenty, when the earth would "bring forth by handfuls"—somehow, this doesn't seem to express unbridled and reckless plenty; cartfuls would hav expressed it better—and the seven rack-o'-bones seven years of famin, presuming, then, to advise Pharaoh how to proceed, so as to hedge on or discount the famin, being particular to impress upon him the necessity of selecting a "discreet and wise," square up and up man to look after things during the years of plenty, that the years of famin might not catch them with their boots off, so to speak.

Pleased that his double-headed dream had been solved, Pharaoh heeded not the gall of Joe, but told him he appeared to be just the "discreet and wise" man desired, and engaged him at once, at a liberal salary no doubt, to look after things, appointing him ruler in Egypt, second to none but him. There was greatness gobbled at one fell swoop, as it were, and no picayune greatness neither! Besides, he gave Joe his seal ring then and there; "arrayed him in vestures of fine linen"—I presume the weather was hot—put on his neck a gold chain—eighteen carats, probably, and of much pennyweight power—gave him a chariot with second place in the procession; gave him to wife—didn't ask if he was married, or wanted to be—the daughter of a priest, and, to cap the climax, "called Joseph's name Zaphnath-paaneah." How was that for high? And the whole thing, wasn't it bully and fairy-like? What a crop of honors in one day, eh? Certainly enough for one man, and that one the son of a sheep-raiser, late a scullion, and just habeas corpused out of the cooler!

Proudly launched upon the tide of men's affairs, with place his own and power at will, our Joe sailed on to fortune—in the vulgar sense, "sugar"—and, from all I can gather concerning his operations during the years of plenty and famin in Egypt, as set forth in the Holy Queer, which is silent with regard to his acquisitions, there is no doubt that he "got there," not the slightest. Read the history of his doings—some mighty sharp practice you will find chronicled therein—and, judging the man from these, and having in view human nature as she are built, on the average, if you think he failed to connect, why, think so; it is your privilege.

I hav a notion that Joe "waxed so exceeding great" in the direction of shekels, as represented by "talents of silver and talents of gold," that Jahveh thought best to lay low and keep dark with respect to this "greatness," lest he should be charged with aiding a pal to lay up a store of this world's goods at the expense of the poor devils who, their scads all gone, were obliged to giv up their cattle and lands for bread to eat, in the end becoming serfs! I don't know but it was all right. Perhaps it was. Egypt was his for the plucking, in cahoots with Pharaoh, who was not troubled with such weak trash as compunctions, probably. What were the Egyptians to Joseph, or Joseph to the Egyptians, that he should consider them? Egypt, by the grace of Pharaoh, moved by Jahveh, was his oyster. That settled it. Further remarks are uncalled for.

Anyone who wastes sympathy on Joseph, on account of his sufferings previous to his sudden rise to place and power, is a sentimental spendthrift with no sense of the eternal fitness of things—if this fits the case. Whether or not, it goes. There is no use saying a thing and then crawfishing, or trying to explain it to obtuse intellects. Who wouldn't be put in a hole for half a day; hauled out by one gang of "speculators" and sold to another—even for the paltry sum of $20; resold at an advance—some slight satisfaction in this; wash pots and kettles and clean lamps for a season; do two "stretches" in the cooler even, provided then, at one jump, he could reach the second rung from the top of the ladder of fame, fortune, and felicity? Who wouldn't was cut for the cobbler's bench, where he can wax on, wax ever, but never, as did Joseph, "wax great," with "exceeding much" lucre.

Concerning Mrs. Potiphar, the "woman scorned" in the case, it goes without saying—and the H. Q. does not say—that she was awfully cut up by the great and sudden rise of her whilom bondman, awfully cut up; but as Joe was a good second in the affairs of the kingdom, she was forced to assume a "reverential calm" not in accord with the tumultuous heavings of her surcharged bosom; in other words, she had to grin and bear it.

Joseph ended his career at the age of one hundred and ten years. He didn't "sleep with his fathers;" in fact, he wasn't even buried. "They embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt." Perhaps it was the fashion there for people to keep their defuncts at home, coffined; I don't know. Well, having put Joe in a coffin in Egypt, we hav no further use for him. Selah!

Si Slokum.

A Painful Story.

From Puck

A Christian scientist, who derived a handsome income by insisting that the pains and aches of other people did not exist, was once attacked by a Jumping Toothache.

The unwelcome guest nestled down into a large molar in the lower jaw of the doctor, and proceeded to make itself at home by none too gently titillating the inferior dental nerve. Notwithstanding the fact that he had been telling his patients all the morning that their sufferings were imaginary, he was compelled to recognize this pain, and proceeded to giv himself a $2 treatment, thus:

"Pain is evil; evil does not exist; ergo, pain does not exist, and hence there can be no pain in my teeth."

At this logical demonstration the Jumping Toothache smiled a smile of superior wisdom, and gave the dental pulp a bang so powerful that the Christian scientist was unable to restrain a mournful howl; but he heroically proceeded.

"The pain I seem to feel in my tooth is not real; it is merely an evil thought. I will cease to think this thought, and the discomfort will cease."

On hearing this, the Jumping Toothache rolled up its sleeves and went to work in earnest. It jumped with both feet upon the quivering nerve ends, and stamped, kicked, squeezed, and tugged at them the whole night through, with so savage vigor that when the blear-eyed dawn began to brighten in the east, the Christian scientist, who had spent the night in walking up and down, and moaning, and trying to convince himself of the unreality of his suffering, was in a thoroughly knocked-out condition.

Suddenly, after an unusually atrocious twinge, he hastily seized his hat and coat.

"Where are you going?" inquired his wife, who was also a metaphysical healer.

"I'm going to hav this damned tooth pulled out," said he shortly.

"Pain has no real existence," replied his wife calmly; "you know that——".

"You havn't got this toothache!" cried the Christian scientist, as he slammed the front door and made a bee-line for the nearest dentist.

No Hatred Like Religious Hatred.

George Alfred Townsend, the noted correspondent for the Boston Globe and other equally responsible papers, in illustrating "Compensation for Too Much Hatred" in the Sunday Globe of August 12th, says:

The competitions of intellectual hatred are always meaner than the conflict of arms. You see three such kings as Charles, Francis, and Henry meeting in perfect cordiality on the field of the cloth of gold; but when you come to the holy and perfect man, like John Calvin, you see him, having nabbed his adversary, Servetus, selecting the green-wood stakes to burn him slowly, and, after the poor soul was nothing but ashes, the gallant Calvin, whose intellect could not be appeased by pain and dissolution, wrote to one of his friends that "the rascal bellowed like a bull in the fire."

Here is news, for we do not remember of having heard before this addendum, "The rascal bellowed like a bull in the fire," and we feel very grateful to George Alfred Townsend for the information—for fact doubtless it is, else such a careful and popular writer would not hav stated it—so we forward it to The Truth Seeker, that its readers may enjoy another sweet compensation in the heroic piety of the sainted founder of the rich and consoling doctrin of Calvinism.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.
The Present and the Future Republic of North America
BY A CAPITALIST.
A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

THE STRUGGLE
FOR Religious and Political Liberty.
In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

HISTORY

INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT

Of Europe.

Revised Edition—2 vols—Price, $3

By JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER, M.D., LL.D.
Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

News of the Week.

AN expedition of nearly 1,000 men has started after Stanley, and will trace his route step by step.

THE New York banker Eugene Kelly offers to head a subscription to erect a statue to Father Mathew in Central park.

KING OTTO of Bavaria is sinking in insanity.

YELLOW fever is increasing at Jacksonville, Fla.

THE German war party seem triumphing in politics.

ANTI-HEBREW agitation is increasing in Europe.

GERMAN Catholics will hold a national convention at Cincinnati on the 3d.

FRANCE seems threatening Italy with war for her seizure of Massowah.

PRESBYTERIAN converts for 1887, 98,992; benevolent contributions, $1,019,937.

CATHOLIC dignitaries wish the progress of Mohammedanism in Africa arrested by force.

THE Anglican bishops urge in an encyclical that divorce be only for scriptural reasons.

THE Catholic newsboys of New Orleans hav their own chapel and attend mass daily at 5 A.M.

REPORT is made of the shooting of Captain Kinney, leader of the Missouri Bald Knobbers, an organization formed to suppress outlaws which ended by becoming a gang of outlaws itself.

A HERMIT who recently died at Plainfield, N. J., left $250,000 to a Baptist church.

THE coal monopolists of the East met on the 24th ult. and advanced coal 25 to 50 cents per ton.

BOULANGER a few days ago was reëlected to the chamber of deputies, from which he had just resigned.

ON the 23d ult. 300 Royalists attended a banquet at Paris to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the Comte de Paris.

K. OF L. District Assembly 49 of New York, once having 80,000 members, has been almost totally ruined by quarrels among its leaders.

THE Indiana White Caps, a gang of rowdies who go about whipping everyone whose morals don't suit them, are being forced to disband.

CATHOLIC papers defend the miracles at the shrine of Ste. Anne de Beaupre, saying that "one ounce of fact is worth a ton of argument and sneers."

REVIVALIST HARRISON says: "We must giv up all worldly amusements and be conservativ. I never knew a man that went to the theater that did not go to hell."

AT a Baptist association meeting at Monticello, Ga., on the 23d ult., the Tyler and Malone families commenced shooting over an old feud and several were killed.

THE blacks of Irwinsville, Ga., ascribe unaccountable sicknesses they hav had lately to conjuration, and hav ordered from the town a negro whom they accuse of the mischief.

THE masses are reveling in descriptions of the visits of European emperors to one another, with accounts of their clothes and trappings and reviews of their hordes of military butchers.

DAN LYONS, the murderous New York rowdy hanged a few days ago, spent his last day in religious conversation and securing commutation of his crimes in heaven, and died, his mother said, "a good Christian."

THE churches are busy in their usual works of high utility to mankind and are agitated in one place over close communion, in another over the proper material for images, and in another over probation for the heathen.

MOSES APPEALS TO THE LORD'S VANITY AND BEGS HIM NOT TO MAKE HIMSELF RIDICULOUS.

And Moses said unto the Lord, Then the Egyptians shall hear it, . . . And they will tell it to the inhabitants of this land: for they hav heard that thou, Lord, art among this people; that thou, Lord, art seen face to face; and that thy cloud standeth over them; and that thou goest before them, by day-time in a pillar of cloud, and in a pillar of fire by night.—Num. xiv, 13-16.

Gems of Thought.

ECCLESIASTES said that "all is vanity;"
Most modern preachers say the same, or show it
By their examples of true Christianity.—Byron.

THE church in the days of Voltaire contended that its servants were the only legitimate physicians. The priests cured in the name of the church, and in the name of God—by exorcism, relics, water, salt, and oil. St. Valentine cured epilepsy, St. Gervasius was good for rheumatism S. Michael de Sanatis for cancer, St. Judas for coughs, St. Ovidius for deafness, St. Sebastian for poisonous bites. St. Apollonia for toothache, St. Clara for rheum in the eye, St. Hubert for hydrophobia. Devils were driven out with wax tapers, with incense, with holy water, by pronouncing prayers. The church, as late as the middle of the twelfth century, prohibited good Catholics from having anything to do with physicians.—Ingersoll.

PHYSICAL training was tolerated as a secular evil indispensable for such purposes of the church militant as the hunting of heretics and the invasion of Mussulman empires; but its essential importance was vehemently disclaimed; the superior merit of sacrificing health to the interests of a body-despising soul was constantly commended, and the founders of the monastic orders that superseded the pagan schools of philosophy did not hesitate to enforce their dogmas by aggressiv measures; the wretched convent slaves had to submit to weekly bleedings and strength-reducing penances; their novices were barbarously scourged for the clandestin indulgence of a lingering love for health-giving sports—wrestling in the vacant halls of their cloister prison, or racing conies on their way to their begging-rounds. The Olympic festivals were suppressed by order of a Christian emperor.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald's Bible of Nature.

EARTH, that nourished thee, shall claim
Thy growth, to be resolved to earth again;
And, lost each human trace, surrendering up
Thine individual being, shalt thou go
To mix forever with the elements;
To be a brother to the insensible rock,
And to the sluggish clod which the rude swain
Turns with his share and treads upon. The oak
Shall send his roots abroad and pierce thy mold.
Yet not to thy eternal resting-place
Shalt thou retire alone—nor couldst thou wish
Couch more magnificent.—Bryant.

WHAT thing more instituted to the solace and delight of man than marriage? And yet the misinterpreting of some scripture . . . hath changed the blessings of matrimony into a familiar and coinhabiting mischief—at least into a drooping and disconsolate household captivity, without refuge or redemption. . . . Now, if any two be but once banded in the church and hav tasted in any sort the nuptial bed, let them find themselvs never so mistaken in their dispositions, through any error, concealment, or misadventure, that through their different tempers, thoughts, and constitutions they can neither be to one another a remedy against loneliness nor liv in any union or contentment all their days; yet they shall, so they be found weaponed to the least possibility of sensual enjoyment, be made, spite of antipathy, to fadge together. . . . What a calamity is this!—Milton.

ON a vast social subject—that of divorce—Jesus pronounced an opinion which givs us a little insight into his mode of regarding that most important of all topics, the relations of the sexes. The Pharisees, it appears, came to him and asked him whether it was permissible for a man to put away his wife, Moses having allowed it. Jesus explained that this precept had been given for the hardness of their hearts. His own view was, that man and wife are one flesh, and that if either should leave the other, except on account of unfaithfulness, and marry again, that one would be guilty of adultery. This severe doctrin he supported by one of his short sayings: "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder" (Mark x, 1-12; Matt. xix, 1-12; and v, 31, 32). But surely this judgment assumes the very point at issue. The joining together in wedlock is ascribed to God; the putting asunder to man. But granting the sacredness of the marriage tie, it would still be no less possible to invoke the divine sanction for its dissolution than for its original formation. And in many instances the maxim might be exactly reversed. So unfortunate is the result of many marriages, that it would be easy for a religious reformer to say of them, with perfect sincerity, "What man hath joined together let God put asunder."—Lord Amberley.

O THAT the wise from their bright minds would kindle
Such lamps within the dome of this dim world,
That the pale name of priest might shrink and dwindle
Into the hell from which it first was hurled,
A scoff of impious pride from fiends impure;
Till human thoughts might kneel alone
Each before the judgment throne
Of its own aweless soul, or of the power unknown!
—Shelley.

Odds and Ends.

THE first assisted Italian immigrant to this country was a person named Christopher Columbus.

PHILADELPHIA girl at the seashore: "Do you ever find bottles which tell of wrecks?" Nativ: "Yes, mum, often—empty bottles."

QUEEN VICTORIA has not been cruising around Cowes for nothing. She has just been made president of the Royal Agricultural Society.

IN the porcine society of Chicago plutocracy they do not speak of a couple's becoming "engaged." They say they "plight their trough."

CITIZEN (to office-boy in counting room): "Your durned paper had an outrageous attack on me this morning, and——" Office-boy (briskly): "Yessir. How many copies will you hav?"

FIRST New Yorker: "Parnell seems to understand the Irish very well." Second New Yorker: "Indeed he does. He couldn't know more about them if he had lived all his life in New York."

SARATOGA belle: "You would scarcely believe it, Mr. Oldboy, but the lady seated near the open window has over two hundred dresses." Mr. Oldboy: "Is it possible? Why doesn't she put one of 'em on?"

ANGRY subscriber (to editor): "I'm mad all the way through, an' I want my paper stopped." Editor: "Yes, sir; do you want your bill made out?" Angry subscriber: "No; I ain't mad enough for that."

"YES, boys," said the retired naval officer, as he returned his glass to the bar, "the navy is improving. For instance, there is not so much drunkenness now as there was when I was in it." "No, indeed!" shouted the boys.

"YOUNG man," he said sonorously, "are you ever abroad in the early morning, when the great orb of day rises in all his majestic and brilliant glory?" "Well—er—yes, sir, sometimes," replied the young man, "but I generally try to get to bed earlier than that."

"MY beloved brethren," said a Dakota preacher from his pulpit, "on looking over the collection of last Sabbath morning, you can imagin my pleased surprise to discover therein a blue chip. Our dear brother, Deacon Dewrite, kindly cashed it in. The Lord loveth a cheerful giver."

SHE (in great agitation): "O George! I hear papa at the front gate, and he is very apt to be impulsiv when he comes home late." He (reassuringly): "Calm your fears, dear. I'm in the coal business, you know, and he has owed the firm money for coal for over nine months."

CUSTOMER (to grocer's boy): "Proprietor in?" Boy: "Yessir; he is in the back room readin' de news." Customer: "Is he a society man?" Boy: "No, sir; but he's got lots o' swell customers, an' he wants to find out when they're coming back to town. He's wery anxious to see some of 'em."

CUSTOMER (to Mr. Isaacstein): "That coat ain't worth seventeen dollars, Dutchy. I'll giv you six for it." Mr. Isaacstein: "Vas you a Republican?" Customer: "Yes." Mr. Isaacstein: "Und vote for Benjamin und Levi?" Customer: "Yes." Mr. Isaacstein: "My frent, you dake dot coat along for twelluf tollar. Dot vas a party sacrifice."

SIMPKINS: "I was grieved, Maria, to see Tommy looking over the morning papers to-day." Mrs. S.: "Why, I can't see what harm it can do the boy to keep informed on the questions of the day." Simpkins: "Madam, don't you know that I am running for office? I don't want my son to disown me."

OUR DISSENTIENT CHOIRS.

Minister: "Your daughter is very handsome, Mr. Snapper." Snapper: "Yes, she is. I'm thinking of having her join the church choir." Minister: "That's good. Is she a fine vocalist?" Snapper: "She can't sing at all, but she's got a devil of a temper."

IT was a New England deacon who said: "We are thankful for one spark of grace, and are confident that it will be watered." But it was a minister who one day announced to his congregation: "You will be sorry to hear that the little church at Janesville is once more tossed upon the waves a sheep without a shepherd."

FRED (to chum): "What luck, Charley? Congratulations in order?" Charley (faintly): "Fred, she told me that she loves another." Fred (sympathizingly): "That's tough, Charley, after all your devotion." Charley: "Tough? Why, Fred, in the past three months her father's dog has bitten me no less than seven times."

A MAN with the blue badge of temperance in his button-hole was addressing a Sunday-school in Michigan, and put this question: "Now, can any little boy or girl tell me why I do not drink, and why I am not a drunkard?" "I can," said a little fellow. "Very well, my boy; now speak right up, so all the children can hear; why is it?" "Because this is a Prohibition town!"

WOMAN: "Hav you been a tramp long?" Tramp: "Pretty much all my life, ma'am; it runs in the family. My poor old father was a professional for twenty-seven years, but the other day he struck big luck." Woman: "Did he come into an immense fortune?" Tramp: "Well—er—no; not quite. Some influential friends of his got him into the poorhouse."

SEASIDE pastor: "Short bathing costumes demoralizing spectacles? Really, sir, you amaze me! I had not noticed anything of the kind." Strange caller: "Such things might be and you not see them, you know. Surely you won't refuse to preach against them. Deliver a sermon that will make the walls resound—such a sermon as you did three years ago. You will do it, I hope?" "Certainly, certainly, sir; next Sunday." "Thank you; many, many thanks. I will hav your sermons reported in all the city papers." "You? Are you an editor?" "No, sir. I am the proprietor of the Sea Foam Hotel, and if we don't do something to start an excitement I'll be bankrupt."

THE SPIDER AND THE FLY.

Notes and Clippings.

A GODLESS religion, consisting simply in doing good to men, is really no religion at all. He who calls it such uses the wrong word.—Independent.

PENNSYLVANIA has some girls worth having. In the haying season a gentleman during a short drive counted nine young women driving two-horse mowers, and seventeen managing horse-rakes.

THE Boston school controversy over Catholic indulgences suggests to the Christian Register that there are certain Protestant indulgences that ought to be stopped, such as permitting a man to stay at home and read the Sunday paper when he ought to be at church.

THE Woman's Journal says: "Women owe much to Courtlandt Palmer, of New York, who established the club known as the 'Nineteenth Century,' the privileges of which were equally shared by men and women. This is one of the best prophecies of our time, even as the great increase of the popularity of clubs open only to men is a menace to the unity and happiness of home life."

A MAINE veteran applied at the state agency in Augusta the other day for a pension, on the ground that he was a drunkard. The agent thought it a good joke. "You grant pensions for disability contracted in the army?" asked the applicant. "Yes." "Well, drunkenness is a disability, isn't it?" "Yes; I guess so." "Well, drunkenness is my disability. I contracted it in the army, and I want a pension."

A NEW glass recently invented in Sweden is said to be capable, when made into a lens for a microscope, of "enabling us to distinguish the 204,700,000th part of an inch." It is also said that there is great promis of this glass producing wonderfully powerful telescope lenses and a new departure in astronomy.

REFUTING the assertion that meat diet causes cancer, Surgeon-Major Hendley reports from India that out of 102 operations for cancer performed at Jeypore since 1880, forty-one were on the persons of meat-eaters and sixty-one on those of strict vegetarians, who had not known the taste of meat from their births.

THERE is no more important question, says Freethought, for Liberals to consider just now than that of organization. A large and strong organization will lead outsiders to inquire our objects, and will furnish renewed opportunities for setting them forth. Following this the whole of the claims of Freethought must be stated and reiterated. Organization for action will alone make it possible for us to gain the attention of the whole country.

AT the camp-meeting in Douglas, Mass., the other day a man arose and said that he was a recently escaped convict from the Rhode Island state prison, that he had determined to lead a better life, and that as a beginning he should go back to the prison and serve the remainder of his term. The prison chaplain was present and heard him, and knowing something of human nature, helped the convict in his good resolution by telephoning for officers and capturing him before he weakened.

ACCORDING to Brother Watterson's reliable newspaper, Kentucky has six counties—Harlan, Knott, Perry, Letcher, Bell, and Leslie—that hav never had a church within their borders during the sixty or seventy years of their existence as counties.

THE managers and directors of a real estate exchange in New York giv an emphatic indorsement to the employment of women as clerks and assistants. Women, under the direct supervision of Manager Benjamin Hardwick, do the clerical work in all the departments. They are bright-faced and earnest, and business seems to run smoothly where they are concerned.

SPEAKING of the late Courtlandt Palmer's directions for the cremation of his remains, a New York correspondent of the Rochester Democrat says: "Cremation eventually must become the custom in our large cities. At present three thousand acres are absorbed by cemeteries in the suburbs of this city; and Greenwood, which has the greatest run of interments, will eventually be indicted as a nuisance. The noxious effluvium is already felt in South Brooklyn, and naturally must increase."

AN authority on laughter says: "It has been observed that laughter is indicativ of a particular kind of temper and character, according to the sound of the vowel that prevails in cachinnation. Persons that laugh in a broad Latin A are open-hearted, honest people, fond of noisy jocundity, but perhaps of voluble mood. Excessiv, jerking laughter, however, is an evidence of vulgarity. Those laughing in a dry A are respectable, but little expansiv, and a hard lot of people. When the Latin E prevails there prevails also a phlegmatic, melancholy temper. Timorous, unsteady people, also those imbued with malignity, laugh in a kind of swelling I. Laughter in O is the utterance of bold, imperativ, somewhat bantering people. Beware of those that laugh in oo (U). They are traitors, haters, scorners.

A RECENT act of Vicar-General Prendergast, of San Francisco, shows how much respect the Catholic church has for either the laws of the state or the laws of nature. For a sum of money to him in hand paid he granted a dispensation whereby Joseph Bijani was allowed to marry his niece. The groom took the girl and a priest aboard a tug and went outside the jurisdiction of the United States and had the ceremony performed on the high seas. This was done under the sanction of a church which declares that the marriage of divorced persons is illicit!

THE Jewish Messenger givs the trading politicians a rebuff so far as the Jewish vote is concerned, which it declares to be a myth when considered as an aggregate influence. "There are," it says, "unhappily, many synagog-goers who do not appreciate their obligations as citizens, and vote blindly, as do their neighbors who attend church, and there are tricksters among the Jews, no less, in proportion than among classes of Christians, who trade on the credulity of party managers and candidates; but it is time that the latter fully understand the futility of reaching the 'Jewish vote;' it cannot be cajoled, forced, bought, or sold, because it has no existence as such. There are Democratic Jews, Republican Jews, and many Mugwump Jews; but we doubt if there are any Jews in the Prohibition ranks."

Secularism and the Knights of Labor.

Colonel Ingersoll in Secular Thought.

Colonel, what is your opinion of Secularism. Do you regard it as a religion?

I understand that the word Secularism embraces everything that is of any real interest or value to the human race. I take it for granted that everybody will admit that well-being is the only good; that is to say, that it is impossible to conceive of anything of real value that does not tend either to preserve or to increase the happiness of some sentient being.

Secularism, therefore, covers the entire territory. It fills the circumference of human knowledge and of human effort. It is, you may say, the religion of this world; but if there is another world, it is necessarily the religion of that as well.

Man finds himself in this world naked and hungry. He needs food, raiment, shelter. He finds himself filled with almost innumerable wants. To gratify these wants is the principal business of life. To gratify them without interfering with other people is the course pursued by all honest men.

Secularism teaches us to be good here and now. I know of nothing better than goodness. Secularism teaches us to be just here and now. It is impossible to be juster than just. Man can be as just in this world as in any other, and justice must be the same in all worlds.

Secularism teaches a man to be generous, and generosity is certainly as good here as it can be anywhere else. Secularism teaches a man to be charitable, and certainly charity is as beautiful in this world and in this short life as it could be were man immortal.

But orthodox people insist that there is something higher than Secularism; but, as a matter of fact, the mind of man can conceive of nothing better, nothing higher, nothing more spiritual, than goodness, justice, generosity, charity. Neither has the mind of man been capable of finding a nobler incentiv to action than human love.

Secularism has to do with every possible relation. It says to the young man and to the young woman: "Don't marry unless you can take care of yourselvs and your children."

It says to the parents: "Liv for your children; put forth every effort to the end that your children may know more than you—that they may be better and grander than you."

Secularism says: "You hav no right to bring children into the world that you are not able to educate and feed and clothe."

Secularism says to those who hav diseases that can be transmitted to children: "Do not marry; do not become parents; do not perpetuate suffering, deformity, agony, imbecility, insanity, poverty, wretchedness."

Secularism tells all children to do the best they can for their parents—to discharge every duty and every obligation.

Secularism defines the relation that should exist between husband and wife; between parent and child; between the citizen and the nation. And not only that, but between nations.

Secularism is a religion that is to be used everywhere and at all times—that is to be taught everywhere and practiced at all times. It is not a religion that is so dangerous that it must be kept out of the schools; it is not a religion so dangerous that it must be kept out of politics. It belongs in the schools; it belongs at the polls. It is the business of Secularism to teach every child; to teach every voter. It is its business to discuss all political problems, and to decide all questions that affect the rights or the happiness of a human being.

Orthodox religion is a firebrand; it must be kept out of the schools; it must be kept out of politics. All the churches unite in saying that orthodox religion is not for every-day use. The Catholics object to any Protestant religion being taught to children. Protestants object to any Catholic religion being taught to children. But the Secularist wants his religion taught to all; and his religion can produce no feeling, for the reason that it consists of facts—of truths. And all of it is important; important for the child, important for the parent, important for the politician—for the president—for all in power; important to every legislator, to every professional man, to every laborer and to every farmer—that is to say, to every human being.

The great benefit of Secularism is that it appeals to the reason of every man. It asks every man to think for himself. It does not threaten punishment if a man thinks, but it offers a reward, for fear that he will not think.

It does not say, "You will be damned in another world if you think." But it says, "You will be damned in this world if you do not think."

Secularism preserves the manhood and the womanhood of all. It says to each human being: "Stand upon your own feet. Count one! Examin for yourself. Investigate, observe, think. Express your opinion. Stand by your judgment, unless you are convinced you are wrong, and when you are convinced you can maintain and preserve your manhood or your womanhood only by admitting that you were wrong."

It is impossible that the whole world should agree on one creed. It may be impossible that any two human beings can agree exactly in religious belief. Secularism teaches that each one must take care of himself; that the first duty of man is to himself, to the end that he may be not only useful to himself, but to others. He who fails to take care of himself becomes a burden. The first duty of man is not to be a burden.

Every Secularist can giv a reason for his creed. First of all, he believes in work—taking care of himself. He believes in the cultivation of the intellect, to the end that he may take advantage of the forces of Nature—to the end that he may be clothed and fed and sheltered.

He also believes in giving to every other human being every right that he claims for himself. He does not depend on prayer. He has no confidence in ghosts or phantoms. He knows nothing of another world. He knows just as little of a first cause, but what little he does know he endeavors to use, and to use for the benefit of himself and others.

He knows that he sustains certain relations to other sentient beings, and he endeavors to add to the aggregate of human joy. He is his own church, his own priest, his own clergyman, and his own pope. He decides for himself; in other words, he is a free man.

He also has a Bible, and this Bible embraces all the good and true things that hav been written, no matter by whom or in what language or in what time. He accepts everything that he believes to be true, and rejects all that he thinks is false. He knows that nothing is added to the probability of an event because there has been an account of it written and printed.

All that has been said that is true is part of his Bible. Every splendid and noble thought, every good word, every kind action—all these you will find in his Bible. And, in addition to these, all that is absolutely known—that has been demonstrated—belongs to the Secularist. All the inventions, machines—everything that has been of assistance to the human race—belongs to his religion.

The Secularist is in possession of everything that man has. He is deprived only of that which man never had.

The orthodox world believes in ghosts and phantoms, in dreams and prayers, in miracles and monstrosities; that is to say, in modern theology. But these things do not exist, or if they do exist, it is impossible for a human being to ascertain the fact.

Secularism has no "castles in Spain." It has no glorified fog. It depends upon realities, upon demonstrations; and its end and aim is to make this world better every day—to do away with poverty and crime, and to cover the world with happy and contented homes.

Let me say, right here, that a few years ago the Secular Hall at Leicester, Eng., was opened by a speech from George Jacob Holyoake entitled, "Secularism a Religion." I hav never read anything better on the subject of Secularism than this address. It is so clear and so manly that I do not see how any human being can read it without becoming convinced and almost enraptured.

Let me quote a few lines from this address:

The mind of man would die if it were not for thought, and were thought suppressed God would rule over a world of idiots.

Nature feeds thought, day and night, with a million hands.

To think is a duty, because it is a man's duty not to be a fool.

If man does not think himself, he is an intellectual pauper, living upon the truth acquired by others, and making no contribution himself in return. He has no ideas but such as he obtains by "outdoor relief," and he goes about the world with a charity mind.

The more thinkers there are in the world, the more truth there is in the world.

Progress can only walk in the footsteps of Conviction.

Coercion in thought is not progress; it reduces to ignominious pulp the backbone of the mind.

By religion I mean the simple creed of deed and duty, by which a man seeks his own welfare in his own way, with an honest and fair regard to the welfare and ways of others.

In these thinking and practical days, men demand a religion of daily life which stands on a business footing.

I think nothing could be much better than the following, which shows the exact relation that orthodox religion sustains to the actual wants of human beings:

The churches administer a system of foreign affairs.

Secularism dwells in a land of its own. It dwells in a land of Certitude.

In the kingdom of thought there is no conquest over man, but over foolishness only.

I will not quote more, but hope all who read this will read the address of Mr. Holyoake, who has, in my judgment, defined Secularism with the greatest possible clearness.

What, in your opinion, are the best possible means to spread this gospel or religion of Secularism?

This can only be done by the cultivation of the mind—only through intelligence—because we are fighting only the monsters of the mind. The phantoms whom we are endeavoring to destroy do not exist; they are all imaginary. They liv in that undeveloped or unexplored part of the mind that belongs to barbarism.

I hav sometimes thought that a certain portion of the mind is cultivated, so that it rises above the surrounding faculties, and is like some peak that has lifted itself above the clouds, while all the valleys below are dark or dim with mist and cloud. It is in this valley region, amid these mists, beneath these clouds, that these monsters and phantoms are born. And there they will remain until the mind sheds light—until the brain is developed.

One exceedingly important thing is to teach man that his mind has limitations; that there are walls that he cannot scale—that he cannot pierce—that he cannot dig under. When a man finds the limitations of his own mind, he knows that other people's minds hav limitations. Then, instead of believing what the priest says, he asks the priest questions. In a few moments he finds that the priest has been drawing on his imagination for what is beyond the wall. Consequently he finds that the priest knows no more than he, and it is impossible that he should know more than he.

An ignorant man has not the slightest suspicion of what a superior man may do. Consequently he is liable to become the victim of the intelligent and cunning. A man wholly unacquainted with chemistry, after having been shown a few wonders, is ready to believe anything. But a chemist who knows something of the limitations of that science—who knows what chemists hav done and who knows the nature of things—cannot be imposed upon. When no one can be imposed upon, orthodox religion cannot exist. It is an imposture, and there must be impostors and there must be victims, or the religion cannot be a success.

Secularism cannot be a success, universally, as long as there is an impostor or a victim. This is the difference: The foundation of orthodox religion is imposture. The foundation of Secularism is demonstration. Just to the extent that a man knows, he becomes a Secularist.

What do you think of the action of the Knights of Labor in Indiana in turning out one of their members because he was an Atheist, and because he objected to the reading of the Bible at lodge meetings, and hav you read the account?

I hav. In my judgment, the Knights of Labor hav made a great mistake. They want liberty for themselvs—they feel that, to a certain extent, they hav been enslaved and robbed. If they want liberty, they should be willing to giv liberty to others. Certainly one of their members has the same right to his opinion with regard to the existence of a God that the other members hav to theirs.

I do not blame this man for doubting the existence of a supreme being, provided he understands the history of liberty. When a man takes into consideration the fact that for many thousands of years labor was unpaid, nearly all of it being done by slaves, and that millions and hundreds of millions of human beings were bought and sold the same as cattle, and that during all that time the religions of the world upheld the practice, and the priests of the countless unknown Gods insisted that the institution of slavery was divine—I do not wonder that he comes to the conclusion that perhaps, after all, there is no supreme being—at least none who pays any particular attention to the affairs of this world.

If one will read the history of the slave trade, of the cruelties practiced, of the lives sacrificed, of the tortures inflicted, he will at once wonder why "a God of infinit goodness and wisdom" did not interfere just a little; or, at least, why he did not deny that he was in favor of the trade.

Here, in our own country, millions of men were enslaved, and hundreds and thousands of ministers stood up in their pulpits, with their Bibles in front of them, and proceeded to show that slavery was about the only institution that they were absolutely certain was divine. And they proved it by reading passages from this very Bible that the Knights of Labor in Indiana are anxious to hav read in their meetings.

For their benefit, let me call their attention to a few passages, and suggest that, hereafter, they read those passages at every meeting, for the purpose of convincing all the Knights that the Lord is on the side of those who work for a living:

"Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids which thou shalt hav, shall be of the heathen round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids.

"Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families which are with you, which they begat in your land; and they shall be your possession.

"And ye shall take them as an inheritance, for your children after you to inherit them for a possession. They shall be your bondmen forever."

Nothing seems more natural to me than that a man who believes that labor should be free, and that he who works should be free, should come to the conclusion that the passages above quoted are not entirely on his side.

I don't see why people should be in favor of free bodies who are not also in favor of free minds. If the mind is to remain in imprisonment, it is hardly worth while to free the body.

If a man has the right to labor, he certainly has the right to use his mind, because without mind he can do no labor. As a rule, the more mind he has, the more valuable his labor is, and the freer his mind is the more valuable it is.

If the Knights of Labor expect to accomplish anything in this world, they must do it by thinking. They must hav reason on their side, and the only way they can do anything by thinking is to allow each other to think.

Let all the men who do not believe in the inspiration of the Bible leave the Knights of Labor and I do not know how many would be left. But I am perfectly certain that those left would accomplish very little, simply for the lack of sense.

Intelligent clergymen hav abandoned the idea of penal inspiration. The best ministers in the country admit that the Bible is full of mistakes, and while many of them are forced to say that slavery is upheld by the Old Testament, they also insist that slavery was and is, and forever will be, wrong.

What hav the Knights of Labor to do with a question of religion? What business is it of theirs who believes or disbelieves in the religion of the day?

Nobody can defend the rights of labor without defending the right to think.

I hope that in time these Knights will become intelligent enough to read in their meetings something of importance; something that applies to this century; something that will throw a little light on questions under discussion at the present time. The idea of men engaged in a kind of revolution reading from Leviticus, Deuteronomy, and Haggai, for the purpose of determining the rights of workingmen in the nineteenth century!

No wonder such men hav been swallowed by the whale of monopoly. And no wonder that, while they are in the belly of this fish, they insist on casting out a man with sense enough to understand the situation!

The Knights of Labor hav made a mistake, and the sooner they reverse their action the better for all concerned. Nothing should be taught in this world that somebody does not know. R. G. Ingersoll.

Is There a God?

By God, the intelligent reader will not understand me to mean the God of Moses, the God of Paul, or the God of Mohammed, but rather that supreme and unknown power which controls the workings of nature. Taken in this sense, I find the proofs of a God's existence in the same sciences whereby the Atheists are wont to disprove it. That this God ever demonstrates his existence to us by special marks of divine favor or displeasure, I will not attempt to assert. On the contrary, I think it far more reasonable to hold that he originally set the universe in motion, in accordance with certain infallible laws, and then left it to take care of itself. Do not understand that I contend for the masculinity of God; I only take the same liberty of personification which I would in applying the feminin pronoun to nature.

Suppose that some one in traveling come upon a mysterious machine which sets itself in motion and stops at pleasure, which supplies itself with the fuel necessary for continued activity, and which communicates intelligent ideas to other similar machines, will anyone believe that this wonderful machine has sprung into existence by mere chance? "Oh!" says the Atheist, "it is not chance which has produced your machine, but the methodical operations of the laws of nature for millions of years." Its first progenitor was a mere mass of undifferentiated protoplasm possessed of contractil, irritable, automatic, receptiv, assimilativ, metabolic, secretory, respiratory, and reproductiv powers. This through past ages has evoluted into what we call man. This fine array of big words takes my breath away, but, I say, what caused these laws of nature to be laws? I think you unconsciously ascribe to nature the same properties I ascribe to God. Whence arose the protoplasm? Did it just spring into existence spontaneously after the cooling of the earth? Why is it that at this day scientists hav utterly failed to produce spontaneous generation of even the simplest forms of animal and vegetable life? I think you will hav to admit with our Christian friends that the day of miracles is past. However, admitting all this to be correct, did these wonderful laws hav no originator? It is impossible to conceive of the existence of time, and perhaps of matter, but no scientist would undertake to claim that matter has always existed in its present state; hence, is it not at least possible to suppose that matter once obeyed other laws? If evolution be a general truth, why cannot nature's laws evolute also? Though her laws are invariable, they certainly do not in millions of cases work best for individuals. May we not, therefore, suppose that they were once more imperfect than now, and that in the course of ages they may be gradually perfected? At any rate, it reduces the position to an absurdity to assume that such remarkable laws emanated from nothing. As to protoplasm, I say of a God who can make living protoplasm out of a peculiar combination of elements, and by causing it to observe a code of infrangible laws through countless ages, develop it into a human being, is he not as great as the God who makes a man of mud, leans him against the palings to dry, and then breathes the breath of life into him? I think we assume entirely too much when we say that evolution explains the mystery of creation. It merely offers us a reasonable explanation of some obscure points, without our getting any nearer the first cause than we were before.

Let us now take a brief glance at astronomy. Every planet of our solar system has its distance from the sun, its orbit, its period of revolution around the sun, its length of day and night, and these are practically invariable. Some of these planets hav in turn satellites which obey equally fixed laws. This is wonderful, but when we consider that each fixed star is a sun with his system, and that the telescope reveals to us that there is apparently no end to these suns, we get entirely beyond our mental grasp. "That's all true," says our Atheist, "but what of it? These suns, planets and satellites simply obey the law of gravitation." Very good; but what causes this law? "Oh, it's an inherent property of matter to attract other matter." Well, I'm about as wise as I was before. When Newton "discovered" the attraction of gravitation he only gave a name to what was already known. What he really discovered was the law of gravitation, and, by bringing his mathematical mind to bear upon the workings of this law, he accomplished wonders. For this no one reveres him more than I; yet he never told us why matter attracts matter. Being a Christian, he probably took it for granted that the law had come into existence by some creativ agency unknown and unknowable to him; and in this I heartily concur with him. For the sake of argument, however, let us imagin that gravitation just "naturally" exists. Then, I ask, how does it happen that the weights and distances of the planets are so nicely adjusted? I confess that I cannot understand what the Atheist means, but he dumfounds one with something about chaos, terrible heat, splitting up into masses, etc. Did it happen, then, just by accident that these molten masses bore such definit relations to one another? Suppose you charge a gun so heavily that it explodes on firing; will the size of the fragments follow any other rule than that of least resistance? Is it not much more sensible to suppose that an intelligent power superintended things about that time?

Let us now descend at one step from the boundless to the infinitesimal; from astronomy to chemistry. The laws governing chemical action are quite as wonderful as those regulating the movements of the celestial bodies; though, indeed, they are not nearly so well understood, the explanations usually given being, for the most part, only well-framed theories. Yet we know enough to tell that it is a science of such wonderful exactitude as hardly to be excelled by mathematics itself. Why do chlorine and sodium, for instance, invariably combine in the same proportion, and why is the compound thus formed so widely different from either element? We hav the atomic theory, but if this be correct, we are but little further advanced toward the bottom facts than before. It is very easy to say that certain elements hav certain atomic weights, and so on, but it is quite another matter to make us understand how such an element came to hav these properties, or how it could hav existed at all without a creator.

In like manner, what has been said concerning evolution, astronomy, and chemistry might be applied to every other science under the sun. The only argument opposed to my views is that, according to my own idea, this wonderful God must himself hav had a creator. This is a certainly a clincher, to which I can only say that such questions as this would upset any system of theology. I do not claim to hav advanced a single new idea. All I wish is to call the attention of Atheists to what they hav neglected, and that is, to giv an explanation of how matter came to exist without a first cause. Macbeth.

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

WHAT IS THE GOOD OF IT?

As a quondam believer in the divine origin of the Christian religion, I can look back without prejudice on the records of a tolerably long life, and inquire, not what I hav done for Christianity, but—which has a far more personal importance—What has Christianity done for me? Many of the contemporaries of my youth hug the flattering delusion that for the last fifty years they hav been preaching "Christ," and instrumental in bringing many souls into the fold of the church. But if we inquire what effect the "good work" has had upon the preachers themselvs, we are met by the fact that one and all are either driveling imbecils or crafty worldlings, still hammering over the A B C of their spiritual childhood, or constructing false rules in the grammar of their language to make it mean that which it meaneth not. That genuin Christianity, as taught by Jesus himself, is utterly impracticable, is demonstrated in the life and practice of all so-called Christians, including the very best of them. A sincere truth seeker, entering the fold of the church, may go from pillar to post until he has made the complete circuit of the churches without finding that which he wants. It sometimes happens that he settles down with some obscure and unpopular sect, whose members hav a crank similar to his own. But if he hav judgment and perseverance, he soon finds the bed too short and the covering too narrow (Isa. xxviii, 20). Sooner or later the earnest inquirer after truth will find himself floating in the boundless ocean of Freethought, or stranded on the terra firma of common sense. If he drink deep of the fountain of ancient wisdom, it is only to find that the ancients knew no more than himself, and were for the most part even farther from the perception of their own ignorance. A really wise man never yet set himself up as a teacher or founded a sect. Any fool can teach religion, and fools are the most apt pupils. They receive it with the greatest facility, and hold it with the greatest tenacity. But it is a popular mistake that religion conduces to morality, or makes men chaste and honest who are constitutionally otherwise. In fact, religion is offered as a substitute for morality. Thieves and prostitutes, prodigal sons and adulterous wives—of such are the kingdom of heaven. The "righteousness" required is that of another; the punishment inflicted is suffered vicariously! These are the fundamental doctrins of the Christian church. Decent, honest, and law-abiding people cannot participate in the promised benefits, unless they pose as "miserable sinners" and class themselvs with the "ungodly." What can be more illogical and absurd than to offer a premium on vice and depravity, either real or assumed, and leave honest virtue out in the cold? We usually find the fraudulent debtor, the pitiless creditor, and, of course, the lascivious preacher among the members and supporters of the Christian church. It would, perhaps, be unkind to deny to the frail sisterhood the consolation of religion, if they can find consolation therein, but if they would lead a new life and see good days, let them beware of clerical consolers. "Christian love" is Eros in the disguise of a lamb, creeping into houses and leading captiv silly women, laden with divers lusts (2 Tim. iii, 6). The ancient Greeks were more outspoken in their amours, but when they built a temple for Aphrodite, they did not dedicate it to Jesus Christ. They did not debauch their proselytes under pretense of making them fit for the kingdom of heaven. I hav already shown what the kingdom of heaven—a kingdom of air and emptiness—is worth in this world. The reward of the faithful depends on a promissory note or post obit payable in the world to come! It is an ingenious way the parsons hav of getting rid of their debts, knowing that their creditor will be unable to protest the bill when it arrives at maturity. What can be said in favor or extenuation of a fraud so palpable and barefaced?

No mistake can be greater than to suppose that the Bible furnishes a rule of life and conduct. Taken separately, here and there are scraps of poetry, history, and philosophy perhaps as good as any to be found in the writers of antiquity, but as a whole it is a mass of absurdity and contradictions. There is not a crime in the calendar, recognized as such by the common law of a civilized nation, but may be justified by an appeal to the supposed law of God. Bigamists, adulterers, thieves, and murderers may adduce as an apology for their misdeeds the examples of men supposed to be special favorits of the almighty. Mormonism is as scriptural as Methodism, and equally moral. The Mormon takes too many wives of his own; the Methodist consoles himself with the wives of other men. It is a nice point for casuists to decide, whether a bigamist or an adulterer is the greater scoundrel of the two.

According to popular belief, the government of the world is theocratic. The question arises, Who or what is the God? The Bible reveals to us God the father as a sanguinary despot; the Testament shows us God the son as an unpractical crank and a failure. Neither of them fortunately has anything to do with the government of the world at present, except by self-nominated and self-appointed proxies. But the proxies do not agree among themselvs, which induces a grave suspicion that they are all spurious. Moreover, they practice neither the sanguinary code of the Old Testament nor the self-denying ethics of the New. The so-called "gospel" is in fact a purely human invention, begotten by priestcraft out of superstition. How that which is fundamentally false and practically vicious can be productiv of any good effects, I leave to abler logicians to decide. Outis.

The Oaths Bill Read Three Times.

From the Pall Mall Gazette.

Mr. Bradlaugh, after shepherding his rather mixed flock into the lobby, was able to read out the triumphant numbers of 147 to 60. Finis coronat opus. The Oaths bill has been read a third time. And all parties were ready to honor the indomitable grit which has carried it to its goal.

Mr. Washburn, of Massachusetts.

From San Francisco Freethought.

As next president of the American Secular Union the choice seems to be centering on Mr. L. K. Washburn, of Massachusetts. The selection is a natural and fitting one.

Official Call for Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Local Secular Unions, Life, Charter, and Annual Members, and all Liberal citizens who support the Nine Demands of Secularism, Greeting:

You are hereby invited to attend the Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, which will convene at Lafayette Hall, Wood street, near 4th, Pittsburgh, Pa., Friday, October 5, 1888, at 10 A.M., for a four days' session—5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th inclusiv.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State or Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Unions are entitled to seats and votes in this Annual Congress. Each Local Secular Union is entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates. Annual Members who pay or hav paid $1 in the national treasury are entitled to seats, but not to votes, except by unanimous consent of the Congress.

This Congress will specially consider practical questions tending to further agitation for taxation of church property; the abrogation of state aid to sectarian institutions; abolition of state, national, military, and prison chaplaincies; repeal of judicial oaths, Sunday and other oppressiv and unjust ecclesiastical laws; nullification of attempts to subvert our Constitution by a legal recognition of Theism in the American Magna Charta, and such other measures as will not merely thwart intended theological encroachments, but will absolutely expunge from our laws, state and federal, such insidious acts as hav already crept in to blot out mental freedom from our republic.

It is to be hoped that the addresses delivered will deal with the practical issues of the organization, so that there will be such an awakening of the people to these vital questions of the hour that a revival of the instinct of liberty and justice for all will necessarily result; that again from the Keystone state—the birthplace of our association—the clarion voice of freedom shall vibrate throughout the land.

Pittsburgh being situated almost in the center of a district containing many of our most distinguished workers, thinkers, and writers, besides the activ host within its limits, there is little doubt but that this Congress will be a glorious gathering of the forces who stand for mental liberty, as expressed in the desire for complete Secularization of the government.

About the Pittsburgh Congress.

WHO WILL BE PRESENT.

First among those who will be present is he whose voice and pen hav thrilled the Liberals of this country from the rock-bound coast of New England to the Pacific's golden shores; who inspires his hearers and readers to activly espouse the Secular cause; whose ceaseless energies bestowed on our Union entitle him to rank as the "peerless"—our poet pre-eminent and genial president, Samuel P. Putnam, of Freethought.

If years of unpaid, incessant, unselfish devotion of talents of the highest order to the upbuilding of the Secular cause entitle anyone to our thanks, that person is the bright, brave little moral heroin who has won enduring fame in literature as well as on the rostrum, and of whom we of Chicago are justly proud, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, chairman of the finance committee. She has specially prepared a lecture for this Congress entitled, "Cross and Crown."

To Chas. Watts, editor of Secular Thought, all, I think, will concede the palm as our most powerful and effectiv lecturer and keen debater. For twenty-five years he has stood foremost as a champion of Freethought in his own country, and is certainly unrivaled in this. His address will be, "Religion and Science—Their Relation to Civilization."

One of the best workers for the Liberal cause, who performed marvelous service in Michigan in the early history of our movement, was Brother J. H. Burnham. As a profound student and thinker he has few equals, and his lectures and essays are among the most logical specimens of Liberal literature. Brother Burnham will instruct us in the matter of "organization."

I heard L. K. Washburn, of Boston, lecture but once, but hav longed for a repetition of that experience, for it certainly was one of the most faultless, forcible, and ornate pieces of rhetoric I hav listened to from a Liberal rostrum. He possesses a charming voice and has a masterly delivery. Washburn's discourse is, "The Christian Menace to Our Republic;" and he will represent the Investigator.

Voltairine de Cleyre, of Grand Rapids, Mich., at our invitation made her first appearance at the last Chicago Congress as a Liberal lecturer, and has since been activly employed. Having been educated at a convent school, from which she graduated with honors, she possesses many accomplishments, and as a poetic writer has earned distinction. Her subject will be, "The Drama of the Nineteenth Century."

Prof. W. S. Bell, one of the pioneer lecturers, who is preparing a text-book for Freethinkers, and is the author of "The Conflict between Christianity and Civilization," "Liberty and Morality," "The Sunday Question," and "Anti-Prohibition," will be present, and deliver an address on "Common Sense vs. Superstition."

Prof. D. G. Crow, for years principal of schools in Illinois, New Mexico, and the Indian Territory, and a scientist of note, is also about to enter the Secular lecture field. He is coming all the way from Fort Supply, Indian Terr., at his own expense, to hear the old pioneers, to meet those with whom he expects to labor, and determin what course he will pursue. He says neither pressing business nor greatest distance will keep him away from the Congress. Such determined devotion deserves to succeed.

Last in the list of those who "certainly" are expected to be present, but by no means the least on the rostrum, is our gallant co-worker from Texas, J. D. Shaw, editor of the Independent Pulpit, whose clarion tones are rousing into activity the hitherto scattered elements of Freethought in the South, and whose splendid services in that forbidding field are worthy of all praise. Brother Shaw's lecture will be, "Civilization and Its Causes."

EXPECTED TO BE PRESENT.

The hero of Abolitionism, that intrepid figure so prominent in the greatest epoch of American history, whose name still stands like a statue of liberty, and to whom love and reverence are due from all Freethinkers for her fight for freedom, Lucy Colman, will if present favor us with at least a brief address. This will be a splendid opportunity to salute this brave champion of Freethought.

Whatever of success the American Secular Union has attained is due more largely than to any other circumstance to the unswerving encouragement and support it has received from one individual, who has placed a department at the disposal of the secretary, no matter how crowded his columns, and thus—in spite of opposition—has been the mainstay of the organization; and to him we owe a big vote of thanks. He will be "taken' notes ameng us, and i' faith he'll prent 'em," so it behooves us to be on our best behavior. I allude to the Editorial genius of THE TRUTH SEEKER, "'Gene."

When the biographies of Freethought philosophers are written, high among the Eliots and Comtes, the Spencers and the Mills, will be the name of the distinguished American representativ of Positivism, Thaddeus Burr Wakeman, who for years was our president, and to whom Courtlandt Palmer left a legacy to assist in the publication of his works. As we are to take some action as to whether we shall endeavor to wrest Girard College from its shameful perversion, Mr. Wakeman, who is familiar with that subject, will be able to giv us the necessary information.

Helen H. Gardener, who has justly won renown as the author of "Men, Women and Gods," who is so widely and favorably known in the Freethought lecture field, and whose presentation of the ablest paper ("Sex in Brain") at the Woman's International Congress created such a furore and set Washington society agog, will be deterred from attendance only—if at all—by severe physical disability. We hope she will be present.

The intellectual head of the progressiv women of America, if not of the world, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, was to hav lectured, but we regret to learn she can not endure a long journey. She will, however, send a letter in which she will present a Woman Suffrage view from a Freethought standpoint. Mrs. Stanton and Helen Gardener are preparing a "Woman's Bible."

Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, of Kansas City, one of our vice-presidents, who was distinguished as a professional speaker before her marriage with the lamented judge, is expected to lecture.

Next to Colonel Ingersoll, John E. Remsburg is better known to the Freethinkers of this country than any other Liberal lecturer, and his pamphlets are more widely circulated. A universal favorit is John E. If possible, he will speak on "Sabbath Breaking."

In deference to the many Spiritualists who giv their aid and support to the American Secular Union, Mrs. Amelia Colby, a wonderfully powerful speaker who is a great favorit with our Pittsburgh friends, will be present.

H. L. Green, the veteran worker, is doing as valiant service in the publication of his most excellent magazine for the Secular cause as when he was famously energetic as chairman of the executiv board of the National Liberal League. He returns to the arms of his old love, although she has changed her name.

Then there will be the Drs. Foote (senior and junior), who, since our lamented Courtlandt Palmer has passed away, we look upon as our pillars. Requiring rest, they refuse to lecture, but their munificent liberality entitles their counsel to profound consideration.

Our noble, open-hearted friend, Leonard Geiger, will certainly be present, accompanied by his generous coadjutor and brother life-member, J. A. Smith.

Dr. Lespinasse will come from Orange City, Iowa, as will also be present from Kokomo, Ind., our worthy friend Willis, both life-members.

Brother Goodbe, president of the Salt Lake Secular Union, one of the most distinguished citizens of that territory, will endeavor to be present.

Chas. Eckhard, treasurer of the association, will, we presume, be on hand to render an account of his stewardship.

The Hon. A. B. Bradford, of Enon Valley, one of the philosophical, yet radical, Nestors of the Secular cause, will be present.

Jas. E. Emerson, of Beaver Falls, who presented the Pittsburgh society with the splendid ideal portrait of Thomas Paine, of the design of which he was the author, will attend, but it is to be regretted that an accident has greatly impaired his health.

Dr. E. A. Wood, who is the president of the Pittsburgh Medical Society, and who has favored our friends with several Radical lectures, will, without doubt, be present, as will hosts of other prominent Freethinkers, we hope.

THE ROLL OF HONOR.

Joseph Haigh, Chebanse, Ill.	$5.00
John Engstrom, Aspen, Col.	5.00
Almond Owen, Milwaukee, Wis.	5.00
John F. Plow, Chelsea, Mass.	5.00
Wm. Bondies Forney, Tex.	5.00
Clinton, Ill.	5.00
Jeremiah Rubright, Locust Dale, Pa. (charter fee)	5.00
Thos. Knight, Ceresco, Mich.	5.00
John Mahara, Charles City, Ia.	2.00
M. H. J. de Crane, Orange City, Ia.	1.00
D. van de Merwede Quarles van Ufford, Orange City, Ia.	1.00
Chas. Neumann, Locust Dale, Pa.	1.00
John Hudson, Chicago, Ill.	1.00

Joseph Haigh has acquired fame as a Freethought poet, especially for his ever-pertinent inquiry as to "Why Doesn't God Kill the Devil?" His last effort, "Creation According to the Bible," is highly descriptiv, ironical, and philosophic. The moral which adorns the tale is that the—

> Poor, God-forsaken human race,
> Left to their own resources,
> Hav turned their thoughts to worldly things,
> And found out nature's forces.
> They learned the laws of life and health,
> A boon to everyone,
> And earth is now a better world
> Since Gods and ghosts are gone.

Brother Haigh subscribes $5 and is full of hope for the Union's future, flatteringly terming us a "success."

Though a life-member, John Engstrom still continues to contribute $5 annually toward the life of the organization to which he proudly refers as "the noble American Secular Union." Friend Engstrom has not become so mentally enervated that he does not see the absolute necessity for a devoted work which can only be effectiv through a chain of organizations. Such Liberals as Engstrom giv us courage to press on to ultimate triumph.

A sturdy veteran whose eighty-three winters—a good many of them the Wisconsin product at that—hav not chilled his enthusiasm, and who though slightly infirm in body is thoroughly sound in mind, forwards $5 and some valuable suggestions which we hope may hav weight at the coming Congress. We concur that "every Liberal who has a decent living should take at least one Liberal paper." If every Liberal did that, the American Secular Union would be a powerful body indeed, and the papers could afford to send out the lecturers at their own expense.

Brother Owen believes in the Nine Demands, and knows how they should be sustained. Where are all the rest of Milwaukee's Freethinkers?

Another old hero of Ceresco, Mich, who, though nearly eighty-three, still seems filled with a wonderful fire and energy for Freethought, responds with $5, rejoicing that the American Secular Union is showing an aggressiv front. Afraid, as he puts it, "that old people are liable to drop off," he hastens to insure his share of duty being duly performed, closing with, "Yours with big hope, Thos. Knight." May his life be as long and pleasant as he could possibly wish.

The products of Plow's art tile works are well-known to connoisseurs, and Mr. J. F. Plow forwards us $5 and hopes that the coming Congress may be successful, and that more adherents to the Nine Demands will be the result; he sincerely subscribes himself a friend of universal mental liberty. Art and evolution should go hand in hand, for Christian vandalism almost obliterated the former in the Middle Ages.

From Forney, Texas, Wm. Bondies sends words of cheer and practical help. He considers the Christian religion a very powerful enemy to human liberty, and it givs him pleasure to contribute to an organized effort to compass its defeat, and he proposes to keep up the entertainment at stated intervals. His letters hav the ring of the true Radical. We hope that many other Liberals will find huge enjoyment in the same way.

Some modest Liberal sent us a $5 postal order without a word from Clinton, Ill. It looks like some of Brother J. A. Greenhill's generosity; at least, he is our "suspect." Whoever it is, he has our thanks.

Jeremiah Rubright, of Locust Dale, Pa., secures the necessary signatures and applies for a charter, so that we may hope that this new society will doubtless be represented at Pittsburgh. Chas. Newman, besides being one of their local society members, sends us an annual membership fee.

John Mahara, of Charles City, Iowa, whom we met at the last congress, has a real Liberal household, for we had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Mahara, her sturdy son and intellectual daughter, with whom we spent a couple of pleasant hours the other evening. Brother Mahara forwards us $2 for the cause.

M. H. J. de Crane, a cultured gentleman of Orange City, takes an annual membership this year, and we are pleased to welcome him to our ranks. It seems as though Dr. Lespinasse had gone into the recruiting service, as the next is also from Orange City.

It is not often the card of an applicant for membership bears the crest of a noble house, but such is the case with D. van Merwede Quarles van Ufford, who also pledges $5 from now on each year to assist in the advancement of the Nine Demands, which he fully indorses. It is far better to belong to the intellectual "aristocracy of Freethought" than to depend on inheritance.

My friend, John Hudson, besides helping the local society, takes an annual membership in the American Secular Union. Hudson is one of our most enthusiastic Chicago workers, and possesses no mean ability as a versifier and writer.

P. S.—There are a number of persons whose pledges made at the last congress hav not been fulfilled. When this meets your eye do not lose a moment in discharging your obligation. This is your last chance to do your duty. I should receive it, if possible, before September 20th. As the expenses the last two months hav been unusually heavy, I hope there will be many other responses, and, at least, that there will be no delinquents. To those who hav pledged for next year's work I wish to return thanks, and notify all such that money will be acknowledged upon receipt. E. A. Stevens, Sec. A. S. U.

The American Secular Union.

The lack of any definit plan has occasioned lack of harmony, and is the reason of lack of success.

But it is vain to bemoan the past. We can only console ourselvs with the experience gained, and profit as best we may by the mistakes made. All are liable to error in judgment, therefore let us giv full credit to all for having done the very best they could under the circumstances.

Mr. Putnam's declining re-election necessitates a change of officers, but a change of officers can never of itself effect the needed change in the practical work of the organization. True, much depends on the president, and very much more on the secretary, but it is not enough that these officers possess ability, energy, and perseverance; for all must concede the possession of these qualities in the highest degree by our retiring president. The most able and efficient officers will surely fail of success unless the great body of Liberals hav full confidence in their plan of work, as well as in their character and ability. What is needed is a plain statement of aims and objects, and an equally plain statement of plans and methods by which it is proposed to obtain them.

It is very generally conceded that we need a national organization of Liberals devoted to the secularization of our government, whose chief aim shall be the securing of the Nine Demands, thus insuring equal rights and privileges to all, regardless of religious faith or the lack of it, and the total separation of church and state, and the repeal of any and every law that infringes the rights of conscience or favors any practice in the name of religion, or aught else that interferes with private right or the public welfare; and, secondly, to aid Liberals and their children to greater advancement in all that pertains to truth, science and sociability.

The mooted questions are:

Should the national organization use its best endeavors to perfect and carry out practical methods by which to aid and establish local Liberal societies?

Should the national organization use its funds in furnishing local societies leaflets suggesting a basis of by-laws, duties of officers and committees, telling how to make regular weekly meetings interesting to old and young, how to conduct science school on Sunday without a teacher, how to conduct extempore speaking class, how to provide amusements and increase sociability, so that the local Liberal society shall in all things be superior to church and Sunday-school?

Should the national organization aid and help sustain the infant society, or should the infant society at birth contribute to the sustenance of the parent society?

Should the national organization prepare and issue leaflets that not alone expose the fallacies and false claims of Christianity, but especially educate the masses to a knowledge of the justice of the Nine Demands, proving that it is to the best interest of all to help secure them?

Should the national organization use every possible endeavor to induce women not alone to become members of local Liberal societies, but to become officers, leaders, and enthusiastic co-workers for the cause?

Should the national organization hav able men and women—earnest, experienced local workers—for officers, and leave the lecturers free to devote their every effort to the field where they are so much needed?

Should the national organization do all in its power, unofficially, to insure the speedy organization of a Liberal cooperativ insurance society, to be independent and separate from the national organization, so that we can carry out our principles of justice, love, and mercy, thus making provision for the widows and orphans of Liberals?

It is not enough to hav good and noble purposes; they must be practically, faithfully, persistently worked for.

Only by agitation, by free and full discussion, by awakening thought and comparing ideas, can we hope to attain the much needed practical organization.

There must be unity of purpose, harmonious working, prompted by the conviction that we are all striving for definit aims and objects by practical methods—methods that hav the hearty approval of the leading workers, after full discussion and deliberation, and therefore indorsed and zealously carried out by the great body of Liberals. C. B. Reynolds.

Mr. Everett's Charge Against the Knights.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Inclosed please find pamphlet, "Concern of All is to Injure One," which I hav published to be presented to the general assembly of the Knights of Labor at Indianapolis in November. I would like the address of every Freethinker that is a delegate from either a district or local assembly, to whom I will send a copy. Soon after I commenced the publication of this pamphlet I was interviewed by a correspondent of the New York Star, which report went the rounds of the press, resulting in so changing the public feeling here that I hav work, the first I hav been able to procure in over two years.

The inclosed clipping will furnish inspiration for a suggestiv cartoon from Friend Heston. Furthermore, only two miles from this city, at the poorhouse of this county, an illegitimate child of this same Elder Jordan is being supported by the county, and the father engaged in pulling the wool over a few more black sheep's eyes. Great is Christianity of the Wabashites! Arthur C. Everett.

THE CLIPPING.

The colored people of this section will engage in some novel religious exercises at Smith's grove, in LaGro, six miles from Wabash, August 26th, when Elder Jordan will preach a sermon on "The Return of the Prodigal Calf." It is proposed to giv the sermon a measure of dramatic interest by following it with a representation of the prodigal son and the feast of the fatted calf. It will be a genuin roast calf, and the hungry prodigal will be enacted by a wild-eyed Wabash barber named Jordan, whose appetite, though constructed with a preference for roast coon, is warranted to do justice to the roasted calf. After Brother Jordan has done justice to the calf the remains will be served to everybody on the ground. In the evening there will be a grand march with orchestral accompaniment and climacteric effects to represen t the twelve tribes of Israel crossing the river Jordan and the laying of the twelve memorial stones. The barbecue is expected to draw a crowd.—Wabash Times.

Our London Letter.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The recent articles in the North American Review on Christianity hav been read with considerable interest by many on this side the Atlantic, but possibly with less satisfaction by the religionists than by their opponents. Mr. Gladstone should by this time hav fully satisfied himself that his defense of this particular creed has not helped it in any way, and it would be wise on his part to refrain from entering the arena again with such a formidable antagonist as the unconquerable American exponent of Freethought. All the organs of the party hav had lengthy articles on the controversy, while the orthodox papers hav kept pretty quiet over the matter. They certainly hav not much cause of congratulation on the result of the combat, and can scarcely be very thankful to their self-appointed champion for his trouble in getting the fallacies of the Christian religion so thoroughly exposed. The only consolation he can hav is that he is no worse off than others who hav entered the lists in the same hopeless cause. If, however, he is like the generality of his fellow-believers, he is too thick-skinned to understand how thoroughly he has been defeated on all points, and may yet take another opportunity to try a further fall, though the result is bound to be the same.

The members of the metropolitan board of works are nothing if not pious, and hav endeavored just lately to giv a little assistance to the church by prohibiting collections at public meetings in the public parks. It appears to be a sinful act to collect money in the open air, and a good one to do the same thing in a covered building so long as it is one of God's houses. Of course, it is wicked to take money at lecture halls on Sunday, but although efforts hav been made to prevent it being done, so far they hav failed. It is interesting to note that notwithstanding the inquiry now going on respecting the rascality of certain of the members, the chairman of this sink of iniquity laid the foundation-stone of a church in London last week, and made a most saintly speech at the time.

It has often caused wonder to those who scoff at godly things why there are so many bishops, particularly colonial ones, but it appears that they are of use in attending conferences at Lambeth Palace, and banquets at the Mansion House. No doubt they make a very fine show in full canonicals, though their lawn sleeves must be rather in the way during feeding operations, though handy when playing cards if they are given to the practices of the Heathen Chinee immortalized by Bret Harte. J. D.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. Bell will lecture in Ashland, Ky., September 28th, 29th, 30th; Cannelton, W. Va., October 3d; Kanawha Falls, W. Va., October 4th.

C. B. Reynolds will lecture at Ellensburgh, Wash. Terr., September 7th, 8th, 9th; Walla Walla, 10th, 11th, 12th; Ogden, Utah, 15th, 16th; Hooper, 21st; Salt Lake City, 23d; Morgan, 24th, 25th; Uintah, 26th; Echo, 27th; Coalville, 28th, 29th; Salt Lake City, 30th.

Jno. Geo. Hertwig, of Washington, D. C., desires to lecture during the coming winter, and solicits engagements for this purpose. In religious matters he is an absolute Freethinker, and as to public questions generally, he is a thorough Radical. He was born in Germany, where he received a collegiate and university education, and has lived in the United States thirty years. He will lecture in English. His address is, P. O. Box 706, Washington, D. C.

The Agnostic and the Editor.

"Who is the great editor, pa, who won't allow Mr. Ingersoll's name to be mentioned in his paper?"

"That great editor, my son, is George Washington Childs, A.M., P.O.B., and P.Q. (Poor Old Bigot and Pious Quack), of the City of Brotherly Love, as ironically named."

"Is he a very good man, pa?"

"He is truly good, my son, truly good; in short, he is the personification, per se, of goodness on earth!"

"Then he is as good and holy as God, isn't he, pa?"

"Quite as holy, my son, and of superior goodness, most assuredly."

"How is he superior in goodness to God, pa?"

"Because, my son, he would, in his great righteousness, had he the power, wipe Colonel Ingersoll, the Prince of Agnostics, off the face of the earth in three shakes of a lamb's tail, whereas God permits the colonel to liv and move and hav his being here, and even shake the pillars of his church!"

"Why, it seems to me, pa, that God is a better man than George Washington Childs, A.S.S., P.D.Q., and N.G."

"You don't understand matters, my son. You don't appreciate that quality of goodness which looks only to the welfare of the church, via intolerance and persecution."

"Oh, I think I see, pa. To be intolerant and persecuting is to be good—the more so, the more truly good; eh, pa?"

"Yes, my son; from religion's standpoint that is the case, the Christian religion particularly considered."

"Yes, pa. Would George Washington Childs, with the long alphabetical tail——"

"My son, never stoop to levity when discussing truly good men or their merits."

"No, pa. Would this truly good editor, who livs in the City of Brotherly Love, and who won't mention Colonel Ingersoll in his holy paper—would he wipe the colonel off the face of the earth, pa, if he could?"

"Most assuredly, my son. Given the power, and this truly good and great editor of the City of Brotherly Love would at once proceed to hump himself, when this sublunary sphere would be found to be too circumscribed for the Great Editor and the Great Agnostic; and then, at one fell swoop, as it were, would the G. A. be stamped out by the G. E., the places that know him knowing him no more forever! Of such timbre is the truly good Christian, my son—even the truly good Christian editor—and of such timbre, happily for Agnostics and Infidels, is the kingdom of heaven!"

"Yes. pa. I am glad that George Washington Childs, P.D.Q X.Y.Z. &c., has not the power to stamp out Colonel Ingersoll."

"Ah! that is because you are not truly Christian, my son, and because you cannot truly say from your heart of hearts, Down with Agnosticism and Infidelity, and up with the beneficent Christian Church—more power to its mighty arm! Retire, my son. You weary me with your benighted understanding and conception of churchly affairs. Go."

Only One Question for the Church.

From the Freeman's Journal.

The tariff is a burning question. But the real question for us is, how shall we make good Catholics and good citizens of our children? We must send them to Catholic schools and put some religion into politics by protesting in season and out of season that Catholics must hav their educational rights. It is an outrage against the essential principles of American institutions. Good Christians are the best citizens. As Americans, we cannot approve by our silence of godless education. We must not let silence seem to be consent.

God and the Bible.

SOLOMON'S SONG.

Let this composition be carefully studied. I think every unbiased mind will agree with me that for lasciviousness it has no equal.

ISAIAH.

Chap. xiii, 16: "Their children shall be dashed to pieces before their eyes, their houses shall be spoiled, and their wives ravished."

If the object in educating the young be to uproot the last vestige of humanity—to dull the finer feelings and make brutality take the place of human sympathy—such lessons will hav the desired effect. Is it any wonder that a belief in the Bible has turned men into monsters and made them torture and murder each other?

Chap. xlii, 13, 14: "The Lord shall go forth as a mighty man; he shall stir up jealousy like a man of war, he shall cry, yea, roar: I hav long time holden my peace; I hav been still and refrained myself. Now will I cry like a travailing woman. I will destroy and devour at once."

Does such language become a God? If a man should be guilty of such an outburst of passion, would he not lower himself in the estimation of all good men? God never spoke such words, nor authorized anyone to write them. The people were very ignorant and had not yet outgrown many savage traits, and they put into the mouth of their God words which expressed the brutal feelings by which they were actuated.

And so the Bible and all other sacred writings are made up. We read the "Song of Solomon," and reasonable it is to suppose that just such a salacious old cur should write just such a song. The Bible simply reflects the state of society when and where it originated, and sets forth the temper and disposition of a people whose example it would not be wisdom to follow.

Chap. xlvii, 2: "Take millstones and grind meal, uncover thy locks, make bare the leg, uncover the thigh."

Does anyone want to ponder a great while to find out that God never wrote such trashy nonsense as that? I ask the reader to consider the claim put up by Christians that the Bible is far above any production which ever emanated from a human brain. No; all the great writers, ancient and modern, could never produce anything which would compare with the above. Shakspere and Dryden must throw up the sponge. God alone can write about bare legs and uncovered thighs. And as Anthony has such an aversion to the nude in nature, he ought to arrest God for writing the above and for his exhibition to Moses.

JEREMIAH.

Chap. v, 8: "They were as fed horses. Every man neighed after his neighbor's wife." I commend this passage to the consideration of the priesthood and the ministry. After reading the crimes of preachers, perhaps they will be able to make a spiritual application of it.

JOEL.

Chap. xiii, 16: "Their infants shall be dashed in pieces, and their women with child ripped up."

First indecent, and then barbaric. If there is a type of innocence, it is a young child. Would a merciful God dash a young child to pieces, or commit the double murder of ripping up a woman with child? Is this the way God manifests his mercy and loving kindness to the children of men?

Pause for a moment and consider this question. Is it more reasonable to believe that God uttered such language, or that some bloodthirsty monster wanted to terrorize the people by making them believe that God said so?

Now I hav gone hastily over the ground in this article, and could the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the disadvantages under which I hav labored, I know they would be very charitable in their criticisms. But, to any clear-sighted mind, I think I hav established the following facts:

1. That the state of society was such in Bible times that it would hardly be considered half-civilized at the present day. Perhaps the condition of society could not be better represented than by the Bedouins of Arabia.

2. That the holy men of those times were very bad men. Though they may hav been considered good men in their day, they would not be considered such now, as their system of polygamy and concubinage, their wars and inhuman acts, sufficiently show. They were tyrannical, treacherous, and savage, as well as superstitious.

3. That it is very unreasonable to believe that God ever talked with those men any more than he talks with men now. There is very convincing evidence that the masses were very ignorant, and that their leaders, these so-called holy men, could sway the people more effectually by telling them that their commands came from God. In other words, that, in giving their savage and brutal orders, the people would the more readily obey if they could be made to believe that they were carrying out the will of God.

4. That women were greatly imposed upon by so-called heavenly messengers. It is just as impossible for a woman to hav a child by an angel or spirit or ghost as it would be for one of the lower animals. Every child that was ever born was begotten by a progenitor—a "father of its kind."

5. That women had no rights which were respected by the men. That they were bought and sold and "taken," and treated little better than slaves.

6. That the big stories in the Bible, like that of the flood and the children of Israel passing through the Red sea and turning the waters of Egypt into blood, etc., were probably believed to be true when written. But if it were possible to go back to the time and converse with those who recorded them, we should find that even then they were traditionary. The writers themselvs would be able to giv no dates. All that could be learned would be that they happened in the "long ago." And if we could get back far enough we should come to the vanishing point, viz., where nobody knows anything about them.

To find out the exact time and place when and where they happened would be as difficult as to mark out the exact "snow line" between a cold and a warm climate.

7. That God had no more to do with writing the Bible than he had with writing any other book. The sacred-book business has been too much overdone to giv to any one book particular significance. There are too many peoples who hav God-written books, each claiming that God gave his especial attention to their particular book, but ignoring all the rest.

The claim put up by Christians that man could not write such a book is without foundation. In fact, man has written many better books. In fact, most books written in latter times are above it in point of literary merit. The stories in Sindbad the Sailor and Gulliver's Travels and Baron Munchausen are fully up to the Samson story and the Jonah story, and the story about building a tower to reach to heaven, and that of blowing down walls of solid masonry with rams' horns, and told in better style. As for the morals of the Bible, I think Utah will compare favorably with Palestine, and he is a bad man indeed whose morals are below those of King David.

8. That Christianity has always retarded human progress in proportion to its power, and always will. There is no sincere Christian who helps on the world's progress to any great extent. His mind is occupied with another world more than with this, and as far as his influence goes, he fashions the minds of others to correspond with his own. If a priest or minister has ever made an important discovery or brought out any useful invention, the fact has not come to my knowledge.

There are ninety thousand men in this country who are constantly interested in the affairs of another world, and consequently not much interested in the affairs of this world. To hav all men engaged in like manner would be to take us back to the Dark Ages. If the minds of the seventy thousand could be turned to the affairs of this world, and the influence which they now exert were used to induce others to study and work for the world's good, what an impetus would be given to human progress! But the world is made no better by studying the Bible and saying prayers.

It is science which has shed the richest blessings on mankind, and not Christianity. Sincere Christians are not, and never hav been, the promoters of science. Everyone who believes that a perfect God has written a perfect book will be trying to shape everything to his book, and it will be a sorry day for the world when science is made to square with the Bible. It is a strange fact that scientists and Christians are always found pulling in the opposit direction. I am afraid that Liberals do not duly consider the cost of Christianity to the world. Science and Christianity hav never been co-workers. As the one goes up the other goes down—they never can triumph together. This being the fact, the world's progress must depend upon which side of the battle succeeds. The trend of Christianity is back to primitiv times; that of science, in the direction of progress and better conditions. Oswald says that "Christianity always marches behind." True, but if it were not pricked on by the onward sweep of civilization it would not march forward at all.

It is the discoveries of the scientists, and the application of such discoveries to the bettering of human conditions, which hav produced the difference between the state of society at the present time and that of society in the Dark Ages. These discoveries hav not only carried the world forward, but they hav supplied the motiv power to drag Christianity after them; Christianity not only "marches behind," but its eyes are always turned to the rear.

If Christians think these statements unfair or untrue, let them answer the following questions: Who burnt Bruno, and for what was he burnt? Who persecuted Copernicus, and Galileo, and Priestley, and hundreds of others who could be mentioned? What has been the condition of society in every country where Christianity has held undisputed sway?

Christians not unfrequently refer to this country, and claim that it is a Christian country, and the grandest on the face of the globe. But they should be reminded that we are not indebted to Christianity for what we enjoy, but to such men as Paine and Jefferson, Adams and Franklin, who were anything but orthodox Christians. They even go so far as to claim that ours is a Christian government, and make thousands believe it. The fact that they are constantly trying to get the Bible into the schools, and God into the Constitution, shows that they are trying to make the government what they now know it is not. Let them succeed in their plans and then will be realized what I hav so much tried to establish, viz., that the traction and tendency of Christianity are backward, and that every advance movement is a test of Christian strength, for its force is always exerted in the opposit direction.

Let their hope be realized and their boast will be carried out. The Comstocks will multiply; the Freethought papers will be "stamped out;" Liberals will become so discreet as to remain silent, or be compelled to share the fate of poor Bennett. Giv the Christians a chance for a retrograde movement and they will take to it as ducks do to water.

Can anyone expect a man loaded with dead weight to win the race? Neither can the progressiv minds of the age accomplish their full mission until they are cut loose from the clog of Christianity.

Naples, N. Y. JOHN PECK.

A Promis of Proof.

Oh, we are querulous creatures! Little less
Than all things can suffice to make us happy,
And little more than nothing is enough
To discontent us.—Coleridge.

In her article headed, "Kindliness and Truth," Mrs. Slenker commences by saying: "It seems almost impossible to make an article so impersonal that some one will not feel as if trodden upon and wish to turn and sting you."

As it is evident that this applies to me, I propose showing Mrs. Slenker that it is she, and not I, who is trying to do the stinging.

In my article published in THE TRUTH SEEKER June 16th, I called the lady to order on account of her exhibition of a spirit of unfairness, and claimed then, and claim now, that it is the same spirit which makes religionists so intolerant; the same spirit which pervades many so-called scientific societies; a spirit which assumes that its possessor, and he alone, has all the truth, and nothing but the truth, and positivly refuses to investigate opposing claims.

Now, I hold that the word "impossible" should be stricken from our language. I do not remember ever having met a man, or woman either, who was mentally qualified to determin the possibility or impossibility of anything. Any given occurrence may be improbable, but still there is a possibility of its having happened.

Omniscience alone can determin such a thing, and it would not be very difficult to prove that omniscience and idiocy are synonymous terms.

"It requires not only candor, but courage, to accept a fact," says Ingersoll. "When a new fact is found it is generally denied, resisted, and calumniated by the conservativs, until denial becomes absurd, and then they accept it with the statement that they always supposed it was true."

The various Spiritual phenomena take place daily. No two mediums seem to be developed alike; no two circles are held under the same conditions. Yet Mrs. Slenker assures us that they are "impossible" and "incredible." That Wallace, Varley, Crookes, and other scientists may "hav been just as incompetent, from bias, heredity, and other influences," as "many a lesser light."

Correct. But let us carry this a step further. If one of her many correspondents were to ask Mrs. Slenker the distance from the earth to the sun, she would giv the exact number of miles according to the latest scientific declaration, without inquiring into the "bias, heredity, or other influences" of her authority. And why?

And does the "bias, heredity, and other influences" theory only apply to Mr. Burr when treating of the Spiritual phenomena? Why not to "Antichrist" in his antiquarian researches? Is "Antichrist" more observant than W. H. Burr?

But before I go any further, I wish to assure the lady that I am not "angered even to a bitter enmity." I simply take exception to her position, as it is incompatible with the principles of Liberalism, as I understand them; and I think that, being a pronounced Liberal myself, I hav a right to object to a Liberal writer and teacher of youth walking hand in hand with the Brooklyn Hippodromist.

None of us is perfect; we all hav our prejudices, and if Mrs. Slenker were to indulge in an occasional introspection, it is not altogether impossible that she might find herself equally incompetent to judge of the Spiritual phenomena, owing to "bias," if not to "heredity and other influences."

Moreover, articles such as hers do an incalculable amount of harm, engender bad feelings among Liberals, and cannot possibly be productiv of good.

Not many months ago, a writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER remarked: "All Spiritualists are Infidels; but all Infidels are not Spiritualists." This is practically true. Those of us who are not Infidels are new-comers from the church, bringing some of their old superstitions and trying to engraft them on our philosophy.

We are all Liberally inclined; invite honest investigation; try not to be dogmatic, and are willing to assist in his investigations any non-omniscient inquirer. We are numerous, for, according to a statement made at the last church congress, we number over ten millions in the United States alone. If true, this would make us stronger than all the Christian sects combined.

Now, why cannot there be more harmony among us? I say us, for practically we are all in the same boat—all Infidels. United we would be a power, but as we now stand we are little less than nonentities.

I know many Spiritualists who would eagerly join the American Secular Union, for they are in perfect accord with its claims, and would willingly contribute to its success. But they are deterred—and why should they not be?

Liberal lecturers, without investigation, cry down their claims, and Liberal writers, forgetting the very fundamentals of their own philosophy, pronounce the phenomena "impossible," or that, from "bias, heredity, and other influences," the investigator is incapable of forming a correct opinion of what he sees and experiences.

This is a polite way of telling a man he is a fool, by throwing the onus on his progenitors, and no one, with the proper amount of self-respect, will care to associate with those who consider him their mental inferior.

So, if we could only manage to treat each other and each other's claims with consideration, there would be a possibility of our becoming united. We would then be a power, and would make ourselvs felt, and the Secularization of the states might be looked for in the immediate future.

From the comments made by various friends in THE TRUTH SEEKER, it is very evident that some of them hardly grasp the scope of this discussion.

There is no claim made that miracles are performed, or that there is anything supernatural about the phenomena. They are as natural as nature itself, and while there may be some who, from lack of education, are imbued with awe while witnessing them, yet, to the educated man—to the thinker—they appeal as simply a higher manifestation of man's power than is possessed by those of this sphere. They are simply the proof of the old saying: "Knowledge is power." They are proof to me, at least, of the truth of the theory of evolution.

The supernatural belongs only to the church. We Spiritualists hav no need for it, and I can candidly say that I hav never witnessed anything in any séance I hav ever attended that could not be accounted for by purely natural causes.

But it is the habit of some men, when attempting to combat an idea and being fully aware of their inability to cope with it unassisted, to quote from some illustrious author any passage which may seem to serve their purpose, regardless, possibly, of the context, or of other dogmatic ideas of the same writer, which are at variance with their own.

Thus: In the August 25th issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER I find the following:

KEY TO ESCAPE FROM SPIRITUALISM.

Is it more probable that nature should go out of her course, or that a man should tell a lie? We hav never seen, in our time, nature go out of her course; but we hav good reason to believe that millions of lies hav been told in the same time. It is, therefore, at least millions to one that the reporter of a miracle tells a lie.—Paine.

Is it more probable that eminent men should liv centuries in another sphere without acquiring a single new fact to communicate to us, or that a professional conjurer should perform legerdemain? We hav never seen, in our time, multitudes of able men pass ages unfruitfully; but we know that millions of tricks like those of mediums hav been performed by avowed prestidigitators in the same time. It is, therefore, at least millions to one that Spiritualistic phenomena are prestidigitators' tricks. BICKERSTAFF.

Now, these are Mr. Paine's ideas, and I most heartily agree with them; but the objection is to the direction in which Bickerstaff sends his shaft.

I should like to call his attention to the first page of "The Age of Reason," and thereon he will find the following, which, in order to be fraternal, I will call

KEY TO ESCAPE FROM MATERIALISM.

I believe in one God and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life.

Now, how far does Bickerstaff agree with Paine? Paine certainly was a religionist—a Unitarian—and the very fact of his advocacy of the existence of a God is proof of his belief in supernaturalism.

It seems strange to me that there is such an unconquerable opposition to Spiritualism among a certain class of Materialists. They fill the papers with denunciations of a philosophy which they call childish and therefore never hav studied; pronounce "impossible" and "incredible" what are facts to hundreds of thousands who are as intelligent as themselvs, and, claiming that as matter always existed, mind must of necessity be its product, are content with this easy solution to a very knotty subject, and determin, notwithstanding their acceptance of evolution, that in man's case alone nature's laws hav changed.

It may be gratifying for them to think, when they hav closed their eyes in the last, long sleep, that everything is ended. But to me it is different. As Mr. Ingersoll remarked, "Immortality is born of love;" and when I hav a philosophy supported by facts to sustain me, I prefer rejoicing in the thought that the day will come when I can rejoin those who hav passed on before me.

I do not propose answering any of Mrs. Slenker's questions. With due respect to the lady, she is not in the fight.

When a Liberal writer nails to her masthead the ensign:

> A man convinced against his will
> Is of the same opinion still, she simply writes herself out of the contest. I will waste no time in attempting to convince her against her will.

But, with any who are willing to ignore the word "impossible," and place "bias, heredity, and other influences" on the shelf alongside of Gladstone's "holy and reverential calm," I am willing to argue the claims of Spiritualism from a philosophical and scientific standpoint.

Now, in regard to the slate-writing business.

When I made the proposition to "George," I did it honestly, and no reader of the article can with justice accuse me of unfairness. I stated my position plainly, and was and am still willing to back up my proposition.

I hav had numerous experiences with slate-writing mediums, and, though not always successful, yet hav had sufficient evidence through this source to satisfy me. I consider it, if properly protected, as possibly the most convincing of the various forms of the phenomena.

I think it was in 1882 that the slate-writing medium A. H. Phillips was in New York. I had had a very successful sitting with him in Boston, and felt so thoroughly satisfied of his genuinness that I sent many of my friends to him on precisely the same terms that I proposed to "George."

I will relate one out of many. I had occasion to call on a lawyer friend, and after our business had been transacted, we dropped into a cosy chat.

He seemed dull and dispirited, and when, in the course of conversation, he blurted out that religion had ceased having any charms, any consolation for him, I was much surprised, for I remembered him as a very religious boy, and, as a man, had considered him such a strong and sincere religionist that I always avoided wounding his feelings with my Infidelity.

But I now announced my convictions, relating some of my experiences which so interested him that he exclaimed, "If I could only feel as you do, I would be the happiest man in this city."

I then made him my usual proposition. He accepted it; went out and bought two slates, and in his own office did just as I had requested "George" to do.

Wrapping them in paper, he went at once to see Phillips, agreeing in advance that, no matter what might be the result, he would bring them back to me unopened.

In less than two hours he returned and assured me that the slates had never left his possession, and that the medium had only just touched them with one hand. We then carefully examined the screws and other fastenings and found them intact.

My friend then opened the slates and on one was written the following message, as near as I can now remember:

My Dear Brother: You are shortly going to Chicago to attend to —— business. It is very important; more so than you will at first imagin. But if, at critical times, you will remain passiv, I can come near enough to impress you what to do, as you most certainly are very mediumistic.

Your affectionate brother,

My friend looked at the message in blank astonishment, reading it over and over again; expressions of incredulity ever and anon escaping him.

Finally we sat down to examin it critically, and he admitted having lost a brother of that name many years before, but knew nothing of the journey to Chicago, or of the law case.

Within a week he informed me that he had had the case given him and was preparing to start for Chicago.

Now, I reason that there could hav been no deceit in this case, for the simple reason that there was no possibility—nor was there an object for it. My friend paid the medium his fee, paid for the slates, paid for his ride up-town, lost two hours of time, and if he did it to play a joke, even supposing he could hav removed the set screws undetected, it was expensiv for him and perfectly harmless for me.

I regret that "George" has been unsuccessful, and agree with him that the action of Mr. Evans is unaccountable.

But, by this mail, I forward an open letter to a new medium, sending it via "George," and asking him not only to read, but to deliver it.

In this letter I hav made some suggestions which may facilitate matters, at least I hope so, as I am confident that the result can be obtained.

McARTHUR.

Hurrah for Protection!

The proper way in which to settle Alabama claims and Canadian difficulties: The capitalist who has a manufactory wants a protectiv import duty imposed upon all articles similar to those which he manufactures, and for many long years we average American gawkies in the Benighted States under the star-strangled banner hav been giving it to him, while he has been, and now is, importing his labor free of duty, contracting for and buying it wherever he could and can secure it for the lowest possible price.

The average laborer coming to the United States will, during life, perform labor to the extent of about $3,000. Therefore, to do equity to labor, by placing it upon an equal footing with capital, every laborer coming from a foreign country to the United States should be compelled to pay an admittance duty of $1,500, fifty per cent. This would protect our laborers.

The consumers within the country that levies import duties are the ones who pay those duties, while all export duties are paid by the consumers in foreign countries.

Before the war, Europe bought our cotton for ten cents per pound. During the war she paid $1 a pound for as much of it as she could get. Were we to blockade our Southern ports again now, Europe would pay at least seventy-five cents per pound for as much of our cotton as she could get.

Now, why, in the name of common sense and commercial ability, don't we amend our United States Constitution and levy an export duty of about ten cents per pound on our cotton? Had we done so from the close of the war till now, we must hav been benefited to the extent of at least $4,000,000,000. Europe could not hav competed with us in the sale of cotton goods in any country on earth, our cotton mills would hav been running on a grand scale, and all our poor people would hav been busy as bees and at good wages. And instead of working for foreigners, foreigners would hav been working for us. And instead of being such an oppressed people that many are only too glad to return to poverty-stricken Italy, we would hav been a very prosperous and happy people.

In 1867 I chartered a small schooner at Vera Cruz, Mexico, took her up to Nautla, loaded her up with coffee, took that coffee to Galveston, Tex., and sold it to Messrs. Haus and Gengler of that city. I paid—no, the consumers of that coffee paid five cents per pound import duty on it to Mr. J. O. Kishpaugh, collector of customs at Galveston. Some time thereafter our Congress took off that five cents per pound import duty on coffee, but the price of coffee did not fall any in the Benighted States, because Brazil then levied an export duty on coffee, and the average American gawky has been compelled to pay that export duty into the treasury of Brazil to sustain a monarchy in America.

Now the question is: How much money did Brazil use to bribe our Congress to do such iniquity?

New York, July 4, 1888. GEORGE NEWTON.

Reason and Sense.

There are four geological ages, namely, the primary, the secondary, the tertiary, and the quaternary. And there are four psychological ages, to wit, the fetich, the mythological, the Materialistic, and the scientific. The true scientist will not ignore phenomena that transcend the known laws of Nature. Fetichism cannot reason; superstition will not. Don't trust your reason, says the deluded Christian. Don't trust your senses, says the dogmatic Materialist. Science will create a new earth and a new heaven over the tertiary stratification of Materialism.

The Glory of the Freethinker.

No one who has once entered the Freethought ranks need aspire to anything higher—there is nothing higher; none who enters the service of humanity need wish a grander distinction—he could find none grander though acclaimed by a thousand multitudes and shining and splendid with all the insignia in the gift of kings.

Let us throw a glance upon one aspect of the Freethinker's glory. Let us survey the order of which he becomes a member—the band into which the Freethought worker steps as brother and peer.

The world's great patriots, heroes, and martyrs, its philanthropists, scientists, and philosophers illustrious to the close of time, are the ones into whose fellowship gloriously enters that individual, no matter who or where, whose tender heart has felt for the struggles and sufferings of his race a pang of pity and who with earnest and honest thought has then wrought out one useful truth to destroy the wrongs and frauds that pierce mankind. Diderot and Schiller, Hegel and Schopenhauer, Bentham and Hobbes—these are the men whom he may consider himself clasping by hand. Galileo and Servetus, Comte and Descartes, Leibnitz and Spinoza—it is such as these that welcome him to the ranks of the benefactors of man. If a Freethinker be repulsed and dispirited by unreason and spite, let him be cheered and enheartened—around him float the dear and inspiring memories of Owen and of Lewes, of Amberley and Hume, of Volney and Rousseau, of Garibaldi and Mill. If he feel weak and helpless amid a blind and unreasoning rabble in city streets, let him think: So lonely and musing walked Copernicus; so was it with Kneeland; thus unpopular and unminded trod Phillips and Garrison, Massey and Godwin, Wollstonecraft and Sand. If he be a country-dweller, let him say, thoughtful at the handle of the plow: Around me are seen the houses of the stupid and the obstructiv, the barbarous and the brainless, but by me in the field walk the manes of Bruno and of Bolingbroke, of Shaftesbury and Clifford, of D'Holbach and Locke. By such a one on the hill or in the grove let him see the kindly visage of Parker, Kant's great brow, D'Alembert with bowed head pacing to and fro, the gracious aspect of George Eliot, that devoted spirit that brooded over mankind's pains and woes with a motherly compassion painful and unspeakable, and the sad and thoughtful eye of Paine seeking some altar on which to be offered up for mankind. If he be one of those hoping the immortality of our dead in other spheres, sublime must it be to reflect at each stout blow for reason: At this there will be a smile on Voltaire's face—for this deed is there now approval in the gaze of Fourier—now am I ennobled by a benediction from Emerson's pure lips.

With that affectionate and sensitiv spirit, expatriated by Christian calumniatiors and boorish bigots, who closed in the uniform of liberty-seeking Greece a life spent in seeking one worthy of his love—Byron. With that sweet and gentle soul, convulsivly struggling beneath time's mountainous growths of wrong—Shelley. With that great luminous personality, glancing like a demigod over every field of man's labor and life, grave and sad with the error and anguish there beheld—Goethe. With that splendid champion of Spain's oppressed and wronged, the silver-tongued consecrator of the memories of liberty's heroes and eloquent defender of Byron's fame—Castelar. With that grand old hero, patient and painstaking, laborious and irresistible, signal victor over orthodoxy's hosts—Darwin. With that great civilizer, and expositor of the age's accumulated truth, simple yet profound, minute yet all-comprehensiv—Spencer. With those beneficent promoters of progress and disseminators of helpful knowledge whom all coming generations shall rise and call blessed—Tyndall, Huxley, Youmans, Lecky, Draper, Buckle. With that kindly and earnest worker for humanity's good so lately gone from our side—Courtlandt Palmer. With Robert Ingersoll. With these it is the superb and illustrious privilege of the Rationalist, no matter how humble his gifts or sphere, to work as a loved and honored brother, and finally to take his place, bathed in all the streaming glories of the heavens, sublime on the blazoned hights where stand the band ever thanked and remembered as lovers and benefactors of their kind by women and children and men.

Our State Church.

Still our money continues to be stolen from our pockets to serve the purposes of superstition-pedlers; still the hard-earned pennies of every American toiler go to the aid and comfort of the known and necessary foes of every American principle and maxim of free government; still each Secularist may strike his spade and swing his scythe with the cheering thought that each blow and each stroke tumbles a coin into the treasury of the joy-destroying creed he hates.

How much is being done to secure our freedom from Christian taxes, and the refusal of our funds to sectarian schools turning the young of the land into our bitter enemies? The evils of this sectarian support are incalculable. Every youth as he grows and receives his lessons in manly affairs from those around him, asks: "And why don't the churches pay taxes like the rest?" "Because of their value in teaching morality, which renders them indispensable to the state." Here is sown the seed of years of perverted thinking. And what a pure and unsupported assumption—what a monstrous and obvious untruth—is the statement that the church promotes in the least degree—to the most infinitesimal amount—the morals of the community! Leaving out of question the Freethinker's absolute knowledge that it is of all enemies to morals the most powerful and insidious, of all causes of ignorance and crime the most prolific; and decently asking for proof, before we giv up our money to it, of some perceptible good effect on conduct, what possible iota of proof can Christians giv? Let Freethinkers argue this matter with their neighbors, and ask them to clear away from before their eyes the obscuring veil of early-taught tradition and look about them to see with their own faculties, with their own honest perceptions, among their own friends, whether the Infidels average a bit lower in goodness and justice than the Christians. Let the Christians be told to pick up the first book of travels they see and try to attend for a minute with unclouded mind to the facts there stated, and now stated over and over again, that of adjoining savage tribes the ones found the most corrupt, debased, and bloodthirsty hav nearly always been the most religious ones, and the gentle and honest those utterly without any knowledge of immortality or divinity and with moral feelings totally devoid of any supernatural sanction.

And while this state maintenance of religion exists it is a continual source of danger. Amid the revolutions of nations and the endlessly changing relations of classes going on all about us, with industrial elements concentrating upon radical changes in government, majorityism agitated, female suffrage probable, and the referendum, or legislation upon every bill directly by the people, proposed, no one can tell what contingencies may at any moment appear, or what may be claimed and secured with our present civil support of ecclesiastics as a precedent. Meanwhile nine out of ten of us stand idly gaping, our amazement divided between the preachers pacifying the few among the masses who hav not forgotten all American traditions with the statement that we hav no union between church and state, and the preachers who think the time has come safely to avow the union and base upon it as a precedent demands for a complete theocracy; while our moneys are being as duly divided between those prepared to secure by the rack and thumbscrew for a fanatic Italian the position of supreme ruler of all peoples and governments, and those who, every time they get the power, burn witches, bore heretics' tongues and cut off their ears, and forbid learning, music, dancing, smiling, bathing, healing—whatever is natural, whatever is joyful, whatever is good.

If these people are so determined to hav all this that, like the very devout woman who, out of pure regard for religion, stole Tillotson's sermons from a lady of her acquaintance—if, we say, these people are so determined to hav religion that they will steal money to get it, we at least earnestly wish that they would not steal ours. The fact is, by the force of preponderating numbers and reverend customs we hav become altogether too awed, too intimidated and diffident, until we almost seem ashamed to demand the plainest rights, and blush to proclaim the cause of truth. It is time we advance our Demands with a resolution that will not be denied and refuse to take No for an answer. We are full-bearded men, and it is time we use a little less ceremony with the intellectual infants mewling and puking in the arms of the church. By every principle of American government, by every truth of political and religious liberty, our rights are clear and plain. We want our money, and we do not want "heaven nor hell nor any other creature" to stand in front of us and keep us from it.

A Sample With a Moral.

Another sample of the converts made by the New York Society for the Conversion of the Jews is given in a recent number of the Jewish Messenger by Mr. Benjamin, who is a thorn constant and sharp in the side of Mr. Freshman, the son of a rabbi, but now a Christian missionary.

Two years or so ago the newspapers of the city printed columns of sensational descriptions of the conversion of a remarkably bright young Jew to the Christian faith. For a few days it looked as though the Jews of the city were in a fair way to all become Christians, if one could believe the jubilant stories of the interviewed Christians. Then the subject was dropped, no more conversions were bulletined, and the unregenerate Jews went to their synagogs as of yore. The iconoclastic Mr. Benjamin, however, did not let the matter escape his memory, but pursued it even until the present day, and now he prints the result of his research. The story is in four parts:

1. Mr. Rubin's conversion.
2. " " baptism.
3. " " disappearance.
4. " " real character.

1. The conversion: One evening while the crank of the prayer-machine was being turned by Missionary Freshman at his establishment, the young man rushed in, dropped upon his knees exhausted, and repeated the oft-told story—how he was once a sinner and scoffer, but passing by he was struck like Saul of Tarsus. He insisted upon being converted then and there. With difficulty he was persuaded to postpone it until the next Sunday, so as to enable the religious and secular press thoroughly to spread these good tidings.

2. The baptism: The next Sunday the young candidate was solemnly led to the altar in a black suit to which any convert, alleges Mr. Benjamin, is entitled. The usual ceremony of baptism, together with the usual collection, was gone through. The face of the son of a rabbi was wreathed in smiles. The religious and secular press spread the news.

3. The disappearance: Hardly had the baptismal water dried on Mr. Rubin's head when he vanished, and St. Mark's place knew him no more. Speculation was rife as to his whereabouts. Some suggested that he was too good for this wicked world, and that he strolled off into the next world with his boots on. Others concluded that he went to preach the gospel to the wicked villagers of Brooklyn. But they were all wrong.

4. Mr. Rubin's Real Character: For the following facts we are indebted exclusivly to Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Rubin had been already converted by Rosenthal, the London prototype of Freshman, this resulting in a bitter contest over thirty shillings, which Mr. Rubin claimed were still due him, and which Mr. Rosenthal denied. In order to get square with Missionary Rosenthal, young Rubin went to Stuttgart and played there the sudden-seizure-with-Christianity dodge with financial success. Claiming to hav relativs in America, he was not only furnished with the means of traveling, but with plenty of pocket money as well. Reaching New York and seeing Freshman's church, he was once more seized with a spiritual impulse. Becoming convinced that the $10 cash, suit of clothes, and lots of promises from Mr. Freshman were all that he could realize, he laid hold of the cash and outfit, discarded the promises, and returned to London, where he became reconciled with his original godfather, Rosenthal.

There is a moral to this somewhere for the Christians, and it seems to be about as follows: The Jews who are worth converting are beyond the reach of the missionaries. The Jews within the reach of the missionaries are not worth converting. Mr. Rubin is by no means a solitary example.

The Most Laughable Thing on Earth.

It is a mistake to think, as we suppose some do, that Christianity, though it may be by argument demonstrated untrue, yet bears on its face somewhat of sense and probability, and is at least more reasonable than pagan religions. The fact is, there is not a religion on earth more monstrous and outrageous than this one. It is not that it is merely somewhat inconsistent, and unproved and untrue, but it is the very hight of gross and glaring preposterousness. It is the most absurd and laughable thing on earth. Truly pitiful and shameful it is that one should hav to multiply confuting books of argument on its every detail, and that we should hav to spend any time on the monstrous thing at all.

The hodge-podge of unconscionable lies and nonsense starts off with what Voltaire calls: God, who became so angry with God that he killed a part of God to pacify God. Then we hav the Catholic church getting its authority from the scripture, and yet that same scripture gets its authority solely from the church. The scriptural books were decided to be such and the false ones rejected by councils that varied in their decisions and often accepted or condemned a book by a few majority votes. Of authority for all the countless money-making ceremonies tacked onto Christ's simple doctrin by the Catholic church, and the fewer maintained by the Protestant, there is not a word in the Bible that can by any sane man with his wits about him be twisted into meaning anything of the kind. Jehovah is unchangeable, yet represented frequently changing his mind; all-powerful, yet continually foiled; knowing the future, yet trying experiments to see what will happen. We are told that prayer in faith will procure positivly anything, yet the very body of men who would be expected to hav faith if any could, the clergy, were never known in one solitary instance thus to procure a salary, but in every case hav recourse for that to a carnal world. In miracles the same mysterious exception is made; among all the miracles recorded as performed by God there is just one kind that cannot be found, and that is the creation of a pot of gold for one of his preachers, but for this they are always seen chasing about after the worldly man outside like a dog after a hare. We are to be saved by faith, but must hav good works; and we are to be saved by our good works, and yet must hav faith. Christ refused the title "master" and enjoined humility, yet his successors dwell in princely splendor and are called "Your reverence," "Your illustrious eminence," etc. But few there are that walk not in the broad and easy path that leadeth to destruction, yet this disturbs nobody, each Christian simply assuming that he is one of the mentioned few. And on the other hand, though all profess to enter at death a state of joy ineffable, nobody seems a bit eager about entering said state; but on the very contrary every Christian tries his best to remain in this troubled world just as long as he possibly can, fights against leaving it tooth and nail, and is finally dragged into heaven scratching and clawing like a cat forced into a bath. Christians tell us we should follow the biblical command to imitate God in everything, but the instant we attempt to act in a single thing as God is recorded as acting in the Old Testament they seize us and shut us up in jail. They hav given up the inspiration of most of the early parts of the Bible, and begin to say, like Dr. Ladd, D.D., that no one passage can be pronounced inspired, but that somehow the inspiration is in the book notwithstanding this; that is, the parts of a thing are severally not inspired, and yet the whole is; in short, it is and it isn't. The only scriptural doctrins practiced now are certain moderate and compromised ones; the worst precepts the law will not let the Christians practice, and the good ones they won't.

In fact, it is only because of the imposing numbers that hold Christianity that we hav become habituated to treating it with any soberness at all. If in the midst of the rational peoples of the future there should rise a person uttering the doctrins of a present-day Christian, inside of six hours he would be found within the walls of a lunatic asylum, in a straitjacket, bled and blistered, and with a dozen cold-water bandages tied about his head.

Mr. Walker's Wearisome Efforts.

Mr. E. C. Walker rises to say this about THE TRUTH SEEKER and the obscenity laws. It purports to be an answer to some remarks of ours on one of Mr. Walker's previous efforts to misrepresent us:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER says that unless I am in favor of such matter I must want some kind of law to prevent the dissemination of really obscene literature. You are begging the question, Eugene. Did it follow that you were an advocate of the principles of revolutionary Socialism because you opposed the hanging of the eight in Chicago? Because you oppose the attempted extirpation of Catholics by means of fines, imprisonment, and confiscation, can we therefore be justified in asserting that you wish to see that church extend and strengthen? No more do I in opposing all so-called obscenity statutes wish to disseminate anything that can in the least weaken true reverence for the sex nature of men and women, but I firmly maintain that, as all the prohibitory laws in existence hav not diminished the sum total of intemperance, so the Comstock and other obscenity statutes—national, state, and municipal—hav had no good effect, taking into consideration all factors of the problem. The sincere fanatics who are furnishing the moral and financial backing to the knaves engaged in enforcing these statutes may think that they are accomplishing wonders, but it does seem that observant and thinking men like the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER should not be deluded when the facts are so clearly against the claims of the statute moralists."

Now, the fact is, we never said any such thing, and Mr. Walker knows it. We said that "in all large cities scoundrels are found who will make money by corrupting the most innocent portion of humanity. Such fellows must be restrained and punished. Individuals cannot do this, and therefore society, through its laws and by means of its regularly constituted police force, must take the matter in hand. The United States government should be restricted to those functions granted it by the Constitution." Then we added the conclusion which Mr. Walker distorts in his opening sentence: "Mr. Walker can not escape these conclusions unless he argues for the right of scoundrels to publish their vile literature unrestricted."

Arguing for the right of a man to do a thing and indorsing his act are two different things, and we never accused Mr. Walker of indorsing the dissemination of obscene literature. But if Mr. Walker means to say that the state statutes against obscene literature hav done no good in this city, he simply shows that he does not know what he is talking about.

We hold now the same opinions about these statutes that we hav held since our attention was first called to them, and we may add, also, that D. M. Bennett, the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER, held the same. We are opposed to the national government's going outside its constitutional functions, and we are opposed to the enforcement of laws by private societies officered by knaves and religious bigots, who use the statute in a tyrannical and blackmailing manner to wreak vengeance upon enemies and to fill their own pockets.

The next time Mr. Walker gets up to misrepresent us we trust he will hav the honesty to quote our words. His labored efforts to confute something we never said hav a tendency to make us weary.

Busy Christians.

It is a remarkable fact that nearly all the appliances of industry and industrial, social, and governmental methods which now exalt civilized existence hav originated in the last few generations. Thirteen centuries of ignorance, superstition, fierceness, war, oppression, squalor, and misery—this frightful sight meets our backward gaze.

The forces utilized by us were present in those old times—were all around the people just as now, and might hav been used. But the Christian gentlemen of those days were too busy—they had too much else to do.

Instead of ascertaining the value of electricity as a means of communication and motiv power, they had to determin: "Whether the divine essence engendered the son, or was engendered by the father; why the three persons together are not greater than one alone; whether attributes determin persons, or substance, that is, nature; how properties can exist in the nature of God, and not determin it; if created spirits are local or circumscribed; if God can know more things than he is aware of."

The time that would hav sufficed to invent the steam-engin, the spinning-machine, the telescope, was devoted to reasoning on: "Whether God can cause that, the place and body being retained, the body shall hav no position—that is, existence in place."

Surely it would be unjust to expect them to hav discovered the compass, the time-piece, the orrery, the railroad, and at the same time hav decided: "Whether the impossibility of being engendered is a constituent property of the first person of the trinity. Whether identity, similitude, and equality are real relations in God. Whether it be right to distinguish matter trebly, as firstly first, secondly first, and thirdly first."

Some might think our pious progenitors should hav contrived air-pumps, paper-manufacture, engraving, balloons, and stenography. But, bless you, how could these good people hav done all this before having determined: "Whether the body of Christ arose with its wounds. Whether this body moves with the motion of the host and the chalice in consecration. Whether at the first instant of conception Christ had the use of free judgment. Whether the dove in which the holy spirit appeared was a real animal. Whether in the state of innocence all children were masculin."

Some are unreasonable enough to think the people ought to hav found out something about government—whether it is instituted for the benefit of the governed or for that of those who govern—and what kind is best. Oh, no; they had more important matters to investigate first. For instance: "Whether the ceremonies of the law are before the law. Whether God could become a pumpkin or an insect. Whether the irascible and concupiscible parts are parts of the intellectual appetite. Whether there be an essential difference between catagorematic and fincatagorematic."

Is there any more sense in what the churches dispute over now than there was in what they disputed over then?

Editorial Notes.

ANY of our subscribers having copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 1st that they do not wish to preserve will confer a favor upon us by sending them to this office. A blunder of the printer has left the supply short.

ITALY'S prime minister Crispi is exceedingly hostil to the pope. He has through the state council recently declared that all business transactions between the pope and private Italian individuals must be considered as matters settled between private Italian people, and therefore must pay to the register's office the usual fees. The papal business transactions hav hitherto been considered as made by a foreign power, and, therefore, hav had to pay to the register's office less than others. Signor Crispi also proposes to take all elementary schools under the care of the state. This is bitterly resented at the Vatican, and the pope is about the angriest old mortal there is in Europe.

CONCERNING the Rev. J. V. Dundas, who was detected in smuggling a week or so ago, the Advocate comments: "We shall be glad to register his degradation and expulsion from the ministry. He lied when he declared that he had no dutiable articles, and lied to cover stealing. There is no crime that a minister who would do these things would not commit if allurement and opportunity should concur. Ministers proven guilty of crimes of deliberation should receive justice without mercy, and the time is rapidly coming when all honest ministers and Christians of every denomination must combine to expel, without hope of readmission to the ministry, such persons." Custom-house officers say that Christian people are just as likely to attempt smuggling as anybody else, which Mr. Buckley thinks is slander, though he is compelled to admit that there are cases enough on record to giv color to it, some of the cases involving ministers. But what a jubilee honesty will hav when every dishonest and unchaste clergyman is properly and promptly punished!

GRAND FORKS, DAK. TERR., Aug. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to pay on subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER and books, from an old heathen—as I am called because I do not believe in hell, hate, and the river Styx, and pay the preachers for lying to us as Christ did, to keep us in ignorance, but believe in friendship, love, and truth, and that a man's word is his bond. I hav fought the good fight and kept the faith from my youth, and now, at seventy-five years, I hav had a pretty rough time of it in a Christian community, and alone at that. But I stood my ground, as I will to the death. But I am sorry to say that our great statesmen and politicians are selling our dear-bought and beloved country to the pope for a mess of pottage. But they are. Long life to Heston and the TRUTH SEEKER family.

I am trying to get one or two new subscribers, but it is hard work to take the scales off their eyes.

Respectfully yours, in friendship, love, and truth,

LEVI BANCROFT.

MILL BROOK, CONN., Aug. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $5 to renew my subscription for two years.

I am glad to see, now and then of late, a little Spiritualism in your paper. I think it more than probable that no inconsiderable number of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are favorably inclined toward Spiritualism, as was its founder, D. M. Bennett, of blessed memory. I think that if you can contrive to mix in more of it from time to time, it will be of advantage to the paper, by eventually increasing its circulation.

I was pleased with the letter of Mary Peck in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 11th; she spoke my mind exactly. I agree with her in regarding Spiritualism as the grandest truth of this or any other age. I also read with pleasure the letter of J. A. Doane in last TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years—almost from its commencement—and I hav been a Spiritualist from away back. Spiritualism is in the ascendant, and has already leavened, so to speak, the whole lump of what is called Christendom, and I doubt not it is destined to do more than that, Talmage to the contrary notwithstanding. I hope to see more of it in THE TRUTH SEEKER. H. W. PINNEY.

STEWARTSVILLE, Mo., Aug. 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3, which will set me ahead one year more. No matter how poor a man may be, it seems to me he should not neglect to pay you for the great work you are doing for mankind. The Christians pay pretty well for the work the preachers do for God. And if there is a God, he needs no one to work for him. He ought to be able to get along without the help of poor, insignificant man. How much more reasonable it would be to giv the Gods and ghosts a rest and turn our attention to mankind! We cannot help the Gods if they are there. But we can help poor, suffering humanity, which your TRUTH SEEKER is doing. Long may she wave! As long as I liv you will be sure of at least one subscriber. I would like to send you some more new subscribers, but the God-and-ghost party here are so blinded by the old, old story of Jesus and him crucified, that they dare not think any other way than that pointed out by the sky-pilots, which makes the poor dupes poorer and the priests richer. I was a Christian for more than thirty years, and spent much of my time howling after imaginary beings above the clouds, and after a long time getting no returns I began to doubt. Then I was told I was a bad man and would surely go to hell. I used to feed the priests pretty well and gave of my money pretty freely; and now nothing makes me think so meanly of myself as to think they, the priests, went off laughing in their sleeves, to think what a poor fool they made of me. S. N. BRADFORD.

NEW YORK, Aug. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Free trade or protection—which? This is the great question of the day which needs to be explained, and which will be treated in this presidential canvass according to the speaker's opinions for or against. Honest men and good citizens differ in this question more than in any other; but to a rational being it is clear that both cannot be right and good for a country. I hav read much for and against for years past. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 23d last appear two articles, one, "Colonel Ingersoll's Economical and Political Opinions," for protection, and another entitled, "Principles of Freedom in Trade," from Robert C. Adams. The last one, from Mr. Adams, is handled in a masterly way, and will and can not be answered, and I should invite and ask Mr. W. T. S. Hadley to read it.

Forty years ago I was a reader of the Tribune, edited by the great protectionist Horace Greeley, and I then followed his teaching, but hav since evoluted to the principles of free trade. At that time I believed and considered that our manufactures were weak and in their infancy, and needed help; that it would be good for the country to help them up and make us independent of foreign importation. I find and believe now that our present manufacturers not only are strong, but grow to rich millionaires, and combine into trusts to tyrannize over us and put down all competition, so as to be able to dictate the prices for the wares they buy, and also make their own prices for the products they sell.

That the tariff is a good thing for the manufacturers no one will deny, but these men try to demonstrate that it is also for the interest of labor, and this is a great delusion. Higher wages are no measure of proof that our workingmen are better off than Europeans; it depends on what a man can buy with his money and how much. Do not these protectionists pay only so much and so little wages to their men as they can help? Do they not import these very much decried pauper laborers from Europe against the laws? These manufacturers care more for their horses than for their men. Would it not be fairer for a government to protect the poor laborer instead of the well-to-do by stopping partly the immense immigration? Put a tariff—that is, a tax—on imported labor; then the wages of labor will surely rise. But I am not for a general restriction in immigration.

Forty years ago there were no tramps, but millionaires were also very few; now we hav these millionaires by the thousand and tramps and paupers by the million. For this state of society I blame the Republican party. This party for a long time has been corrupt and rotten. Railroads were built entirely with subsidies, banks received double interest for their money, and for manufacturers and mine-owners they taxed all the people; but these Congressmen were stockholders and owners in all these affairs, and of course they fixed and made the laws in Washington to do the most good for themselvs.

Manufactures would grow up in spite of free trade, and hav then a healthier existence, and could compete in the trade of the world with other nations.

We claim to be the most intelligent people, are three thousand miles distant from Europe, and yet contend that our manufacturers need bounties or extra protection. Shame!

FREDK. KOEZLY.

WOODBURY, PA., July 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: There is a little town in Blair county, Pa., called Martinsburg, that, if it cannot take the largest pumpkin to the county fair, can surely take the prize with a few samples of the genus homo whose craniums contain the minimum of sense and the maximum of bigotry and egotism.

Some time last winter, Mr. D. R. Christian, of Woodbury, Pa., a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER and a friend of liberty and humanity, was asked by Mr. Robert Bookhamer, of Martinsburg, for the loan of a book called "The Gods," by Col. R. G. Ingersoll. The request was granted. The book was taken home and read appreciatingly, as the young man is fairly intelligent, though this is not inherited from his father's side, as the sequel will show.

The father found the book in his son's possession—ye gods, what a discovery!—then it was that the demon of Christianity began to show its teeth; then it was that the tender, peaceful, forgiving, and generous teachings extracted by that father from the "holy Bible" stood him in good stead, and he began to explain to his son how wicked it was to read the sublime language of the greatest orator on earth, and I imagin advised him, if read he must, to go and get the dear old family Bible and read the thirty-eighth chapter of Genesis, portions of Ezekiel and Deuteronomy, and other portions of the "holy scriptures" that had similar elevating and moralizing tendencies. He told his son that it was wrong to read these wicked books, and then proceeded to demonstrate to the young man that it was right to burn another man's property, and forthwith consigned the book to the flames. Mr. Christian called for his book, and was informed by Mr. Bookhamer that he had burnt it. The owner then brought suit before Recorder Doyle, of Altoona, against this mossbank relic of barbarism for restitution, and the old Christian champion of the fagot and torch had to pay for the book and pay all the costs.

Shortly before the trial the ignoramus scissors-jerker of the Martinsburg Herald gave his valuable opinion as to the result of the suit in the following language: "The Herald is not sufficiently learned in the mysteries and intricacies of the law to venture a prediction as to the outcome of the pending suit, but it is of the opinion that Mr. Bookhamer was justifiable in the course he pursued, and looks forward with confidence to such a decision by Recorder Doyle."

How far this follower of the lamb was off in his prediction the result of the trial, as given above, will show, and it will not take anyone very long to conclude that the devil's proverbial off-side ox would be a paragon of intelligence by the side of this numskull of a would-be Christian editor.

A NEIGHBOR OF MR. D. R. CHRISTIAN.

RÖCHLITZ, No. 1 BEI REICHENBERG, BÖHMEN, July 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am in the Giand mountains. One mountain, by the name of Jeschken, is thirty-six hundred feet above the sea. I went up there. Oh, what a wonderful sight! I felt as if I were in a balloon high over the earth. I could see nearly fifty villages and a good many cities with the telescope. I could see Prague, sixty miles distant, and the Snow mountains to the east, where snow can be seen in July. The valley where I am living is five miles broad and eight miles long, with mountains all around. Some narrow, deep valleys go far up in the mountains, where a good many springs come together and form a stream. There is so much fall that the factories are built almost one on the other. They are mostly wool and some are cotton factories. These mills giv many thousands employment. The most of their employees are females. There is the same slavery in these factories that there is in America. Pay is somewhat lower, provisions lower, meat higher, cotton the same, and wool lower. Government revenues are put on almost everything to keep a standing army. The people never get over paying taxes until the year is around, and then it commences again. Females of the lower and middle classes all hav to work hard to help pay rent or tax, and get provisions. A father cannot alone supply the necessaries for his family. Females are almost all slaves here, and that is what the Bible made them. (See Paul in 1 Cor. xiv, 34, 35; Paul to the Ephesians, v, 22-33; Paul, 1 Tim. ii, 11-15. This I took out of a German Bible.) But these females are satisfied with their slavery. They are like the Mormons—they do not know any better. Superstition is manifold here. In almost every house and beer-house, even in brothels, there is in the room over the door the sign: "With God." Every quarter of a mile is a holy statue or an iron cross, where the women when they pass make the sign of the cross and the men raise their hats. But not all; there are some Liberals also.

I know a man here who was burnt out. He saved a good many things out of the fire, among them a large iron cross with Jesus on it. He calculated to move out of town, so he had an auction sale. He sold everything except the iron cross. Nobody would bid on it. Afterward one man asked him what he would do with the large iron cross. He said he would sell it for old iron. This is a sign where the wind blows from. They hav also Liberal societies here, and when they meet a secret police is always amongst them. If they say anything against the government or religion, then they break the society up.

People here hav a friendly polish. If a person goes into a beer saloon, they treat a man like a gentleman, and in America, in ordinary saloons, like a knave.

If nothing happens, and I am well, I will leave here August 30th for Bremen. The steamer Eider, which I came over in, sails for New York September 1st.

I am too much of an American Liberal to stay here any longer. When I come to New York, if possible I will make THE TRUTH SEEKER office a visit, and renew my subscription for the grand TRUTH SEEKER. JOSEPH WENZEL.

LIME KILN, CAL., Aug. 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to reply to R. G. Smith, in THE TRUTH SEEKER, issue of August 4th, wherein he says, "I do not see how any Liberal could support Cleveland after the part he took in sending the Constitution to the pope of Rome." Not so, Friend Smith; the gift was timely and the selection most emphatically significant. Going forth as it did from the guardian of our liberty, it was like the warning cry of the goddess of Liberty to her arch-enemy: "Beware! Beware! Your present course is a violation of our Constitution, a copy of which I send you for your enlightenment. Study it carefully, that you may comprehend where your present aggressiv policy must end. You shall not subvert the liberties of this people. We recognize your treasonable designs, and we warn you before forbearance ceases to be a virtue."

No; as far as Mr. Cleveland's catering to the powers at Rome, I think he is very much misunderstood. He has the courage and manhood to be courteous to an enemy, and the selection of a copy of the federal Constitution is firmness demonstrated as well as significant. It is like a shipper dictating the cost of transportation to a railroad company, when the agent, in a courteous and dignified manner, presents the dissatisfied shipper a copy of their freight rates. Further contravention becomes criminal. That the pope of Rome has designs on this republic, no well-informed person can doubt. The duke of Richmond, formerly governor-general of Canada, in a letter says: "It [this republic] will be destroyed; it ought not, and will not, be permitted to exist. So long as it exists no prince will be safe on his throne, and they are determined on its destruction by subversion rather than by conquest. All the low population of Europe will be carried into that country; these men will become citizens, and invested with the right of suffrage, hence discord, anarchy, and civil war will ensue." T. J. CONLEY.

ELBA, O., Aug. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: About two weeks ago Rev. E. V. Zollars, president of Hiram College, delivered two lectures at Lower Salem, O., in answer to the ones J. E. Remsburg delivered there last May.

Mr. Remsburg's subjects were "Sabbath Breaking" and "False Claims," and Rev. Zollar's subjects were "The Sabbath Question" and "Infidelity: The Most Gigantic Failure of the Age."

Rev. Mr. Zollars was advertised a very learned, able man, specially qualified to treat these subjects, and many expected to hear a complete refutation of the arguments presented by Remsburg.

It was conceded by all that Mr. Remsburg used no language unbecoming a gentleman, and he did not stoop to personal abuse and vilification, but presented his subjects in a clear, logical, and eloquent manner. Some Christians at his lectures were somewhat surprised at this, for I presume they had been taught to believe that an Infidel lecturer could be nothing but a coarse, foul-mouthed, conceited ignoramus. It made Liberals smile to hear the distinguished Rev. Mr. Zollars describe them as such to an audience that knew better by experience.

There was nothing remarkable about the first lecture of the reverend gentleman, judging by its effect upon the audience, for the majority seemed to be dozing, and were apparently greatly relieved when he finished. He assumed his premises and went through a long course of reasoning to reach a conclusion which may hav been logical for anything I know to the contrary, for I confess I could not always follow him.

There was nothing particularly objectionable to Liberals in this lecture except his premises, which a Christian never condescends to prove or establish. However, he did not attempt to claim the $100 Remsburg offered to anyone who would show him a passage of scripture in the New or the Old Testament commanding or even authorizing the keeping of Sunday as the Sabbath instead of the seventh day.

He promised his sleepy audience a more interesting lecture the next evening, for which we were all thankful. Rev. Mr. Zollars has the reputation of being an able minister of the Christian Campbellite church, and was lately elected president of Hiram College.

With these credentials we supposed he would at least giv us a scholarly, logical presentation of the subject, without resort to abusiv language and small talk—the weapons of a cheap Methodist circuit-rider—but we were disappointed. He not only denounced Infidelity, but stooped to ungentlemanly personalities and denounced the Infidels of the community as ignorant, base, and uncharitable; and I presume Universalists were in this denunciation, as they are as much Infidel to orthodoxy as Ingersoll himself.

He did not substantiate a single assertion, and his charges in general were so notoriously false that they excited only laughter from the Liberal portion of his audience, as they well knew he was damaging his own cause, and, although he was loud in his challenges, that lecture at least needed no answer. The most amusing part of the lecture was his attempt to prove Franklin and Jefferson Christians by reading some of their letters, which most decidedly proved them unbelievers. He probably thought the credulity of his audience unlimited.

Rev. Mr. Zollars said he could name twenty men who would be glad to come here at any time to debate the subject, but that we would find that Infidel lecturers would not debate.

We intend to find out whether this is correct or not, and if it is not, you will get an account of a debate here.

Respectfully, W. J. DUTTON.

PLUM CREEK, NEB., Aug. 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am traveling most of my time, and consequently I see much gospel bigotry and criminality. An article in the Chicago News tells how a frolicsome preacher of Plum Creek was discovered not only betting on horse-races, but even getting into a fight on the Fourth of July in a neighboring town. That's nothing; we had a preacher that was well known in this community as being very intimate with his wife's servant girl. Another preacher, "evangelical," the Rev. Mr. Petit, was published as a liar in the Dawson county Herald, a little over a year ago.

Another gospel-banger, the Rev. Mr. Webster, published an article against Freethinkers in the Dawson county Pioneer of Aug. 13, 1887. The following is an extract: "Hypocrits and adulterers are not Christians. They are not in Christ's kingdom. They are outside with 'Freethinkers.' Who makes this class? Where do they come from? Not Christ and the church, but of the devil, who is the chief Freethinker." This same gospel-drummer, Webster, has a son about sixteen or seventeen years old, who is kept in the Kearney reformatory, a very bad boy, known personally to me. Comment is unnecessary; a bad tree cannot bring forth good fruit. The above gospel-nostrum vender is now, I believe, at Chadron selling gospel for cash down in this world, and promising returns in a country or world nobody knows anything about. These preachers are like tramps—anything but muscular work.

But our German-born fellow-citizens fare no better with the preachers than do we nativ Melican men. A few years ago a preacher was caught using indelicacies toward a lady not his wife. He was sent away. Soon after, the same holy man was called before a church committee to answer a charge of attempted rape at Waukon, Ia., but, like a sensible little man, he avoided fooling with church committees by going away. May he always do the latter. They—our German-Americans—soon got another gospel-banger named Brickert, from Omaha, whose congregation were informed of the man's unholiness in Omaha. But the reverend brother was equal to the occasion, and explained that he had been collecting money for the church, and, being unacquainted with the inhabitants, he happened to get into houses of ill-fame, unbeknown till wicked people made public talk. His explanation was accepted as satisfactory, and praise sung "zumberrgott." But this holy man was a stranger to the habit of minding his own business, and soon was called a damned liar by one of his own congregation and by myself. I used to get tired listening to his fast-woman and house-of-ill-fame stories. When the gospel-banging contract expired, he was shipped again and exchanged for the Rev. Mr. Schadel, or Stradel—the latter ought to be the correct name, the way the little shoemaker-looking preacher straddles gospel humbuggery. This reverend straddler had a buggy and a pair of grays. When my friend K. offered to insure his team and stable, he refused to hav them insured, saying he had faith in God—when, in less then a week after, whack came a lightning flash and a thunderbolt and killed one of the grays. Since, he has had to drive a one-horse rig, as the congregation is becoming doubtful about the Lord's being on the side of this holy man. When an honest old farmer Freethinker was lying a corpse in his coffin, this malicious, idiotic, and ill-cultured preacher stated most idiotically and falsely that the corpse or soul of honest old Jacob Kramer was at that moment suffering in hell for his unbelief. Oh, shame! When will foolish people cease employing and paying mind-destroying one-horse preachers to malign their fathers or friends at the grave?

Last week the editor of a Sunday-school paper, and a weak-minded Sunday-school crank, Mr. Signor, a long time superintendent of the Union Sabbath-school, had to be taken to the asylum as an incurable lunatic. It is sad how the Bible destroys mental vitality.

The wife of a hard-working and honest farmer, Mr. D. Lange, after living two winters by a school-house that had been turned into a gospel-shop for holding revival meetings, and after attending prayer-meetings awhile, taking all kinds of gospel nostrums, succumbed in reason, and had to be taken to the lunatic asylum. And so they go, single, pairs, and in groups, from different church routes to the lunatic asylum.

Nebraska is at present unable to build insane asylums fast enough for the requirements. Why the Republicans of Nebraska are so wicked, and allow their public schools to be transformed into gospel-shops, and allow the lazy gospel-bangers and Sunday-school cranks to steal taxpayers' coal, when Nebraska is more highly tax-ridden than any other state in the Union, is hard to explain by any other fact than that the Republican party does not possess any more honesty in any shape or form. Right now, the slim-legged preachers, with the assistance of the priest-ridden, ignorant women, are trying to stop people from playing ball on Sunday. Let him buy "One Hundred and Forty-Four Self-Contradictions of the Bible," fifteen cents, "Bible Morals," twenty-five cents, and "False Claims," and every Nebraska citizen will come to my own conclusion, and that is that every judge who compels a witness to swear by the Bible, or rules a witness out, is a liar and a perjurer. And that every person who says he believes in the Bible tells a falsehood and a lie. And that every person who swears on the Bible in a secret society commits a lie and perjury. The above pamphlets will prove, and more pamphlets will giv broader and additional proofs. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER and Watson Heston.

A MUGWUMP.

EUREKA, CAL., Aug. 14, 1888.

TO J. HACKER: Dear Sir: Your note to me in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 14th I happened to see by mere accident, the paper lying open on my desk with the note in sight. I was busy haying then and had no time to read papers of any kind. Now I am through haying and will cheerfully accommodate you.

You want me to prove the assertion I accidentally made in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 19th, that you were full of things not worth knowing. I keep no file of TRUTH SEEKERS, and must, therefore, quote from memory what you hav written, and I hope you will correct me if I misquote. Your writings hav been in the John Swinton style, and the good both of you hav done may be expressed by the cipher 0. You hav stated repeatedly that the government, rich corporations, and capitalists rob the people of their substance, and that land ought to be as free as the air we breathe. This looks well to a man without reflection and experience, but will not bear scrutiny. No instance, as far as I know, can be produced where the government of the United States has favored the rich and oppressed the poor. Even in the case of the protectiv tariff, which favors rich corporations and proves a hardship to the poor, the intentions of those who imposed it were undoubtedly good, but ill-advised. How thinking men like Mr. Ingersoll can find arguments to support that robbery, is more than I can comprehend. Mr. Ingersoll appears to admit that a protectiv tariff is a robbery, but he justifies it on the ground that it will make better mechanics. Can anything be more absurd? Europe always produced and always will produce as good mechanics as America. The hight to which a mechanic may raise his mechanical ingenuity is in no way depending upon wages, but on the amount of talent and ingenuity the man originally possessed, and on the opportunities put within his reach to develop them. And although it appears on first sight that the United States can offer better opportunities with a protectiv tariff than without it, on taking everything into consideration the idea falls to the ground. Instances hav occurred where the government has defrauded the people—the Forty-second Congress being a case in point—or where the government is tyrannizing over a part of the people, as in the case of the Comstock laws; but those frauds are directed against the rich and poor alike. Rich corporations, if not interfered with by law, direct their energy more to devouring one another than to imposing upon the public. When interfered with by law they combine, and the result is, the public suffers, as in the case of the Inter-State Commerce commission. In regard to capitalists, they are an absolute necessity to progress. We hav arrived at an age where everything is tending to production on a wholesale scale, which makes capital a necessity. Experience has taught the public that anything, from a needle to a locomotiv, can be produced or transported more cheaply on a large scale than on a small one. Before the invention of cut nails a nailsmith made but few nails a day; now thousands of nails are turned out by the man in nail factories. Before railroads came into use, farmers living away from big cities did not produce large crops, because they could not get them to market. Now they can market everything they can produce, and in consequence, those who would liv in poverty without railroads hav risen to affluence by their use. Yet such is the innate cussedness of some people that they will curse the railroads who raised them out of poverty. Your idea in regard to the free use of land is equally ridiculous. I hav known people who held your ideas who lived almost within a stone's throw of government land. If I asked them why they did not take up government land, they would reply that they could not make a living on it. And they told the truth. A family cannot settle on government land and stay there unless they hav means enough to subsist for a year or two, as not only no crop awaits them when they come there, but the ground is not even ready to put a crop in. Therefore men with your ideas content themselvs with howling about free land, but they could not be induced to take the land in its wild state. The fact is, people who clamor for free land do not want the land at all, and would not accept it if offered to them in its natural state, except to speculate with it. They want cultivated farms, so they can profit by other people's labor—or, in other words, they want that for which they hav not labored.

Yet you will say: "All this does not prove that I am full of what is not worth knowing." I will proceed to make my meaning clear. As far as your articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER are concerned, they were all written with one intent—to show to the public how they were prevented from earning money, and how they were robbed after they had earned it. This is really a negativ way of teaching people how to accumulate property. Now, you will admit that a person may be posted in mathematics, astronomy, or hygiene and yet be poor. But before a person can teach others how to accumulate property he must hav accumulated some himself. You hav not done that. You cannot teach others how to avoid being robbed when you cannot avoid it yourself. Therefore, like our pulpit-pounders, you are full of that which is not worth knowing. You cannot say that you could not possibly hav risen above poverty by leading a strictly honest life, since you must admit that others strictly honest hav risen above it. The truth is, you were not robbed, but you were incapable of accumulating. That you hav lived a long life, hav written for papers, lectured, and published a paper yourself, amounts to nothing in this case, since pulpit-pounders do all that and more and still die full of that which is not worth knowing. Age often produces conceit and superciliousness. It takes experience, combined with observation and reflection, to produce wisdom.

When will people ever get sense enough to know that our laws, customs, habits—in fact, everything belonging to society—is a growth, influenced by circumstances like any other growth, and that things are as they are because they cannot be otherwise, everything being true to the cause that produced it, and that to improve society instead of howling about things we think wrong and which to other people may seem right we must try to elevate ourselvs, and then by precept and example we must try to induce those with whom we come in contact to come up to our level?

You are anxious to find out through others who and what I am. Since no one may respond, I will tell you myself. I was born in Saxony. My father was poor, and all I inherited from him was a roving disposition. When a little over thirteen years of age I left home, and, true to instinct, I went a good way off. I hired out to a farmer for nine months for thirty-three and a third cents per month, or a trifle over one cent per day, and I had to work from 4 o'clock in the morning till 8 o'clock in the evening. Next, I hired out to another farmer for $7 a year, which netted me nearly two cents per day—of course, board and lodging always included. Not liking farmer's wages, I engaged myself to a miller. I was to serve an apprenticeship of three years, during which time I was to receive twelve cents per week and board. I worked fifteen months, and finding that I could not get my wages, I packed my trunk one day and left at night when everybody was asleep. I went to another mill and hired out for twenty-four cents per week. But finding I had to play the farm hand during the day and the apprentice at night, I left again and went to the third master, on condition that I should get my diploma—without which no tradesman could do anything in Germany in those days—at the expiration of six months. I got my diploma, and at the age of twenty years I was foreman in a grist-mill. Then I got dyspeptic, and the doctors told me that I had to quit work in the grist-mill. And as people in those days could not shift from one trade to another on account of the then existing guilds, my outlook for the future became dark. On studying the matter over, I concluded to go to America. I arrived in New York in the spring of 1853. Here I found a paradise—plenty of work and good pay. I had now a chance to gratify my roaming disposition. As I had no expensiv habits and could turn my hand to almost anything and get good wages, I would work till I got a few dollars ahead and then go somewhere else, just to see what the world was made of. In the spring of 1855 I found myself again on the other side of the Atlantic. I brought up in France without a cent in my pockets. Necessity compelled me to take work in a sugar refinery at forty-five cents per day, working from 5 o'clock in the morning till 7 o'clock in the evening. And as I had to pay forty cents for board and lodging, I had five cents left for a day's work. That was rough. But, instead of complaining, I soon found means to get back to America. I worked my passage to New York. Back again on American soil, my former friends helped me into a machine-shop, and I was apprenticed to become a practical engineer. That was in Cleveland, O., in the Cuyahoga furnace. Here I worked some time. Then a man who started a rake factory right across the river tried to hire me as a foreman, I having held a position in a rake factory next to the foreman. I agreed to work for him on condition that he would make it right with the managers of the machine-shop. He did so, and I left the machine-shop on condition of being taken back again any time I wanted to go back. In 1857 there was a general crash in business and the rake factory went under. Being offered a situation as engineer, I did not go back to the machine-shop. Here I worked till I had money enough to go to California, and in 1858 I landed on what is now known as the city of Eureka, at that time a wilderness. Here I worked as engineer, and getting good pay I accumulated money. Then I bought the island on which I now liv and which bears my name. The island contains two hundred and seventy-two acres, lies opposit Eureka, and is five feet below high-water mark. I hav dyked about one hundred acres of it, which cost me thousands of dollars and the best years of my life. I hav been a wage-worker about twenty-five years, and my wages hav ranged all the way from a little over one cent to $5 per day. At present, as for many years back, I liv on my island. I employ one man, who has been with me over three years. I pay him $35 per month and I find everything. He was penniless when I hired him, while now he is worth over $1,000. And to show you what a lucrativ business it is to be a landowner, I will giv you the figures that I made on the place during that time. In 1885 I cleared $137; in 1886 I went $246 behind on account of a tidal wave which ruined my dyke; in 1887 I cleared $377, which leaves a clear profit to me of $268 for the three years, and I work nearly all the time and hav thousands of dollars invested. I admit this is not all the income I derive from my island, but it is all I derive from that part of it on which I hav spent my labor and my money.

Should this explanation be still unsatisfactory to you, you will find no difficulty in obtaining information about me by writing for it, as I am well known here—not known as a millionaire, although I hav more than my share of this world's goods—but known as a man who has an opinion of his own and is not afraid to express it.

Children's Corner.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Baby's Pigs.

Ten little pigs that grow and thrive,
Rosy and plump and clean;
Two little pens, each holding five,
And the owner is Baby 'Gene.
They wiggle about and root and dig,
And push again and again,
Till at last we find one dear little pig
Is out of the little red pen.

Baby 'Gene is a little, old man,
Bald and serious too.
He looks to the pigs whenever he can,
But he has a great deal to do.
And this little pig says he'll get some corn,
And the next one cries, "Oh, where?"
And the little one says, "In grandpa's barn!"
And the great one knows it's there.

Four pearly grains he can plainly see;
Hav them he must and will;
He strains and struggles—but, "Quee-quee-quee,"
He can't get over the sill!
So he's given it up, and off he goes—
With Grandfather 'Gene before—
Snubbing and rubbing his little bare nose,
On the way to the pantry door.

You queer little pig, you're ever so bold,
But it never, never will do!
The great, wide world would be cruel and cold
To a little pink mite like you.
Mamma must bring her needle and yarn
And build up the fence again,
For the five little pigs would be quite forlorn
Outside of the little red pen.

Good Company.

A traveler, toiling on a weary way,
Found in his path a piece of fragrant clay.
"This seems but common earth," says he, "but how Delightful! It is full of sweetness now!
Whence is thy fragrance?" From the clay there grows
A voice, "I hav been very near a rose."

Polly's Twenty Friends.

Polly was a queer little genius.

You would hav laughed to see her when she was eleven years old, arrayed in a blue and white calico gown, her long hair streaming down her back, and her little bare feet all scratched and torn by the briars growing in tangled confusion near the brook, as sober as a judge, thinking.

Polly was the child of poverty. There are a great many children of the same parent.

"I cannot go to school," she said, drearily; "I hav no shoes," and she rubbed her toes on the green grass. "If I try real hard," she continued, "I might get a pair."

"I'll help you," and "So will I, and I, and I, I, I, I," screamed twenty little voices—little fairies or sprites from thought-land, who are always near at seasonable or unseasonable times and places.

Polly jumped up quickly, exclaiming: "It's a bargain! Come on!"

And away she went—berrying. She picked nimbly, assisted by her twenty friends, and sold them—the berries—quart after quart, till she had earned $4 in pennies, and then she bought shoes, stockings, and a pretty straw hat.

Thus equipped, Polly went to school and studied faithfully, like one finding new treasures every day.

By and by, the shoes wore out, and—— "Now, what shall I do for more shoes?" was Polly's perplexed query. The berry season was over and gone, and—— "What can I do?" sobbed Polly.

"Go clamming!" shouted one of the thought-land nymphs.

"I will! I will!" said Polly.

"I'll go with you!" and "So say we all of us!" from the whole score of ever-attending friends. And armed with a basket and hoe, our brave little Polly betook herself to the beach, near which she lived, on the coast of Massachusetts.

She imagined the clams smiled, as, one by one, she pushed them from their sandy beds, where they were nicely tucked away, enjoying a nap perhaps, lulled by the charming sea-breezes and the soft lullaby of the outgoing tide.

Her twenty little friends helped her to carry her basket of clams to market, and the market-men readily purchased all that she could bring. Some silly boys and girls laughed when they saw Polly's quaint figure trudging to market with a basket full of clams, and said, sneeringly: "We wouldn't do it! We hav money in the bank, we hav!"

"Your bank may break," answered back Polly. "My money is safer in a clam bank!"

To make a long story short, Polly educated herself, helped, as she said, by her twenty friends, without whose aid she declared she could do nothing. She became eventually a successful teacher herself, and this year has gone to Paris. She is very talented and bright, and has plenty of money that she has earned herself. I asked her once to introduce me to her cherished twenty friends that she is always talking of. She immediately showed me the daintiest ten toes and loveliest fingers and thumbs I hav ever seen. They were all dressed in pink and white, as in the days gone by, and bordered with nails as fair and delicate as the tiny sea-shells you hav seen, maybe, and which are brought to this country from foreign ports.

Now, you, my dears, hav twenty just such friends as Polly; so do not despond, do not be discouraged, but do the very best you can, and ever try to achieve some great and moral purpose, and these twenty friends will ever stand by, ready to help and befriend you, to aid you in your ascent up the hights of knowledge and independence; up the ladder of truth, honesty, and goodness.

Little Nellie is Dead.

Shut the door. Pull down the curtains. Shut out the world. My eyes are moist. My soul is sad. Little Nellie is dead. While at play she fell and dislocated her neck. Death was almost instantaneous, and as nearly painless as it is possible for death to be. It was so sudden that her countenance was wreathed in smiles after she was dead.

Every Sunday morning she came up to see "grandpa." In the afternoon I went down to see little Nellie and spent the happiest hour in the week.

She was a rosy, chubby, bewitching child, and the idol of my heart—the one bright spot in my life—but it has gone out forever. She was as bright as a star, as pure as the dewdrop, and as lovely as the dawn.

It is a source of great pleasure to me to realize that there are thousands of "grandpas" whose hearts are thrilled by the winsome ways of bright little grandchildren, who are as dear to them as little Nellie was to me. What a blessing to the world that these little innocents hav such a strange faculty of finding the soft place in the human heart!

It was an old-fashioned funeral, held in a church, and the minister said "it was all for the best." But I cannot believe that "it is all for the best" to bring a child into existence only to receive the love and caresses for a short time of those whose hearts are made glad by its coming and then to be laid cold in death. I cannot believe that "it is all for the best" to tear asunder the tenderest fibers of the heart and burn a blister on the soul.

Why should the tongue giv assent to such a sentiment when there is a house of mourning set up in the heart?

There was a profusion of flowers, but they seemed like a mockery to me. The fairest flower was cold in death. The stem had been broken, and the pure white lily had withered.

The grave was lined with white and strewn with vines and flowers, but it was beyond the art of man to render it attractiv to me. Its jaws were open to take little Nellie forever from my sight. And when I saw the little form, robed in white, lowered into the grave, the world never looked to me so blank and dark and worthless before. And if a tear stole up from the soul's deep well, count it not a weakness. In the changing scenes of life occasions arise when the world's bravest men shed tears.

There can be but one consolation drawn from the death of those we hold dear, and that is, we hav loved them. As hatred and malice and revenge lower and debase us, so love lifts us up and makes us purer and better.

Though Nellie is beyond the reach of harm, and enjoying an undisturbed repose, yet we miss the smiles, the childish talk, the innocent prattle—we miss a thousand things which none can appreciate or understand but those who hav been bereft of the dear ones they loved.

In spite of reason, in spite of philosophy, there is an aching void—and a sepulchral voice keeps saying, "Little Nellie is dead."

Sleep on, sweet babe—the roses fair
Shall blossom on thy bed,
And lovely birds that wing the air
Shall warble o'er thy head.

But there is no reflection that can make the grave yield up its treasure. There is no consolation to be drawn from a mound of earth. Little Nellie is dead.

A Pleasant Letter from a Former Editor.

"ALL IN A LIFETIME."

DEAR MISS WIXON: It givs me great pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your book, "All in a Lifetime." I hav given it a careful perusal and I frankly tell you that I am most agreeably surprised at its great strength and beauty; and it entirely coincides with the sentiments and opinions long entertained by myself. It is a great work, and reflects high honor upon its author for the faithful, finished, artistic, and masterly manner in which she accomplished it. For pungent wit, rollicking drollery, startling surprises, dramatic situations, original and ingenious treatment of characters, graphic delineation of human nature lighted up by flashes of truth so vivid as to carry instant conviction to the mind, we hav not seen its equal since the advent of "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

The work shows its able author to possess a knowledge of facts in real life in American society, a keen eye for observation, and a marvelous insight into human nature, wherewith she searches the human heart with an acumen that brings plainly to view the secrets of its deepest recesses, and unfolds human character with unsurpassed truthfulness. I shall take pleasure in commending "All in a Lifetime" to friends and the trade.

Hoping that this beautiful summer weather will improve your health, I remain,

Very truly yours, JASON WATERS.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Little Rose, aged four years, saw a bunch of keys hanging from her Aunt Mary's belt. Running up to her and taking up one, she asked: "Aunt Mary, what's this the key to?" Aunt Mary: "Oh, that's the key to my trunk." Rose, taking up another: "And what's this the key to?" Aunt Mary: "This is the key to my bureau drawer." Rose, taking up a third: "And what's this the key to?" Aunt Mary: "Well, that is the key to my portfolio." Rose, still persistent, holding up a fourth: "Aunt Mary, what is this the key to?" Aunt Mary, somewhat annoyed, and wishing to quiet the little questioner: "Oh, that's the key to my heart!" Rose, looking up gravely into Aunt Mary's face: "Then you had better giv it to me and let me open it."

Little Clarence, aged three, had been taught to be very careful not to spill his milk while drinking. One day when at dinner he suddenly cried out to his aunt, sitting beside him: "Oh, Auntie Short, I'm spilling my milk!" Auntie, looking down and seeing him drinking very carefully: "No, Clarence, you are not." Clarence: "Yes, I am. I'm spilling it down my throat."—Mrs. E. M. S. B., Lowell, Mass.

Adelaide, aged four, sat on the floor playing with her doll, and asking her mother various questions about God and what he had made. After several fruitless efforts to make her doll stand, she was heard to exclaim: "Well, while he was about it, he might as well hav made this doll so she could stand up."

On another occasion she wanted to know who made the sky, and, on being told, asked what God stood on while he was making it. A little later she propounded the question: "What does God hav to sit on now up in heaven?"

Louise, aged three, was spending Washington's Birthday at her grandfather's. On coming in to lunch, after a searching look at the table, she turned to her aunt with a disappointed expression on her face, and asked: "Where ith the cake and candleth?" On being told there were none, she then asked how soon the party would begin. On having it finally explained to her that George Washington was dead, and that his birthday was still kept because he was such a great man, she exclaimed in a tone of great disgust: "Well, if he ith tho deaded he can't hav a cake or a party, I don't thee what he wanth to hav a birthday for at all then."—M. A. I. New Brighton.

Correspondence.

BERLIN, N. J., Aug. 13, 1888.

MISS WIXON: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER that you hav started a collection for us "poor old critters" among the children of the Corner. Will you be kind enough, if it is not too much trouble, to giv me the names and post-offices of all who hav contributed to that fund, as I wish to send them all my "Lecture and Rhymes," and copies of my old Pleasure Boat, which I started forty-three years ago and published about seventeen years? I hav many volumes of that old paper that I saved for a coming generation. That generation has now come, and I want them to hav the papers. I wrote an article about them for THE TRUTH SEEKER, offering to send them postpaid for fifty cents a volume, together with a copy of my eight-page lecture and eight pages of my "Rhymes," but in the two numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER printed since I sent it not a word has been said about the Boat, and I feel dreadfully disappointed and fear I shall hav to sell them to the rag-men. My Boat turned thousands of the people from the churches. I know several cases where the whole church was broken up and the people turned to holding Liberal meetings and reading Liberal books, and are now a more humane, sensible, and progressiv people.

I hav lately read that one-third of the churches in Maine are closed, and my paper had as much or more to do with that than all other causes, because it started the reform. The Boat is just as interesting now as it was thirty or forty years ago, and just as much needed among churchmen, and would be just as helpful to Liberals in their arguments as it was then. If you can do anything to bring these old papers before the people and let them know they can hav a volume for fifty cents, half the original price, you will do me a great kindness.

Two-cent postage-stamps will do for odd change. A dozen can send fifty cents each and get a dozen different volumes, and hav the reading of them all.

Yours, J. HACKER.

VISALIA, Aug. 13, 288.

DEAR MISS WIXON: In the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER, August 4th, is an article, "Immortality," in which the writer says: "But if men hav souls, why hav not animals?" And the writer might hav added: plants also? For in tracing the analogy between animals and plants the most striking characteristics are manifested. A close observer can draw but one conclusion—that the life principle within man, beast, bird, or tree is a unit varying in form only, not in principle. That plants think, or manifest what is termed instinct in animals or reason in man, is not generally supposed, and some courage is required to boldly make the assertion. And yet a close observer of the habits of plants daily witnesses manifestations of intelligence in their search for food, for support in climbing, and more particularly in the selection of the sexes, showing plainly that plants either think for themselvs, or some one for them, which makes the analogy between them and many men almost perfect. Plants hav, to the full extent of their necessities, a power of observation in the selection of their food, and where, to a considerable extent, to obtain it—for instance, bury the carcass of an animal in the garden say twenty feet from a grape-vine, and the underground part of the vine will at once change its direction, and make a direct march for this new storehouse of food, and upon reaching it will put out an incredible number of roots for the consumption of the food. If anyone wishes to witness the persistency of the vine in its efforts to obtain food, let them dig a trench two feet deep between the vine and the carcass. When the vine reaches the trench it, as it were, takes in the situation at a glance, and takes a downward course until it reaches the bottom of the trench, then tunnels under, comes up to near the surface on the other side, and finishes its journey. The movements of the squash-vine when pressed by thirst are truly wonderful. During a severe drouth place a basin of water at night say two feet from the vine, and in the morning it will be found bathing in the basin. Does not this indicate a knowledge in the vine analogous to reason in man or instinct in animals? There must be some agency employed to bring the vine to the basin—either the plant's own volition, or its direct guidance by the unerring laws of nature, analogous to cause and effect. T. J. CONLEY.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE NINE DEMANDS

Poetry.

Immortality.

Dedicated with all due respect to Christian preachers, because in one line of this poem will be found more truth and sound philosophy than will be heard from the pulpit in a hundred years.

'Tis said that when hope dies the man must die.
Then I am nigh to death. I look all round
The horizon of life and see no ray.
No! not one ray of light, of hope, amid
The dull, black void, the dense obscurity
Of this my world, my cold and cheerless world.
There is one good in life; to many 'tis
The first, last, only good—the terminus!
What is that end? A great leap in the dark,
I grant you. What of that? 'Tis but to share
The fate of millions, billions, trillions,
Who hav gone before.
Man, wild, in nature
Savage, primitiv, believes and doubts not
In immortality. The more his mind
Becomes enlightened—as Science sheds
Her gilding rays upon his wandering way—
The more he tends and drifts toward cold belief
In sad Materialism.
Mind
Never yet was found apart from clay;
Until we know it can exist alone,
Separate from matter, how in the name
Of common sense can we declare it doth?
Eternal matter! grand immortal clay!
May change eternally but never waste—
The mass of matter ever just the same!
In all the universe man knows but two Identities—these mind and matter called.
As matter changes form and still remains,
So mind may change the dwelling, still exist.
Be there one mighty being, he must bow
To nature's law; because the law compels.
A god immortal cannot kill himself,
Hence law is higher, mightier than a god.
No greater insult, greater blasphemy,
Can human lips output than to declare
The "word of God" a book enwritten by
The hand divine!
The scriptures tell us, clearly, Jesus Christ
Was illegitimate, and by these words:
"He was a man like unto us"—and hence
He was the son of man, by no means God.
The Christian is
The silliest being e'er the sun shone on.
In any age ne'er lived in all this world,
Howe'er grotesque his superstition was,
The poor idolator so much a fool
As to bow down before a natural son
Of any woman, to adore as God.
The so-called "revelation" is, must be,
A glaring insult to the modern mind;
A ghastly, hideous fiction; worthy, fit
For days of darkness, ignorance, and fear!
The devotee can never draw the line
Between imagination, revelation—
The terms are interchangeable with Faith.
Poor Christian with a gruesome look, and tone
Most awful, solemn, yells in frantic fear:
"Art thou prepared to die?" Poor coward man,
Hast thou one grain of sense? Then con this well:
Life, not death, prepares for death; that is,
A good, pure life smooths down the path of death.
As good, eccentric Dow the younger
With wit and wisdom graphic puts the point—
The sinner livs the devil's servant till
The hour supreme, then in articulo
Mortis says that he repents, or, as Dow
In his quaint words depicts it: "He burns the Candle of his life to serve the devil,
And blows the snuff in the face of the Lord."
The man who tries to do the right commits
No sin; the man who shuns that which he knows
Is wrong commits no sin. Judgment's errors
Cannot be a wrong; though awful sequence
May full oft result from Error's judging.
If there be a life beyond the grave,
A good life here is better than a bad;
If there be no life beyond the grave,
A good life here is better than a bad. J. L. C.

Washington, D. C., August, Year of Independence 113.

A Dream.—A Future State.

Wednesday morning, March 14, 1888, just after broad daylight, while lightly dozing in bed, came to me a peculiar conviction of another state of existence after death, in a dream. In the dream I was thinking—seemingly while on the street in the city, with people in sight and hearing—about a future state, and as to the reality or unreality of such a state, reasoning upon the matter, when there came like a flash—that is, quickly—to my mind, with a thrill of gladness, a conviction of its reality and a realization of its condition, which was that of great happiness and joyfulness, in company with others, as in a sort of heaven or spirit land. Upon the realization of this conviction and experience, I shouted "Glory! glory! glory!" accompanying the cry with an equally joyful clapping of my hands, like a "new convert," as if I had just "got religion." (My parents were Methodists. I was reared in the atmosphere of "protracted meetings.") Immediately upon coming to this conviction my mind reverted to what I had thought and written upon this same subject of future existence about twenty-five years before, which was that, inasmuch as we hav a natural desire for a future or continued life after death, we will hav it, and I then put it somewhat in this wise:

All unvitiated natural desires
Are possible of access,
To which the aspirant aspires—

on the ground that otherwise nature itself, as embodied in ourselvs, would be a cheat. Accompanying this thought was this other thought—I mean on the occasion of the dream—that, considering all the sublime wonders and possibilities of nature, as revealed to us through the telescope, microscope, solar spectrum, astronomical photography, and the still greater wonders, if possible, of the psychical world, there is nothing impossible for nature to accomplish that it is desirable she should accomplish; and that being, on the whole or in the "long run," beneficent, she will and does accomplish in some way, in some time, the desirable in this general and large sense.

So much as to the dream. Now, a few words as to the possible or probable immediately exciting causes of it may be interesting. I had read the Sunday before the autobiographical sketch of Miss Owen, and the address of Rev. Mr. Williams, lately delivered before the Nineteenth Century Club, on "Sectarianism." Both interested me very considerably; and especially Miss Owen's experience in her skepticism, Spiritualism, and what she called her conversion to Christianity. I thought, and still think, her account of her "conversion" very remarkable, considering her, as I am bound to do by the way she impresses me, a very honest and sincere as well as intelligent person. I was interested particularly in that portion of Mr. Williams's paper representing his views on the two forces or influences in religion, viz., of individual or isolated experience and associativ or combination experience as in an organized church or assemblage. Then, I had just read the evening before a portion of an article in the Fortnightly (for February) by Frances Power Cobbe, entitled, "The Education of the Emotions," which treats of the contagion of the emotions, showing that but a small portion of our emotions were at first hand, or from independent stimula, and that the larger share came from the contagion of sympathy with the emotion of others. And upon the theory that our dreams are likely to come from what has occupied our thoughts most while awake, this dream of mine may hav been incited in part by the reading of these essays.

As to the argument that the desire for a future life is evidence of it, I will add that such a desire may first be a cause of it, on the principle that "the wish may be father to the thought," and that the wish and the thought together may be the father of the deed or the fact, that is, may create or bring about the reality of the condition or state desired. And are we not creators? Do we not every day make conditions and circumstances for ourselvs and neighbors, or fellows? We are all indeed no less—except in degree—makers of circumstances than was Napoleon, or than we are—again except in degree—creatures of circumstances.

We are all creatures of circumstances,
Yet to them go to school,
Learning and helping,
All other things to rule.

Am I convinced of the reality of this future existence? No; not altogether. Not yet. Hav I searched for further evidence? Yes. I hav looked into mesmerism or hypnotism, and hav practiced it in its various degrees of clairvoyance, etc. Also into Spiritism, for as many years. And hav not neglected Rosicrucianism, nor esoteric Buddhism, nor Indian Theosophy. What is my belief? I am a scientist. That is, I believe there is such a thing as truth. That it is possible for man to discover it. That it is worthy of, or demands, our highest confidence or faith concerning the here or hereafter, if there be a hereafter, or if there will be a hereafter when we shall hav made one, or helped to do so. And that the way to find it, and to demonstrate it, and to be sure we hav found it, is by the use of the scientific method.

These additional thoughts I am writing ten days after I had the dream. On the day following the morning of the dream I undertook to narrate the dream simply—to hav and to preserve a record of it and to relate it, for I then felt and thought it to be of importance. It added to my cheerfulness and happiness at the time. It does not now seem to me of so much importance, but still of importance.

It is a well-attested fact in psychology that persons hav worked out difficult problems in their sleep which they hav been anxious to solve, but had failed to solve while awake.

It just occurs to me to add that "a future state" does not necessarily mean "immortality." Immortality is an impossibility and absurdity—that is, if we grant a commencement; for,

A line that has one end must hav two,
Is a thing as plain as it is true.

There must be an end, some time or other, to what begun some time or other. The question here is, when this end? Does it come at the period of what we call death or the ending of the body, or does there continue till some other period an individual consciousness of being? As to the time of the final end, may it not be that,

When we hav lived
Till all selfishness is dead,
Then we'll blend in
With the great fountain-head?

The Buddhists seem to hold to this view in their doctrin of Nirvana. The theory of evolution would seem to demand this sort of return. Evolution implies involution or dissolution. And this alone answers to the rhythmic law of Spencer. This sort of return to whence it came seems as natural and logical a necessity in the case of the "mental" or "spiritual" being as in the case of the physical.

Nor does any of this conflict with the doctrin of monism. Body and mind may be but different aspects of the same thing, the two colors of the two sides of the same shield. W. M. BOUCHER.

A Memoir of Christian and Extra-Christian Experience.

By NATHANIEL RAMSAY WATERS.

A very critical analysis of both Protestantism and Catholicism, from the vantage-ground of an intimate personal experience with the two systems. It deals the most trenchant blows which pure logic is capable of inflicting.—[Critical Review.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

O MAY I join the choir invisible,
Of those immortal dead who liv again
In minds made better by their presence: liv

And with their mild persistence urge man's search
To vaster issues. —George Eliot.

BUT heard are the Voices—
Heard are the Sages,
The Worlds and the Ages:

A soldier's grave, for thee the best;
Then look around, and choose thy ground,
And take thy rest. —Byron.

TAKING into consideration everything connected with these verses, "On This Day I Complete My Thirty-sixth Year"—the last tender aspirations of a loving spirit which they breathe, the self-devotion to a noble cause which they so nobly express, and that consciousness of a near grave glimmering sadly through the whole—there is perhaps no production within the range of mere human composition, round which the circumstances and feelings under which it was written cast so touching an interest.—Moore.

MURDERING A MAN FOR GATHERING STICKS ON SUNDAY.

And they that found him gathering sticks brought him unto Moses and Aaron, and unto all the congregation. And the Lord said unto Moses, The man shall be surely put to death: all the congregation shall stone him with stones without the camp.—Num. xv, 33-35.

Odds and Ends.

IT is always bad for the truth when a liar speaks it.

FIRST Newporter: "There's another English duke coming here soon." Second Newporter: "You don't say! What's his scandal?"

TRAMP: "You wouldn't think, madam, that not so very long ago I was at the top." Woman: "Well, I dunno—I s'pose they put you in one of the upper tiers."

A FARMER writes to an agricultural paper asking, "How to make fence-posts last?" and the editor wisely restrains an impulse to tell him to make the fence-rails first.

MAGISTRATE (to plaintiff with lump on his head): "If your wife threw a sad-iron at you, why didn't you dodge?" Plaintiff: "I did, your honor, and that's how I came to get hit."

THE paradox in political strife,
We think, has nothing to match it;
The hotter the war goes on, we see
The deeper is buried the hatchet.

THE girl who has fine teeth may not hav a keener sense of humor than other women, but you can depend on her to show all the appreciation she has of a joke or a funny story.

HE kissed her 'neath the moon's pale rays,
He kissed her on the lips and "forrid,"
She bent on him her melting gaze,
And softly murmured, "Ain't you horrid?"

THE truth of the theory contained in Darwin's chief work does not burst upon one so suddenly while reading the book as while visiting almost any high-priced, so-called aristocratic resort.

MCSHANE: "Oi doan't know phwat this counthry is comin' to, indade Oi doan't! Thim furriners is runnin' things all their own way." Morgenstern: "Dot vas yust so. Ein natif Amerigan don'd haf no chance, ain'd it?"

MRS. MURPHY: "And how is your husband today?" Mrs. McGinty: "Shure, it's bad he is. He's wastin' away wid the consumption. If he kapes on getting thinner and thinner he'll make a devil of a poor corpse, I'm thinking."

STREET-CAR conductor (to countryman): "If you saw him picking the gentleman's pocket, why didn't you interfere, instead of letting him get away?" Countryman: "I saw that sign up there, 'Beware of Pickpockets,' an' b'gosh I was afraid to!"

MASTER: "No, Pat; there's no use your asking me for more money. You're your own worst enemy, and will drink yourself to death." Patrick Monahan: "Thrue for ye, sir. Oi'm me own wor'rst inimy, but the dhrink puts me on good ter-rms wid mesilf."

"Do you solemnly swear," said the clerk to a witness in court, "that the evidence you shall giv in the case shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth?" The witness hesitated and then said: "I've been circulation editor of the New York World for several years, but I'll do my best."

"I CONFESS that I am not indifferent to you," she said, with an assumption of shyness, "but I am afraid that my papa will think I am not yet of a proper age to marry." "Nonsense," he argued, passionately, "I've known women sixty and seventy years old to marry."

"AND do you doubt my love?" he asked, passionately. "No, George," she answered, with admirable tact; "but when you say that the day you call me yours will usher in an era of lifelong devotion and tender solicitude you—pardon me, dear—you put it on a trifle too thick. You seem to forget, George, that I am a widow."

A MINISTER once told Wendell Phillips that if his business in life was to save negroes he ought to go South, where they were, and do it. "That's worth thinking of," replied Phillips; "and what is your business in life?" "To save men from hell," replied the minister. "Then go there and attend to your business," said Mr. Phillips.

MR. ISAACSTEIN: "I sells you dot coat, my frent, for sayventeen tollar; you dake hum along!" Customer: "I thought, Isaacstein, that you didn't do business on Saturday. Isn't this your Sunday?" Mr. Isaacstein (in a low, reverent tone of voice): "My frent, to sell a coat like dot for sayventeen tollar vas not peesness—dot vas charity."

"THEY are making a door with five keyholes," said Mrs. Augur. "What is the use of so many?" asked Mr. Augur. "It will be much easier to unlock. You can find it much more easily when you come home late," responded the kind lady. "Rubbish!" responded Mr. Augur. "Idiocy! When I come home late one keyhole is about as much as I care to find."

"BRETHREN," said the Arizona minister, pausing a moment in his discourse, "to save you the trouble of climbing up on your seats to look out of that window every minute or two, I will state that I hav a written assurance from the captain of the Bear Gulch regulators that the hanging of the horse-thief who was caught yesterday will not take place until 2:30 o'clock, and it is now only half-past 11. There is nobody in the adjoining grove yet. If there is any more fidgeting I shall take up a collection. I now proceed to the consideration of the third clause of my text."

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 15. No. 37. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. {New York, Saturday, September 15, 1888.} 28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

A COMPARISON OF RECORDS.—THE PREACHER VS. THE PATRIOT.

Notes and Clippings.

THE holding of the Spiritualist congress in Barcelona calls attention to the fact that Spiritualism is very popular in Spain, especially in the army.

THE Boston Herald points out the fact that Professor Lowell, in reviving his political essays, as he has in his latest published volume, subjects himself to scrutiny as a prophet. It seems that he declared in writing, in the year 1860, on the eve of the Rebellion, that there was no occasion to apprehend serious efforts toward dissension on the part of the South. The professor, however, owns up like a little man, and does not suppress his verbal miscue, so to speak.

A LARGE number of orthodox clergymen hav accepted the invitation of Duke Erastus Wiman to go down to Staten Island and witness the "Fall of Rome." They are encouraged by the fact that the spectacle will make clear the sufferings of the early martyrs of the church. When they find that the show provides seventy-five lithe-limbed ballet-girls for every martyr they will doubtless be shocked. They may regret that Rome does not fall oftener and harder.

PROF. C. M. MEAD, writing to the Advance from Interlaken, says the accession of William II. is a good thing for evangelical religion in Germany. He charges that Empress Victoria is a Freethinker and would hav exerted her influence with Frederick to organize a Rationalistic court. The new emperor is a religious man of orthodox views and his wife is a "most earnestly religious woman.' Yet the whole world knows that the Rationalist Frederick and his Freethinking wife would hav made Germany peaceful and civilized, while William and his pious spouse are aching for war that their Christian subjects may kill some other tyrant's Christian subjects.

A TELEGRAM of a few days ago from Fall River, Mass., announced that at a Jewish wedding held there on Sunday last there was the characteristic revelry and happiness. Some stupid and officious policeman, considering the event a violation of the Sunday laws, arrested the entire party and locked them up for the night, the bride and bridegroom being in different cells. Citizens in general protested against the gross outrage, but could not avert it. Such an invasion of sacred rights could not happen in California, and Massachusetts is to be pitied for her Puritan views and the prudish officers who enforce them.—San Francisco Jewish Times.

A PARIS philanthropist induced a number of generous merchants, manufacturers, and tradespeople to take into their employment such unemployed men as he should send with letters of recommendation. Then he advertised for men out of work, got together a great throng, talked to them of the dignity of labor, the blessings of economy, the dangers of intemperance, and then directed them to call for letters of recommendation that would put them in the way of getting work at the minimum rate of eighty cents a day. Immediately more than half of his throng of 727 unemployed men disappeared, and that was the last he saw of them. Of the remainder some took letters and never presented them; some worked half a day and then wanted the wages of that time, and at the end of three days only eighteen men were at their posts, and these were all genuin artisans and laborers.

IT is claimed to be proved beyond all doubt that waters which circulate or stand in leaden pipes or vessels, not only take up particles of lead through mechanical action due to friction, but attack the metal, the result of this being generally lead carbonate. According to the most eminent authorities in this line, minute quantities of lead thus introduced into and accumulating in the system must rank among the causes of anemia and defectiv nutrition in large towns.

MR. SHEPARD, of the pious Mail and Express, in a speech before the Chautauqua assembly, said: "To attempt to abolish poverty is an attempt to discredit our Lord Jesus Christ's declaration and prophecy, 'The poor ye hav with you always,' and either one of these attempts is as sensible, and not more so, as to attempt to abolish appetite." The World of this remarks: "Mr. Shepard is a son-in-law of the late Wm. H. Vanderbilt. His poverty was miraculously abolished several years ago in the face of Christ's declaration and prophecy, and it is but natural that he should regard the effort of his fellow-beings to benefit themselvs as more or less sacrilegious."

THE Brazilian papers, says the Sun, giv satisfactory accounts of the working of the new law for the total abolition of negro slavery in Dom Pedro's empire. It is nearly seventeen years since the adoption of the project for the gradual emancipation of the Brazilian slaves, whose number was then given as nearly 1,500,000, but the operation of that project was not according to the desire of the emperor, who, when he visited this country in 1876, was favorably impressed with the results of negro liberation in our Southern states. Three years ago he brought about the adoption of a measure to hasten the progress of emancipation; but when he realized that even this would continue the existence of slavery beyond his own lifetime, he became impatient to secure a law which would put an end to the system during his reign. While he was absent in Europe, from which he has but recently returned, the desired measure was adopted by the Brazilian Parliament, and, with the gathering of this year's coffee crop, all the slaves of Brazil are entitled to freedom. The slaveholders receive no compensation for the loss of their chattels, yet readily accept the new order of things for which their emperor has so long striven. We learn from the Brazilian papers that the negroes are jubilant over their emancipation, and they participated in the grand ovation which was given to the emperor upon his arrival in Rio de Janeiro. There has been no disturbance of the public peace in any of the provinces of the empire. The great mass of the negro workers on the plantations hav given evidence that they will continue at the labor to which they hav always been accustomed, and those who hav been household servants will do the same thing. In short, the reports from all quarters are favorable. Dom Pedro is to be congratulated upon the accomplishment of the great and noble object to which he has devoted his best efforts during the whole of his reign, and upon the way in which the freedmen hav justified his action.

Wages and Tariffs.

Is Mr. Blaine right in predicting that, "if we hav free trade, the factories will be run at half the wages that are now paid?" Is he doing the greatest possible service to American laborers in calling upon them to vote against "the Democratic presumption that offers to put them on the basis—the low-level basis—of European wages?" Are the Republicans really working in the interest of workingmen?

If I thought so, I would vote that ticket. But I cannot overlook the fact that the same men who say on the platform to the laborer that they are his best friends, are sending round a confidential circular, issued by the Republican League of the United States from their headquarters, 32 West 28th street, New York, and calling for contributions from the manufacturers, on the ground that these latter are getting "practically the sole benefit, or at least the most directly important benefits, of the tariff." Do the men who send round that circular really think that the tariff is keeping up wages? They are working in the interest of the manufacturers, and that means trying to keep wages down.

They talk about European wages, but they do not mention the fact that those countries where the laborer is worst off, namely Germany, Italy, Spain, and Russia, hav high protectiv tariffs. The wages in Europe are highest where the tariff is lowest, namely, in Great Britain. They are not so high even there as here. How can they be amid a dense population, with no cheap land, and under a social system which keeps the poor man down? America will always be a good country for the workingman, whatever may be the tariff. And why talk of European wages? Why not say Australian? There is New South Wales, with as low a tariff and as cheap goods as England, and yet with higher wages than ours. The rate is nominally the same—$2 a day for common laborers and $2 50 to $3 for mechanics—but their day is only eight hours. Why don't the Blaine men tell this to the workingman, if they really are his friends?

And why, again, do they all forget to mention some other important facts. For instance, men are paid much higher than women for doing the same work here, as is especially the case in our schools. Then again, wages are much higher on the Pacific than on the Atlantic coast, and in New England than in the South. The tariff has nothing to do with either of these differences, nor, again, with the fact that some of the highest wages paid in this country are earned by carpenters, masons, and house-servants, who get no special protection against foreigners. Take all these facts, with those about Australia and Germany, and we see that it is not true that wages are high or low just as the tariff is.

The real state of the case is simply this: Wages are always high in countries where the amount of production is great in proportion to the number of producers, and low where that amount is small. Call one class of countries rich and the other poor; and we see that wages are high in Australia as well as in America, because both countries are rich, though they differ in their tariffs. So India, Russia, and China are all poor countries and hav low wages, although two of them are protected highly. We all know that the laborer is better off in a rich and prosperous community than in one where there is no business or wealth. All patriots agree in wishing to hav our country produce much and prosper greatly. That will be best for the laborer and everyone else. The only question about the tariff is, What rate of duties will be most favorable to the productivness and prosperity of the United States?

And what hav I to say about free trade? Only this: These words hav but two honest meanings, either abolishing the tariff altogether, or else reducing it, like the English, to a purely revenue basis. Any other meaning given to the words is either a blunder or a fraud. Take them as they ought to be taken—honestly, and there is no more danger of the establishment of free trade by the Democratic party, than there is of their setting up the messianic kingdom.

The only real questions between the two great parties are, Whether the tariff is to be so reduced as to make the average rate of duties forty-two instead of forty seven per cent, and to put wool, salt, and a few other necessaries of life on the free list. Whether these changes are likely to lessen the productivness of our industries, or to put down wages, or in any other way to injure the laboring classes, is a question not to be answered by wild tirades against free trade, but by careful study of the actual facts.

Now, the boot and shoe business is one of our most flourishing industries. It supplies the home market completely; and our exports of leather goods hav risen since 1872 from $3,700,000 to nearly $11,000,000. During that time we nearly doubled our import of foreign hides, and domestic hides continued to be used up as fast as they were supplied. No state of things could be better for the earners of wages; and it is largely due to the fact that this is almost the only one of our industries which comes anywhere near having free raw materials. Hides hav been imported free of duty since 1873, and the result is the best possible for all parties, even the farmers. Would it not be well to take another step in the same direction, and giv to the boot and shoe men, as well as to all the other manufacturers, cheaper iron and lumber? The less the factory pays for raw materials, the cheaper it can make goods; the cheaper the goods, the larger will be the sales; and the greater the production, the higher will be the wages. No one can doubt the advantage of free raw materials, when we consider that the manufacturers and workingmen in foreign countries all insist on having them, whatever may otherwise be the tariff. Many of our own manufacturers and operativs take the same ground; for here is a point where the interests of employed and employee coincide. There are, however, some manufacturers who do not try to increase their products, because they are members of trusts which keep prices up by keeping production down. These trusts lower wages, and at the same time raise prices against the wage-earner. Nothing would be more for his interest than to break up every trust. The only way is to let in competition from abroad. The lumber trust is enabled, by the duty on lumber, to run up its price against every farmer and manufacturer. This increases the cost of production in all industries, and so makes it harder to dispose of the products. Put lumber on the free list, as is proposed by the Democrats, and the trust would hav to giv way under the competition with Canada. The American farmer and manufacturer would be able to produce grain and goods at lower prices without loss. The demand for American products would increase both at home and abroad, and would be met by employing more laborers at higher wages. The trusts may benefit the employer, but it is at the expense of the laborer, as well as of the whole community. The only way to abolish trusts is to reduce the tariff.

I say "reduce," not abolish. I am no free trader, but I am a free-raw-material-ist; and that is precisely the position of Mr. Cleveland and the Democratic party. The reductions they propose, not only in the Mills bill, but in the more recent ones just introduced by Mr. Breckinridge, are precisely such as are best adapted to break down the trusts, to cheapen raw materials, to diminish the expense of manufacturing, and thus in every way to increase the amount of production and rate of wages.

Nowhere would this be more certain than in the woolen mills, which would gain as much from free wool as the shoe shops gain from free hides. The cost of making cloth is now increased about 40 cents a pound by the tax on wool; when this is taken off, as it will be if Cleveland is elected, the factory will make just as much profit out of woolens at $1.50 a yard as now out of the same goods at $2.

There will be no more danger of being undersold by foreigners than at present, for the protectiv duty, which is now 35 or 40 per cent, will be 40 per cent on all grades. A secondary duty, which is now imposed per weight in order to repay the manufacturer for what he loses by the tax on wool, will cease to be needed for his protection. He will hav just as much protection as before, and the people will hav cheaper cloth. As our woolens sink in price there will be a greater demand for them, not only at home but abroad. How much we hav to gain in foreign markets may be judged by such facts as that in 1880 England exported four hundred and fifty times as many dollars' worth of woolen goods as we did, and how much is still to gain at home is shown by the fact that our import of them is worth 12 per cent of all the woolens we use.

How much our cotton and other industries would gain in productivness, and how wages would thus rise as raw materials become cheaper, I leave it for the reader to judge. So much is said by the champions of trusts and monopolies about the mischief which was done before the war by reduction, that I must call attention to the facts. The first important reduction was a gradual one, which went on from 1833 to 1842. Harriet Martineau, Lyell the great scientist, and other travelers who visited us at this time speak of the entire absence of want or pauperism, and call America the laborer's paradise. They saw no beggars, even in New York city, in 1841, and Lowell looked as if it were full of "ladies and gentlemen playing at factory for their own amusement." That is the time when the factory girls published their own magazine, the Lowell Offering. The tariff was raised in 1842, but lowered again in 1846; and this reduction was found so beneficial that the rates were lowered in 1857, with the approval of the leaders of both parties, to about one-half of their present average. The result was that between 1850 and 1860 the number of operativs increased 10 per cent faster than the population, and the annual value of factory products more than twice as fast, while the average amount of wages paid in factories increased 20 per cent. It should also be remembered that we were enabled by tariff reduction to export nearly four times as many dollars' worth of manufactured goods in 1860 as in 1847. The savings banks commissioners of Massachusetts, in their report for 1887, state that the average annual increase of deposits during the twenty-seven years of low tariff, before 1861, was much more rapid than during the twenty-seven years of high tariff since 1860. The amount of savings per inhabitant increased 159 per cent from 1850 to 1860, but only one-fifth as much (31 per cent) from 1870 to 1880, while the rate since 1880 has been only one-tenth as high as under low tariffs.

These facts I present at length, because Mr. W. T. S. Hadley, in THE TRUTH SEEKER for August 25th, says that the Democrats "want our well-paid workmen to work for foreign wages," and "where they now get $2 a day and are able to make fortunes, to work for twenty cents a day and die serfs." Was that the case here in 1860? Is it the case now in Australia, where they actually hav the eight-hour law which Mr. Hadley desires? Is the skilled laborer a serf in New South Wales or even in England, where wages rose nearly 10 per cent between 1872 and 1883, while they fell more than 5 per cent in Massachusetts? Is that the best possible state of things for our laborers which leaves a million of men out of work, according to Mr. Powderly? How about the strikes and the tramps? How about the figures presented by the labor bureau of Massachusetts, showing that, on the average, ten laborers in every hundred were without work during the year ending with April, 1885? How many of the men who read these lines are "able to make fortunes?" Or suppose that, instead of answering these questions, Mr. Hadley will tell us what he thinks of this assertion by a Republican senator, Mr. Sharon, quoted from the Nevada Chronicle by Heath's "Labor and Finance Revelation," page 259, and Willey's "Whither are We Drifting?" page 62: "The moneyed interests of the country, for self-preservation, must sustain the Republican party. The railroads, the banks, the manufactories, the heavy importers, and all classes of business in which millions are invested will maintain the supremacy of the Republican party." That is the way that party talked while it held the administration. What right has it to ask the workingman to restore the supremacy it has forfeited?

Mr. Hadley givs no proof for his assertion that "the Democratic party wants to put our great home industries on the free list and only retain a tariff for revenue, which simply means no protection at all." There is no better statement of what the Democrats want than the Mills bill, which is a plan for a protectiv tariff. Read it for yourselvs! I say once more that the real question is tariff vs. tariff. Mr. Hadley had better prove his charge that this statement is "dishonestly misleading," or else withdraw it, to avoid being suspected of having painted his own portrait.

Having no copy of the article of July 14th, I can only say that my estimate of the money now in our treasury at $530,000,000 errs on the safe side, as business men say it is $733,000,000. What part of the annual revenue is strictly to be called "surplus" is another question. The secretary of the treasury put it at $113,000,000. One of the latest estimates I hav seen is $133,000,000. Mr. Hadley says $60,000,000, and even that is large enough to demand a reduction of the tariff. When I said that the Republican party is unwilling to "surrender any part of our protectiv system," I merely quoted the Chicago platform, which is a much better authority than last winter's speeches. As regards sugar and molasses, it is to be remembered that the Democrats did offer to reduce those duties in the Mills bill, which was and is opposed by the Republicans, and also that Mr. Breckinridge has just introduced a special bill, which would make just these reductions and no others, and which will break down the sugar trust, if the Republicans will consent to its passage. The fact that Washington and Hamilton were satisfied with duties only one-sixth as high, on the average, as those now in force shows that there is nothing very "absurd and unjust" in favoring a reduction of duties which would leave them five times as high as the standard adopted by the "old heroes." I say further that the last panic we had took place under a high tariff—essentially that now in force—and that we could afford perfectly well to use part of the gold, which began to pour in from California before 1850, in making such purchases abroad as raised the value of exports above imports. What can we do better with our gold than to spend it for whatever we need? But I hav said enough to show that the tariff and wages problem is not to be solved by taking it for granted that the Democrats are trying to turn all our mechanics into serfs.

Biographical.

From the Chicago Times of September 4th.

Rev. James S. Greene, nearly eighty years of age and former rector of St. Matthew's Reformed Episcopal church on Larrabee street, was evicted from the Grand Pacific Hotel last night, where he occupied elegant quarters with an innocent bride, on the charge of bigamy preferred against him by a legal wife who left him a short time ago in fear of her life.

For over half a century a minister of the gospel, if the best evidence is true, he has between family prayers, during which he fell over with intoxication, been not only addicted to the inevitable minor vices, but has been a forger, a state-prison convict, three times divorced from wives, who hav died of insanity and broken hearts, and has married six women.

Shame, Where Is Thy Blush?

While sympathizing with everybody and everything that tends toward truth seeking, with those choosing attacks on the Bible as their means I consider love's labor lost. I look upon them as upon the small boy who, after having succeeded in chipping off the corner of a huge cake of ice, rejoices over his success and thinks that because that piece was sufficient to cool off his small body, the cake is utterly ruined. But we know differently, for the value of the cake is unimpaired. The identical case is with the Bible-attackers. Some would-be iconoclasts, after succeeding in chipping off a corner of it, rejoice in the thought, because it satisfied their minds, that the remainder is ruined; but we know better.

To fight for the truth against its assailant, falsehood, I would suggest that theology, like physic, should be thrown to the dogs. As a substitute take up hard facts, uncomplicated and comprehensible to all. As champion in the innovation, I will lead in the van. The followers of the Nazarite are exulting in having found the foundation of truth, love, justice, humility and forbearance, in fact, everything that is good and noble, in the person of Jesus Christ. But in the annals of history we are confronted with many black pages relating to the modes of infusing these noble qualities into the world. They are certainly too revolting for specification. How much love does the Catholic bestow upon the Protestant, the Protestant upon the Catholic, and both upon the Jew? Thousands of ministers are explaining every Sunday to multitudes of adults and children the loveliness of Christianity by displaying a diagram of sheol where the unbelievers in Christianity are constantly bathing in a sea of brimstone. If occasionally the bathers are taken out to dry, then they are hung up on hooks by the bathing-master, Satan. This is love with a vengeance.

As to Christian truth and justice, I will disprove their existence, by living facts, minus theology. Christianity has taken upon itself the sacred duty of spreading the gospel far and wide. It singled out the Jew as a specialty, according to the gospel: "To the Jew first, and also to the Greek." A stock company, under the firm name of missionary societies, is established all over the world, with a capital stock of unlimited millions. While the principal is enjoyed by the missionaries here on earth, the dividends are paid out in heaven upon the presentation of coupons by the enterprising stockholders. In New York, the metropolis of Uncle Sam's dominion, with an enormous, growing population of the unconverted Jew, many attempts at establishing a Christian clearing-house where the Jew should be stamped and canceled were incorporated, but met with failure. The head managers, the missionaries, though never having decamped with their boodle to Canada, too often were carried off to penitentiaries. But it came to pass in those days that a ruler after their own heart was secured. His name was Freshman. He not only was baptized in the spirit, but also branded himself son of a rabbi. Though his parents' history would be quite interesting, they being dead I will take up the thread of the loving prodigal son. This son of a rabbi was taken upon the wings of many prominent divines, but their strength failed them. It is true that the first two weeks, the Herald announced, yielded sixteen Jewish bodies, with as many Christian souls in them. But it turned out to be a regular Herald delusion, as neither the souls nor the bodies could be produced. This falsifying statement, though emanating from the son of a rabbi himself, did not stop the flow of Christian shekels into his coffers. He, in return, resolved not to touch a single cent of the thousands pouring down upon him, for he did not know how to utilize the money, since he and his good lady resolved to liv upon faith, the whole faith, and nothing but the faith. For this we hav his own words, in his sixth annual report, page 13, line 8. This of course accounts for not keeping an account of either receipts or disbursements.

With all his faith and the faith placed upon him by his hypocritical aides de camp, he would hav remained in obscurity and died the death of the faithful. But in an evil hour I became a truth seeker, arguing that since the entire missionary scheme is intended for the salvation of the Jew I, as one of them, though perhaps a bad Jew—but was there ever a Jew bad enough not to be a fit subject for embracing Christianity?—acting upon the impulse of the moment, led myself like a sheep to the slaughter and introduced myself to the lord high executioner Freshman. With tears in my eyes I unbosomed myself to the high priest Freshman—that a bad Jew wished to be converted into a good Christian. With his once Jewish instinct he took in the situation at a glance, and no doubt was directed from heaven, with which he is commercially connected, as related in his fifth annual report, page 8, line 14, where he draws upon it as follows: "Lord, be pleased to send me $50." He emphatically refused to convert me into either an ex- or son of a rabbi, which, as a rule, the convert is entitled to. This barefaced falsehood so enraged me that I sounded the alarm to his divine supporters, taking it for granted that they were not aware of his huge ignorance and black, depraved, false character. Instead of hailing the great tidings of truth with gladness, they began to put me off in such a manner as only Christian ministers know. After years of postponement, I made it so hot for them in THE TRUTH SEEKER that it brought out the Rev. Dr. Charles F. Deems, one of the advisory board of that money-making scheme, who took me in his confidence and imparted to me a fatherly advice that I ran the risk of being lost in the meshes of newspaper notoriety. I should in the future adopt a more rational modus operandi, i.e., to hav the stated facts directed to the president of the board of trustees. He, as one of them, would see to it that it should reach its destination and hav the desired effect. With tearful eyes and bended knees I thanked him from the bottom of my heart, for I felt sure to be on the right road of truth avenging itself upon falsehood. In twenty-four hours the desired facts were in the possession of Dr. Deems, who favored me with a prompt acknowledgment. After patience refused to be a virtue, I began to shower upon him epistles for his negligence. This brought out an explanatory letter from Dr. Deems, that after sending my letter to the wrong chairman, he succeeded in finding out the right one, to whom he forwarded my facts, and that it was under consideration. Weeks of patient waiting brought no results. Finally, I presented myself before the august body of the president, H. B. Turner, Esq., a prominent lawyer of No. 20 Nassau street. After showing him the letter of Dr. Deems, I inquired what action had been taken. "My dear sir," he replied, "it is all Hebrew to me. I never either saw or heard anything about the letter in question. With difficulty I succeeded in seeing Dr. Deems. When I broached the subject to him, apprising him of the President Turner episode, Dr. Deems became white with rage, and made use of epithets that you need not look for in a Sunday-school textbook.

"But, doctor," I calmly replied, "no amount of rage on your part will make me return the compliment. I simply expect to receive a civil answer to my civil question. What has become of my letter?"

"I gave it to Mr. Freshman."

"Thank you, doctor. Good-bye, doctor." And I left.

Ye theologians! Why waste your tangled talents when tangible facts are in abundance?

The next step was to the reverend doctors, editors of the Christian weeklies. But as my experience with them was rather lengthy, I will leave it to be continued in my next. A. BENJAMIN.

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

THE BIBLE AND SPIRITUALISM.

The fable of the rich man and Lazarus presents the doctrin of a future state—which, by the way, is of heathen and not of Hebrew origin—in an aspect than which nothing can be more absurd or illogical. If it be a crime to be rich, then are most of us criminals at heart, whatever our actual condition. If to wear purple and fine linen and fare sumptuously every day be sinful, then a dry man who wears broadcloth and a boiled shirt, and whose meals are plentiful and well-cooked, as with the average American dinner—every such man is in danger of hell fire. On the other hand, if it be meritorious to follow the profession of a beggar—if in addition to this the postulant be covered with sores and swarming with vermin and so insures an additional claim to a heritage of bliss—it would be a grand mistake to consign such a one to the hospital or the poorhouse, as it would be our first impulse to do. Better employ him as a mediator with the powers that are supposed to be and whose special favorit he is. If he once leaves the world he will never be allowed to come back. "Father Abraham" has said: "If they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe though one came to them from the dead."

Believe what? There is the rub. For many centuries both Jew and gentile hav believed in Moses and the prophets, and Moses inaugurated that belief in the first place by a series of cunning juggling tricks performed before Pharaoh and his court for the mystification of the Egyptian jugglers, who were great adepts at the same sort of thing. We hav but an ex parte statement, supposed to hav been written by Moses himself, and of course he made his own case good. Aaron turns his rod into a snake, and then the magicians of Pharaoh turned their rods into snakes. And then Aaron's rod, in his character of a snake, swallowed up the rods of the magicians, and still Pharaoh refused to believe that there was any special superiority in Aaron's snake, or, in short, to swallow either one of them. It is needless to go through the whole list of electro-biological experiments by which Moses succeeded in convincing the Israelites that he was sent to be their deliverer, but by which he failed to convince Pharaoh. Yet on the juggling tricks of a charlatan and impostor is founded the whole system of Hebraic theology, and the monarchical and supposed theocratic government accepted by the Jews down to the present day. At the time of the Christian schism it was found necessary to produce some new miracles—they had long been suppressed—in order to revive the drooping faith of those who looked in vain for a fulfilment of ancient prophecies and a realization of the grand promises made to Abraham, "the father of the faithful." The miracles imputed to Jesus Christ were certainly of a better class than those wrought by Moses. Jesus did not cause the earth to open and swallow up those who opposed him. He was singularly mild and forbearing under the greatest provocation. Yet it must be acknowledged that his miracles were one and all failures if judged by results. He did not rise again from the dead, or where is he? He did not endow with eternal life those who believed in him, or where are they? Common sense refuses the explanation that they are translated to and living in another sphere. Jesus promised a corporeal resurrection, and lo! nearly twenty centuries hav elapsed and the bones of the saints still remain as the amulets of the faithful. It is extremely difficult to shake off an illusion, however absurd, or to get rid of a superstition, however unreasonable. A thousand generations hav passed away and twenty centuries hav elapsed, and still Christendom is looking forward to a general resurrection that has not taken place according to prophecy and certainly never will. And lest superstition should after all die a natural death or be exploded by science, a new feature of importance has arisen—or rather, an old one has been revived, to wit, Spiritualism. It was invented by the heathen poets centuries before Jesus founded thereon his hypothetical heaven and hell. Medieval laws proscribed what medieval priestcraft claimed as its own peculiar province—the exercise of thaumaturgical powers by the laity. And that is the reason "Spiritualism," according to the modern acceptation of the term, has been so long in abeyance. Now pretenders to the art may in this country be reckoned by thousands. And, if we may credit apparently bona-fide reports, they produce miraculous effects and appearances equal to anything described either in the Old or in the New Testament. All this is calculated to put bona-fide "truth seekers" off their guard.

Once admit the possibility of the supernatural, and the existence among us of unseen beings and intelligences who make themselvs visible through the mediums of a select circle, closed doors, and lowered lights, and where are we to stop? We know from daily observation and experience that the highest order of human intelligence is invariably developed from a well-organized brain, and that brain is a material one. So close is the relationship between mind and matter that the disease of one invariably affects the other. When the brain ceases to act, the intelligence ceases to exist, nor can it be brought back again to the defunct body. That the spirits of our deceased friends, endued with supernatural intelligence, are still hovering around us—that they still take an interest in mundane affairs, and are able to advise in circumstances which to disembodied spirits hav neither interest nor meaning—that they occasionally not only make themselvs visible to sight (at a safe distance from the spectator) but obtrude a hand which is tangible as well as visible, proves that professional mediums are able to obtain a wonderful influence over the imaginations of their dupes and converts, but really proves nothing besides. All the phenomena of modern Spiritualism, including table-rapping, were described by Iamblichus in his treatis, "De Mysteriis," etc., more than two thousand years ago. No advance in the art has been made since that time, but, if anything, it has actually gone back. It no longer occupies the attention of philosophers and men of sense. The only ones who practice or avail themselvs of it in the present day are designing knaves on the one hand and fools on the other. I grant that there are honest Spiritualists as there are honest Christians, who see what they believe and believe what they see. But if we take stock of the utility either of Spiritualism or of Christianity, we must seek for results in the lunatic asylums, and not among the ranks of those who are most useful and valuable to their fellow-men. OUTIS.

What Is Religion?

Religion is a compound consisting of forms, ceremonies, rites, dogmas, and beliefs that are inconsistent with reason or sense, and derogatory to infinit power and wisdom. Religion is a human invention, made to govern, to obtain riches, honor, and power; and, as these acquisitions are obtained from the fount of ignorance, it has ever been the study, aim, and object of the priesthood to keep the people in this low, degraded, and servil state. Hence the interdiction of thought, the sentencing of philosophy as vain and of reason as carnal and groveling. Morality is not religion; there is nothing in common between them. The doctrin of total depravity destroys all the moral principles and paralyzes every pure and good faculty of the soul. Truth, justice, honesty, love, virtue—all the moral attributes of our being—do by this means become evil devices and decoys to lead down to perdition. Religion repudiates the power and wisdom of the creator; it represents the deity as deficient in power and ability—nature is wrong, all wrong; man, the consummation of his skill, has proved a failure, and has to be made over again. Sum up the causes of all the evils that permeate society, of all the wars that hav desolated the world and heaped untold miseries on the human race, sacrificing the philosophers and the learned, slaughtering unnumbered millions, drenching the earth and dyeing the seas with blood, and you hav religion.—Rollin Bradley.

Official Call for Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Local Secular Unions, Life, Charter, and Annual Members, and all Liberal citizens who support the Nine Demands of Secularism, Greeting:

You are hereby invited to attend the Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, which will convene at Lafayette Hall, Wood street, near 4th, Pittsburgh, Pa., Friday, October 5, 1888, at 10 A.M., for a four days' session—5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th inclusiv.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State or Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Unions are entitled to seats and votes in this Annual Congress. Each Local Secular Union is entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates. Annual Members who pay or hav paid $1 in the national treasury are entitled to seats, but not to votes, except by unanimous consent of the Congress.

This Congress will specially consider practical questions tending to further agitation for taxation of church property; the abrogation of state aid to sectarian institutions; abolition of state, national, military, and prison chaplaincies; repeal of judicial oaths, Sunday and other oppressiv and unjust ecclesiastical laws; nullification of attempts to subvert our Constitution by a legal recognition of Theism in the American Magna Charta, and such other measures as will not merely thwart intended theological encroachments, but will absolutely expunge from our laws, state and federal, such insidious acts as hav already crept in to blot out mental freedom from our republic.

It is to be hoped that the addresses delivered will deal with the practical issues of the organization, so that there will be such an awakening of the people to these vital questions of the hour that a revival of the instinct of liberty and justice for all will necessarily result; that again from the Keystone state—the birthplace of our association—the clarion voice of freedom shall vibrate throughout the land.

Pittsburgh being situated almost in the center of a district containing many of our most distinguished workers, thinkers, and writers, besides the activ host within its limits, there is little doubt but that this Congress will be a glorious gathering of the forces who stand for mental liberty, as expressed in the desire for complete Secularization of the government.

The American Secular Union.

This constitutes the first of a series of three tables, representing, as far as I am aware, the only list of church property ever arranged in Chicago. It is reliable, and, if anything, underestimates this property, some of which is not now used for "divine" service but for producing dividends in the shape of rents for schemers who, under the guise of saving our souls, "skin" our pockets by this process of plundering and false-swearing. The state neglects, or refuses, to hav the church property valued, so that the American Secular Union has been to no little expense to produce a fair valuation which shall approximate about one-third of the real valuation. The gentleman who made these estimates for us has been deputy state auditor and assessor in Indiana, and we were most fortunate in finding so efficient a person to prepare the tables. Several official friends hav been of great assistance, and by their counsel we are enabled to present statistics that cannot be controverted. To better bring the matter clearly before your readers, let me say that this $2,248,000 on the North Side should be multiplied by three and we would find $6,754,000 as the result. An annual tax of 10 mills must amount to $60,754.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

BROWNSVILLE, ORE., July 30th, 31st, Aug. 1st.—Very few Liberals are in this place. Friends Rockwell, French, and McCormick constitute the trinity of Freethought. The Liberals, although few in number, being outspoken and generous-hearted, are a power for good. The three lectures were well attended and aroused considerable interest; many were for the first time induced to read and think for themselvs; some of the most bigoted discovered there was such a thing as "the other side." They hav greater respect now for the "ignorant Infidels" since learning that all the facts of history and science are on our side.

Here I met John Diamond, of Coburg, who came to attend the lectures and to escort me to Coburg—a veteran aged seventy-three, a '49 pioneer, a diamond of the purest, brightest kind. In this long tour—it is over a year now since I left home—I hav met many noble old Liberals, sturdy, consistent, fearless friends of human progress, who, in the long past as in the present, hav ever fearlessly proclaimed their convictions, bearing the burden and heat of the battle when it cost something more than the loss of recognition by Mrs. Grundy.

To me it is always a source of encouragement, pride, and joy to hear the dear old veterans testify of the peace and comfort Liberalism affords them, making happy their lives and enabling them to look forward to death with "reverential calm," with no more of fear or dread than they hav of their next night's restful sleep. Of all the many such I hav met, none excel John Diamond in living out the principles of Liberalism. Possessing a heart of tenderest love and gentle sympathy, to promote others' happiness is a thing of very joy. If he knows or sees any creature in need—and he has a quick eye to see—with unobtrusiv kindness he affords the needed aid, and the kind service is rendered, the benefit conferred, as though he alone were the favored one. Of course he is an enthusiastic admirer and worker for THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and Ironclad Age.

COBURG, ORE., Aug. 3d, 4th, 5th.—This is the home of John Diamond. He has owned very large ranches here, but as age crept on he has sold out so as to be free of care and hav more time to enjoy the delight of making others happy. The town hall where the three lectures were delivered is quite a little distance from the village. Coburg is a very small place. I was surprised at the good attendance and the eager demand for Liberal literature. The hall is a handsome, commodious building erected especially for the general public, and, strange to say, the conditions are kept, and the hall is free to all.

HARRISBURGH, ORE., Aug. 7th, 8th, 9th.—Goldsmith's deserted village, the most sad case of "has been" I ever visited. It once had a large trade. It is very favorably situated, has good navigable-river frontage, and it is a rich country all around it. A few years ago the people wanted a railroad, subscribed liberally and got it, and at once the business of the place fell away. It ceased to be a great supply center. To-day there are three times as many vacant stores and warehouses as there are occupied ones.

Oregon has a very sleepy climate, and Harrisburgh is entitled to the medal as the drowsiest place on earth. The butcher leaves a bell on his meat-block and goes over to chat and snooze in a chair on the sunny side of the street with the drug-store man. If a customer comes, the bell can be rung to arouse him. The barber, finding lack of customers, goes fishing for exercise.

The Wright brothers are right good Liberals, but in the wrong place, for they are young men of energy and enterprise. Strange how they can persevere amidst so much of moldering decay.

The banker and his accomplished wife and the postmaster are genuin Liberals. Of course there was but small attendance at the lectures, yet those who did attend evinced great interest. Not one of the audience slept or even nodded, so there is yet hope, if sufficient Liberal element could be imported, that the place might yet be redeemed. Brother John Long was to hav attended to matters pertaining to the lectures, and things fell short because of Long's shortcoming.

CORVALLIS, ORE., Aug. 11th, 12th.—Here I was greeted by that reliable, whole-souled working Liberal, B. F. Hyland. This is quite a good-sized town, quite a business center. The sleepy climate of Oregon seems to lull people into inactivity, for nature with lavish hand supplies every want—grain, fruit, fish, coal, lumber, in luxurious abundance, and a genial climate. Winter's icy pinch is all unknown, so that there is little need for the laborious activity of less favored sections to supply all the necessaries of life. Brother Hyland is a born hustler, and even Oregon, while it may subdue, can never take from him his spirit of energetic push. He and his handsome son are the workers, the standard-bearers, in Corvallis. The lectures were delivered at the city hall; and as Ben Hyland has the happy faculty of imparting his own enthusiasm to others, thanks to his self-sacrificing efforts the lectures were a success. Several on Monday morning acknowledged to me the benefit received. There are few more generous, able, and efficient workers for Liberalism than B. F. Hyland and son. I go for the next fifteen days to Coos county.

I am reluctantly compelled to cancel many engagements (see appointments below). I hav now been absent from my loved ones over a year. At best, I cannot reach home until last of April. I throw myself on the mercy of the disappointed ones, and hope to compensate them by returning with Mrs. Reynolds in the fall of 1889.

My appointments are: Wash. Terr.: Pasco, September 2d, 3d; N. Yakima, 4th, 5th, 6th; Ellensburg, 7th, 8th, 9th; Walla Walla, 10th, 11th, 12th. Utah: Logan, September 15th; Ogden, 16th; Deweyville, 17th, 18th; Plain City, 19th; Hooper, 20th; Kaysville. 21st; Salt Lake City, 23d; Uintah, 24th; Morgan, 25th, 26th; Echo, 27th; Coalville, 28th, 29th; Salt Lake City, 30; Wanship, October 1st; Peoa, 2d, 3d; Kamas, 4th, 5th; Park City, 6th; Salt Lake City, 7th; Grantsville, 8th; Stockton, 9th, 10th; Murray, 11th, 12th; Sugar House, 13th; Salt Lake City, 14th; Lehi, 15th; Provo, 16th, 17th; Springville, 18th, 19th; Payson, 20th, 21st; Goshen, 22d; Salt Lake City, 23d. C. B. REYNOLDS.

A Minister's Complaint.

[The following is from an activ preacher in one of the Western states. His name and denomination we are requested to withhold.—ED. T. S.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I do not suppose you often get letters from ministers; however, I shall write a few lines either for the paper or for the waste-basket. I am not orthodox enough to swallow down "By the decree of God," "For the manifestation of his glory," etc., or, in other words, that a God of love creates beings on purpose to torment them through the ceaseless ages of eternity. Because I do not swallow down that trash some of my more orthodox friends, especially ministers, frequently call me pet names and say I am an Infidel. One good preacher tackled me one day and I finally said to him, "If you honestly believe in this doctrin of a never-dying soul and eternal torment, why don't you be honest and preach it?" "Oh, my brother," said he, "the Bible says the time will come that they will not endure sound doctrin—the people will not endure it." I told him I would preach what I believed, let them hear or refrain. When I think of the way people hav been imposed upon, swallowing down whatever comes from the pulpit, asking no questions, I am reminded of how we boys used to serve the birds when we found their nests of young; they would think it the mother bird and would at once throw back their necks, open their mouths from ear to ear, and, whatever was put in, gulp it down and open for more. One boy whose elder brother was a soldier secured some soldier buttons and the birdies gulped them down and soon the poor birdies were no more.

When C. B. Reynolds came to Colorado, some of my friends of Liberal ideas wanted me to go and hear him. I accordingly took up my meetings two nights and listened candidly. Of course I did not indorse all he had to say, and consequently I decided to deliver a lecture on the inspiration of the Bible. I went to Mr. Reynolds and told him my intentions—that I did not wish any controversy, but that as I had invited my friends to hear, I felt it my duty to defend the Bible. He said he would if he was in my place and in his lecture that night urged all to come and hear me. I called on the Methodist Episcopal and Baptist ministers, who, by the way, had started a protracted meeting, in order to draw attendance off, the night before Mr. Reynolds was billed to commence his lectures. I told them my purpose to defend the Bible and invited them to take up their meeting to let all come and hear, when lo: No, sir; they believed in treating such things with silent contempt, and it was very injurious to a protracted meeting to break in, even for one night, etc. "Very well," I said, "I shall lecture at the court house to morrow night." And I did so, to a full house. How many they had at the protracted meeting I never learned, but the night before a friend was there and told me there were himself and another man and three or four women and the two preachers trying hard to keep it warm.

When I see the course most are pursuing, I don't wonder Infidelity is growing fast. I told the people in my lecture that such things made Infidels. I am a firm believer in temperance, but when I see the Prohibition party fast going over to the sworn enemy of liberty, the National Reform party, I am led to say, "Where are we drifting?" I believe in religion—a religion that makes men better citizens—but do not believe in forcing it upon any. I want my children to read the Bible, but I do not want my neighbor's children compelled to hear it against his wishes. The place to advance religion is the home and the church, and when any party undertakes to legislate on religion they are simply going backward, not forward. There is much in your principles that I cannot indorse, but here is my hand in opposing the party working for the union of church and state.

Key to Escape from Spiritualism.

We are told that prayer in faith will procure positivly anything, yet the very body of men who would be expected to hav faith if any could, the clergy, were never known in one solitary instance thus to procure a salary, but in every case hav recourse for that to a carnal world. In miracles the same mysterious exception is made; among all the miracles recorded as performed by God there is just one kind that cannot be found, and that is the creation of a pot of gold for one of his preachers, but for this they are always seen chasing about after the worldly man outside like a dog after a hare. . . . It is the most absurd and laughable thing on earth.—Truth Seeker Editorial, September 8th.

We are told that spirits can pass through all substances and bodies, thus being enabled to enter brokers' and financiers' offices and hear all that is said, yet the very body of men who would be expected to profit by this if any could, the mediums, were never known in one solitary instance thus to obtain information enabling them to invest in the right quarters, and thereby to make money, but in every case hav recourse for that to a carnal world. In discovery of unowned hidden wealth the same mysterious exception is made; among all the feats recorded as performed by spirits there is just one kind that cannot be found, and that is the indication of a pot of gold or a lode of ore for one of their mediums, but for this the mediums are always seen chasing about after the worldly man outside like a dog after a hare. . . . It is the most absurd and laughable thing on earth. BICKERSTAFF.

The Andersonville "Providential Spring."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: You will please find inclosed some clippings from the National Tribune, Washington, D. C. I wish you would print them in THE TRUTH SEEKER. For years I hav read of this "miraculous spring," but this, like the "holy well" of Brooklyn, proves to be a busted miracle.

It is wonderful the amount of bosh that has been written about this Providential Spring. If God wished to perform a miracle, why did he not miraculously break down the stockade? Why did he not giv them their liberty? If that was a "providential spring," then God was on the side of the Southern Confederacy, because, while he was in the miracle business, why did he not giv liberty as well as water, or, for the matter of that, both? The believers in miracles can take their choice between two things: If God wanted these prisoners to hav water, and performed a miracle in order that they might hav it, then it is just as logical to say he did not want them to hav their liberty, because an "almighty power" can perform a big miracle just as easily as a small one. The fact of the matter is, none of these so-called miracles will "hold water"—they cannot stand the scrutinizing test of reason.

There is a sky-pilot near here who has been "cured by prayer of a cancer and a rupture." If God would perform one more miracle and cure him of lying, he would hav my thanks.

What wonderful liars they are
These miracle-performers by prayer!
If they continue their lies
When they get in the skies,
Munchausen will wish he warn't there.

THE CLIPPINGS.

EDGAR SPRINGS, MO.

EDITOR NATIONAL TRIBUNE: In your issue of July 12th I find a communication from Comrade Lowden concerning the Providential Spring at Andersonville. I also notice others on the same subject, all agreeing in substance with Comrade Lowden's statement. I was in Andersonville from early in the spring of 1864 till September, when I was sent to Charleston, S. C. My recollection of dates is very dim, and I am uncertain about the time I left, but I was among the first to go, only two or three parties leaving before mine. My first knowledge of this spring was gained from the papers of a religious weekly just after the close of the war. It was pronounced a modern miracle, a special interposition of divine providence, etc. Of course I did not believe it. I hav since become convinced, however, of the actual existence of such a spring, and am now able to throw a little light on the source of it.

For some time before I left I remember there was a small seep between the dead-line and the stockade of pure spring water. Some enterprising Yankee fixed a spout so as to convey this water within the limits of safety, and a person possessing sufficient patience could secure a tin cup full of pure water occasionally, but I never had enough of that virtue to get a taste, and always slaked my thirst at the branch. The spring always presented a similar appearance to the surgeon's tent at sick call, when we were having three hours' drill per day. I presume this was about the place where the Providential Spring broke out. Three years ago, while traveling through the state of Arkansas, I stopped for the night with an ex-rebel. After getting myself outside of a liberal amount of rusty bacon, soda biscuits, and black coffee, we lit our pipes, and took a seat on the porch to allow the provender to digest, and to gather strength for the coming combat with the insect kingdom.

The conversation turned on the late unpleasantness, and we exchanged yarns. My host told me that he assisted in building the stockade at Andersonville. He said that on the north side of the swamp was a very fine spring that afforded a right smart quantity of good water, and that the stockade was built right through it, and that it troubled them considerably to get the logs solidly set there, but it was done, and the spring completely choked up, so that no sign of it could be seen. He wondered at the time why the spring was not inclosed, but calculated the officers knew what they were doing, and they probably did. I hav no doubt but this was the Providential Spring, which, after being choked up, made for itself an underground outlet to the creek, through which the water escaped, till it became flushed by the heavy rain spoken of, when it broke out in a new place.

JOSEPH HALL, Co. A, 22d Mich.

SAN JOSE, CAL.

EDITOR NATIONAL TRIBUNE: During a hard thunder-storm the spring broke out from an old well that the prisoners had dug for water on the north side of, and perhaps thirty yards from, the slough and about the same distance from the west stockade. So heavy was the rainfall during this storm that a portion of the stockade on the upper side was washed away. We all shouted at the sight as the Israelites did when encompassing Jericho. God caused to burst forth a living spring of pure water to moisten the parched tongues of the dying and to refresh the yet living of the starving hosts of the hated Yankee prisoners. No! If my memory is correct, he would far rather hav constructed troughs to run the water from than to us. This is my remembrance.

BENJ. WILLIAMS, Co. B, 5th Iowa Cav.

DAYTON, O.

EDITOR NATIONAL TRIBUNE: I was in Andersonville, Ga., in the 92d Detachment, 3d Mess, and remember about the spring breaking out after a very heavy rain, Aug. 9, 1864; but it is only within a few years that I hav learned that there was any special dispensation of providence in this, and it was generally understood that the Southern Confederacy was so far removed from all humanity and God, that there was no chance for any miracles; besides, the conveniences for getting water were so inadequate to the vast number of prisoners, that if there was any providential meaning it was only for a few. Let us stop this bosh.

Lectures and Meetings.

MR. F. M. HOLLAND has changed his address from N. Truro to Concord, Mass. He will probably not write another tariff article.

JNO. GEO. HERTWIG, of Washington, D. C., desires to lecture during the coming winter, and solicits engagements for this purpose. In religious matters he is an absolute Freethinker, and as to public questions generally, he is a thorough Radical. He was born in Germany, where he received a collegiate and university education, and has lived in the United States thirty years. He will lecture in English. His address is, P. O. Box 706, Washington, D. C.

THE Chicago Secular Union's program for the rest of September is as follows: Sunday, the 16th, at 7:45 P.M., Horace C. Bennett, on "Practical Politics;" Sunday, the 23d, S. P. Putnam, at 2:30 P.M., on "Fair Play;" at 7:45 P.M., on "Priest, King, and People." Sunday, the 30th, F. M. Williams, on "Prohibition." The Union meets at the Forum, corner of Washington Boulevard and Sangamon street. Free discussion follows the lectures, and good vocal and instrumental music is enjoyed. The seats are free and everybody is invited.

FROM the Ellsworth, Me., American: "Capt. Robert Adams, who with his wife and son are spending their second summer in Bluehill, delivered a very interesting lecture on 'Freethought,' in the town hall, Monday evening. The captain is a fluent speaker, trusting almost entirely to his memory, which never once failed him. He showed himself thoroughly conversant with the writings of all the great Freethinkers, quoting largely from Voltaire, Diderot, Ernest Renan, Huxley, Darwin, and others. He not only has read, but traveled, and so could describe as an eye-witness the evolutions and changes of religion in India, China, and Japan."

An Opportunity for "Christian Scientists."

Letter to the New York Sun.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—Sir: I notice in a recent Sunday edition of the Sun a full-page article on Christian science healing. Now is the time for a test.

The Christian scientists claim to heal without attendance or the presence of the patient. Jacksonville is panic-stricken and the fever is in full blast. If our Christian scientists believe in Christian science, they should help the sufferers, and if they are not willing to go to the scene and "face the music," they might treat the Jacksonville sufferers as absent patients.

If their science is Christian and can do what it claims, it belies its name in refraining from rendering aid in this great need. Yours respectfully, E. W. BRYANT.

"History Repeats Itself."—Evolution.

Sarcasm, wit, satire, and others of that family are the light infantry of wisdom, deployed as skirmishers in front of the massed corps of science and statistics which form the great armies of progress, and are at all times in the van. What is the needle-gun or the chassepot of the modern arsenal, what even the Gatling pet of the police department, compared with the projectils of the intellect? There is more real progressiv force in a battery of well-directed raillery, in dissipating an intrenched evil, than there is in a well-fought campaign. What leaders of armies, ancient or modern, can equal Voltaire, or yet rank with Paine? Without such souls as rousing agencies, the Bastile never would hav lost its prestige; the Revolution of '76 might still be waiting for the Declaration of Independence. Having such names, there is nothing left to be done but a short tumult of barbaric work—leveling walls and butchering a few defenders of the wrong.

Wars conducted by forces of the intellect would hav besides the advantages of leaving no rankling scars of body, no mutilations of limb, no pensions, no revenue collections to drain the public purse, and, more important than all these, there would be no foolish hero-pride evoked, no diablerie of national traditions appealed to, and all other absurdities that go to make up what goes for "military glory," while the barbed mental arrow, sinking deep below the cuticle, would make wounds apparent to the least observant, and from which would trickle the issues of life.

Religious wars hav but added to the rancors of society, and given greater vitality to both sides. Prejudices were deepened, faith strengthened by trials, while reason, beclouded by a cultivated sense of duty, became uncertain.

Religion, in these days, though on one side greatly clipped of its numbers, can still array a following devotional and ambitious as erewhile ranged beneath the cross in the palmiest days of popery. Without an actual arraying of "front against front," however, which is most unlikely to take place at this stage of progress, there would be little chance for additions to be made to the martyrology of Christendom, or yet occasion for the exhibition of such degrees of virtue in individuals as to swell the list of the saints. No Inquisition would be sought to rival the régime of Torquemada. The descendants of the Puritans would find their ears intact at the end of each week, showing in their pews conspicuously as ever. A Peter the Hermit might spring up like a Jack-in-the-box, but, as an apostle, he would find himself a failure, and be dubbed a crank. The Crusades can never be repeated.

It is a mistake to say, "History repeats itself." The phrase, as a sounding euphuism, rings well in the ears, but in itself it is the merest negation, and to attempt to establish it as an aphorism by turning pages, would be found to be about as thankless and unsatisfactory a task as explanations of St. John's beast with the seven heads and the seven horns.

It might be admissible to say that governments show more or less of the kaleidoscope in their action—oscillating between the extremes of despotism and the most yielding paternalism; sometimes, indeed, in the exercise of their functions leaning to the protectorate rather than to the absolute, but at all times exhibiting the bossism of authority, so falling short of the object of their "institution among men." There must be no investiture of the individual with an authority that places him beyond the reach of the referendum. He must be denied all right of appointment of officials, and be satisfied in the matter of compensation for services with the rate of wages paid to other workers, or he can "turn his attention to coals."

Cæsarism comes of unrestricted functions in the administration of national affairs. Cæsar must be made to feel the bit of authority as well as the ruled are made to feel it; indeed, giving him to understand that his office is a something that will in time entirely be dispensed with, for to that complexion things must come at last; the race, through evolution, at all times gravitating toward self-government—Anarchy—an Anarchy of wisdom, however.

I copy a line or two from Guizot's History of France: "So soon as the Franks were gone, the king of the Lombards continued occupying the places in the exarchate, and molesting the neighborhood of Rome. The pope, in despair, and doubtful of his auxiliaries' return, conceived the idea of sending to the king, the chiefs, and the people of the Franks a letter written, he said, by Peter, apostle of Jesus Christ, son of the living God, to announce to them that if they came in haste he would aid them as if they were alive according to the flesh amongst them; that they would conquer all their enemies, and make themselvs sure of eternal life. The plan was perfectly successful. The Franks once more crossed the Alps with enthusiasm, once more succeeded in beating the Lombards, and once more shut up in Pavia King Astolphus, who was eager to purchase peace at any price." That knocks the spots quite out of all modern boodleism, methinks.

It was a bit of papal boodleism altogether ahead of anything of the sort in our day; indeed, so very much so that the historian dubs it "perfectly successful." Pope Stephen worked that card, and no doubt wears a triple crown of glory now, in honor of his enemies, while he hobnobs with the prince of peace. I can imagin the old fisherman, however, casting an occasional squint of contempt at Stephen for so using his name, and without his consent, seeking to change the character of his earth-vocation to that of blustering warfare. And yet Peter was not without the qualities needed in the make-up of the warrior, as witness his swordmanship in the court-room, when he "smote the high priest's servant and cut off his right ear"—a piece of contempt of court to which "his honor" paid no attention, as far as heard from, but which would in our day hav drawn a round sum as a fine from Uncle Pete, or a ride in the Black Maria with six months in quad.

Queer times were those of Stephen, in respect to both state and altar; and immensely indebted to evolution we ought all to feel for turning up as trumps the hearts of our times, over the clubs of 754.

Evolution is a big thing. Commencing with our world at its first gush of flaming existence, it has done its level best in the way of development; cooling here and hardening there; converting steam into seas and molten masses into continents, calling wonders into light in ocean and on land; tumbling mountains over forests for future coal; calling monads into crawling and skimming life in air and water; and using the sun as a "pardner" in the business, resting neither night or day in its tireless industry, until from monsters it came to monkeys; from monkeys on to man. Then what?

Imagin, if you can, a modern Charlemagne ordering the cutting off in one day of forty-five hundred human heads, because the owners of the heads couldn't go Christianity any longer—in modern phrase, for refusing to "come to Jesus." We hav only to swell the hundreds of the Salvation Army into as many thousands to hav as large a force as the son of Pepin had when he ordered the butchery spoken of. And if, in addition, the members of the Young Men's Christian Association were united as allies, the modern host would far outstrip the followers of the Christian king. Then, placing the whole under a first-class crank as leader, to cry "Havoc!" how many do you think could be got to take a hand in, particularly if the boys were as sure of their hard-tack on the one side as the other? History couldn't be so repeated, I guess.

Then, what bishop of our own day would be willing to rival a bishop of France as a liar, by asserting that one of the saints of holy mother church was "transported to the realms of eternity, and there, amongst other things which the Lord did show unto him, he saw Prince Charles delivered over to the torments of the damned?" And for what was the prince so treated? Because he had, when alive, conferred ecclesiastical honors on some of his army officers. And this liar is now a saint in the holy Romish calendar.

We find pages taken from the history of the bygone about equal to the "full, true, and particular account of the last moments of the murderer just hanged," sold in sheets by the street pedlar. History is at best a series of distorted accounts of events, twisted by the author to suit the prejudices of his party. There is one feature, however, which is at all times the same: the priest playing into the hands of the king, and vice versa. Like the pals of the gambling profession, their study is to fleece all others. And in this respect only can it be said, "History repeats itself."

Is the colossal stronghold of the Vatican bound to revert to its standard of a century ago? No, it is not possible. History is already closing on it. It may be that the last chapter, like the Alexandrine line, may "drag its slow length along." But as for having it said of it,

> The snake is scotched, not killed;
> 'Twill close and be itself again,

let not its friends "lay the flattering unction to their souls." The Irish question will dismember it, Secularism failing. It is monstrous in its proportions, it is true. But even > Giants die, despite their Fee, fo, fum.

The mother of abominations is doomed, and it is high time. Through the long period since she became mistress, she has dominated all interests to subserve her enslaving purposes, carrying the hauteur of a despot, with the affected humility of a beggar. Holding aloft a bleeding savior, calling him the prince of peace, she has drenched the centuries with blood. Holding aloft the banner of the cross, she has sent forth her slaves, with gyves and with manacles, to drag men to dungeons and to death. Taking the horrible God of the Jews as her exemplar, she has slaughtered in wrath to prove her God "the very God"—the simon-pure Jehovah of the pantheons. As, in the fable of Eden, the garden of the holy one was protected from invasion by flaming swords in angel hands, she has used the sword of the warrior to smite and subdue opposers. Fraud and force hav been the instruments of her propaganda.

And now, holy mother church disposed of, I expose myself as Cheap Jack, offering, without money and without price, from the back-board of my cart, the last and the best of patent articles yet offered to an afflicted public—an article destined to take the rag off all bushes as a panacea for doubt—an article not "recommended by an aged clergyman, himself for many years a sufferer;" but an article extolled by the most astute and brilliant souls of our century—evolution.

Take it to your bosoms, my friends. Place it in the bosoms of your families. Put it in the bosoms of your neighbors. Let it be unto you as were the lares and penates of the ancients. Hail it as the Deliverer, the Redeemer, the Rescuer. Last on the Index Expurgatorius of the Vatican it stands anathematized—an advertisment in itself par excellence; the subject of proscription in encyclical letter; of ban in pastoral remonstrance; of papal bull, it is bully. Here you are now. Who will refuse acceptance of so great a gift? I cry aloud to you from among the sellers and the buyers of adulterated goods, offering you the last, the purest gift of time. I lift up my voice, yea, shout unto you as unto men who, having ears, are prepared to hear:

Ho, ye grace-deserted loons of faith-adoring fathers! Moderns who hav lost all trust in Gods, popes, and creeds, why stand you here without faith and without hope in the world? Behold Evolution, seeking to fill the God-space within you, offering the tranquillity erewhile promised, but not received, from ghostly marvels, miracles and heavenly prodigies—shadows gone by the board never to return. Cast aside their vestiges, my friends—all sophistries of prophets, popes, and priests; all trivialities of scriptures; all ordinances, symbols, sacraments, pulpit vestments, altar tomfooleries, fetiches of every hue and dye; and, clutching at evolution, walk henceforth in unshackled manhood, larding lean life with truth.

I do not seek, my friends, to deal in personalities—dragging unfortunates from the crowd as terrible examples of sufferings borne. I must, however, for the nonce, appear to so offend. There, as I point, I see a face dark of brow and with malignant eye—a chap who might hav worn the frock of monk in days gone by, but now only a Presbyterian. Come, my much abused friend—abused by heredity and afterward by cruel teachers corrupting all sources of kindly sentiments by scourging, wrathful treatment. He speaks. Listen to him: "Is thy hearer a dog, that he should be satisfied with evolution, a nostrum from the pit? Bah!" 74.

Le Roy, N. Y., July, 1888.

Some Thoughts on Evolution.

A boy bought a fiddle having but one string, being told it was a new invention and a new idea, that it was adjustable and would pull out, with no limit to the number of tunes it would play. When its defects were shown to him, his reply was: "It is a new thing in the way of a fiddle, and I can play more tunes on that one than you can on your old ones that hav half a dozen."

In his simplicity that boy thought he actually had something new, and every time he drew his bow across that one string believed that he was playing a new tune never played before.

An original, an entirely new thought, one that can be demonstrated, and never was before, is as rare as to find a gem growing inside a potato.

In noting the number of tunes with the variations that some of our friends play with the words, evolu tion, survival of the fittest, etc., I am reminded of the boy and his fiddle with, as he thought, its wonderful capacity for music.

They appear to think that with those words, as they interpret and use them, can be solved all the mysteries of the past—all that pertains to the earth, vegetable, animal, man, space, and the universe, the magic of the words, or phrase, is so easy to be understood, let them tell it; unfortunately, all are not equally gifted, particularly those Agnostics who hav not evolved far enough, or fast enough, to suit those progressiv fellows like Milleson, who know what they know, and no mistake.

A Dutchman and an Irishman had an altercation; the wife of the former fearing it might end in something more than words, said, "Come away, you fool, before he hits you mit a stone, and knocks you sensible."

Some of us will consider it a favor if you will just condescend, be a little more explicit, tell how you know, then, if we fail to sense it rightly, try to persuade us mit a stone.

Evolution: The act of unfolding; a series of things unrolled, or unfolded.—Webster.

Simple enough, not difficult to be understood in its true sense and application, and in that way is most generally accepted. But whatever part of the theory has no other base than guess, and falsely maintains that science has demonstrated, has no more value than the guess of an unlearned plowman.

A summary of the popular idea would read about like this: Away back somewhere, or nowhere, the earth's surface was covered by water. Where the water or the earth evolved from is not in the lesson, presumably overlooked as unimportant. Then, when time began a something from the bottom, middle, or surface of the mighty waters, called protoplasm, which, being interpreted, means the first, or the beginning, appeared, having but little substance and no regular outline or form; without nerves or sensibility; neither organs nor sex; the affirmation is that from that protoplasm has evolved, or unfolded, all that has life with an outline of form in the vegetable and animal world.

Nor does it limit the assumption to this world, but takes in and embraces the universe, with its countless systems and suns, and space that holds them, and maintains that all evolved out from universal chaos or nothing.

To learn how nature is making vast luminaries throughout the otherwise hideous darkness and space—until we all are familiar with the endless growth and decay of worlds, suns, etc., surely as pollen grains develop into seeds, crystals unite into ærolites, which collectivly form asteroids, capable of developing into satellites, and then into planets, etc.—Milleson in The Truth Seeker, July 7, 1888.

Any botanist will say that from the seeds the stalk is produced, from that the flower, and, there being sex in flowers, the pollen is the germinating principle, and by its operation, impregnation, the species is continued, and is not or ever was in any other way.

There is in flowers not only sex, but almost all and everything, except the "brain"—Miss Helen Gardener is right about that. From the smallest animalcule to the gigantic mastodon, all physiologists and anatomists are in accord with me as to the truth of what I affirm, that all life that is or has been is propagated and continued by that same universal rule and law of sex, and but for such intermingling there would be no life.

And now, what is life? Will our friends who think they know what they know tell, and when it began? Is it any wonder that the magnitude of the question overwhelmed Mr. Darwin and impelled him to exclaim that "it may hav been breathed by the creator into a few forms or into one," and that "it is a question for the distant future, if ever solved by man."

It is a bold assumption to say that all the organs, with their functions—that is, the necessity or want of them—lungs to breathe, heart to pulsate, blood to course through arteries and veins, organs to propagate and sex, simply and slowly unfolded, appearing from time to time as the necessities of the case demanded. Did the brain, the mind, the socket, and the eye unfold at one or different periods of time? If at intervals, which first?

It is only by the operation of the mind through the brain, with the function of the eye, that we recognize objects.

With the exception of the unborn fetus, can life be sustained or continued without lungs? Besides, is there a single vital organ that can be dispensed with and life continued?

"Crystals unite into ærolites," etc. If that is not an assumption, it admits of proof. Where, and from what, did the crystals evolve? Again, how is it known that, collectivly, they form satellites and worlds, and how do they manage to get the right place in space, then circle around some convenient friendly sun for a time and die, and what becomes of the remains and skeleton? To withhold knowledge of that kind is not generous—they are questions of too much importance to make guess-work of. And Agnostics, being somewhat dull of comprehension, would respectfully beg of those friends who, with so much assurance, know all about it, to tell.

And suns being made—evolving, unfolding, actually in process of growth and decay, dying, why not say being annihilated?

This must be considered as the most daring presumption possible. And does science verify, demonstrate, that such affirmations are facts?

Usually it has been supposed that science dealt only with tangible things, not abstract theories.

The once somewhat popular theory that from the distant nebulous light suns were being manufactured, suns in embryo, is no longer tenable.

Astronomers are not supposed to make mistakes in figuring distance, etc. They tell us that light moves with a velocity of 186,000 miles per second, and there are stars so distant that their light could not reach us in less than 10,000 years; and to traverse the Milky Way, of which our solar system is a part, it requires 1,500 years, and many times that, or 5,000,000, to reach us from the most distant nebula.

The time it would require for the matter of worlds and suns, meeting as they would with much more resistance than light, to pass through space, can not be estimated by figures; neither could the mind grasp it. It will be granted that the mind of the most distinguished Agnostic could not. Mr. Darwin, and others his equals in research and knowledge, would yield. I suggest that some of our knowing friends take hold of it as a part of the next lesson.

Law is unchanging with plants, and all of the animal world. Clover blossoms will never be grown or evolved from the seeds of thistles. Neither from the cone, or seed, of the pine, or acorn of the oak can fruit-bearing trees be evolved.

When, by the art and skill of the floriculturist, an ever-blooming rose or a lily of the valley has been unfolded from the burdock burr, then it will do to say that nature's laws hav changed.

In all that pertains to the nature of trees, plants, and animals, by which life is derived and continued, is this law of nature, that like produces like, and only for this germinating principle, and sex, there would be no life.

It will not do to say that the honey-bee unfolded from the ant, though much like in anatomical structure and form. The ant likes honey, but has neither the external nor internal arrangement for getting it; and is a fighting fellow besides, but will never hav a sting in his tail.

Survival of the fittest! Who is competent to tell how much survives that ought not to hav existed: war, want, with nations and peoples; with individuals, hate, revenge, malice?

A splendid race of animals—bisons—hav almost become extinct, under our own eyes, and not because the older and stronger killed the younger and weaker ones. And with them will pass away another race—a race of men that hav some noble qualities, traits, and characteristics.

When this generation is gone there will hardly be a solitary survivor of either. Coeval with both, still surviving, are those cowardly, cruel, worthless wolves, existing simply because there hav been others to destroy.

As to the man, that gallant and chivalrous soldier, General Sheridan, is credited with the saying that the only good Indian is a dead one. One is pagan, the other Christian.

And it may be said of the distinguished soldier and Christian, in accordance with his ideas of right and duty to the state church and humanity, that he did his part well in the endeavor to exterminate and make all Indians good. For two centuries the dusky pagan has struggled with the pale-faced Christian for his home and a burial-place. His fight has been for life and permission to exist; the other's, for glory and his country. Distinguished soldiers who profess and call themselvs Christians hav, by stealth and darkness, surrounded their homes, and while men, women, and children tried to escape by the light of their burning homes, dealt them an indiscriminate and merciless slaughter.

It will remain for other times and other men to impartially decide which of the two peoples were the fittest to survive. It may be the man from New Zealand that John Stuart Mill fancied might some time stand on a broken arch of London bridge and survey the ruins. Occasionally I meet a venerable toad in my walks. He has a voice and can sing. I fancied once I heard a murmur not the song. Venturing the inquiry, I said: "Is that you, my friend, and are you unhappy?"

Replied he: "You hav guessed the situation exactly. You see that skylark and hear him sing, see him mount higher and sing louder—and you know, by the process of evolution that is unfolding, this fellow has been provided with wings, plumage, tail feathers, and all. And you must grant his song is more varied and beautiful than mine, and doubtless will say he is happy. Once he was down in the mud as I am, and could only sing his toad song. Please tell me why all toads were not made happy by being unfolded into skylarks." The toad then suggested that I make of the lark the inquiry.

The lark answered: "In accordance and in harmony with the so-called science or philosophy of evolution, all skylarks were once toads. You will hardly question the truth of the statement, I think, simply because it has not been demonstrated. It easily can be. It is not necessary, because all who are not dullards or Agnostics will grant it.

"Happiness or content is not for birds or mortals. Many birds can sing just as finely as we can and hav much nicer plumage—can sing from the tree-top, without mounting.

"Is that all? You see that savage eagle up on the crag? He is watching if I sing too long or soar too high. He will pounce on me and tear me to pieces. No, I am not entirely happy. I fancy his life is preferable to mine.

"Please interview him. He is called the king of birds. But for him our songs would fill the air with melody." I addressed the eagle: "Now, O king of birds! what will you answer to these accusations, and from what did you evolve?"

"Your questions are at least presumptuous, if not foolish. Eagles were always eagles, the same as now; always had wings, beaks, and talons; and our business has been about the same always. What could the king of birds unfold from or change to? That is presumptuous nonsense. And but for me your little birds would destroy your grain-fields, and the melody of their songs would annoy you. Besides, eagles never make war on their own kind, or kill one another, which has been the principal part of your business and recreation; you claim to hav evolved from the ape—it would be a cowardly falsehood to accuse him of doing anything of the kind. Hav you in the transformation gone up or down?"

The lion made about the same answers, but said in relation to the social condition and standing of his race in comparison with some others, that it was far superior. No promiscuous intercourse, and no complex marriages.

The elephant was positiv that his trunk and tail unfolded at the same time, and the whole menagerie shouted in chorus the same of themselvs: "All right, no change would help them." Even the monkey declared that the devil could dispense with his tail and be less inconvenienced than himself. I gave up in despair, and was more than half convinced of the truth of their assertions.

J. VAN DENBURGH.

Abolition of the Death Penalty.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Murders, suicides, and hangings hav become so common that nobody seems concerned to ask whether so many are necessary, and still less whether any are necessary. But I think somebody should call a halt to the horrible business, or at any rate a stay of such proceedings till an inquiry be made whether the best is now doing that is possible for humanity down here in the very evening twilight of the nineteenth Christian century.

Our Declaration of Independence proclaims the inviolability of human life. If human life be inviolate, why do governments take it by sweeping wholesales in war, and constantly in lesser numbers in peace, as penalty for crime? Or how dare individuals murder and mangle one another in duels, or, by ordinary assassination, to avenge real or fancied wrongs? Or how can so many, old and young, men and women, lay violent hands on themselvs in frightful suicides? Why, Mr. Editor, nothing in the world is cheaper today than human life—that sacred inviolate thing which neither God nor man should invade for any cause!

Our Declaration of Independence pronounces human life inviolate, and also declares all "just governments derive their power from the consent of the governed." And yet we take away the inviolable lives of women, without condescending so much as to ask their consent, by giving them vote or voice in enacting the laws. Thus is the government doubly damned by its own primest Declaration!

But I hav here a petition to the law-making power of the states, to which I would respectfully ask to call the attention of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in the hope of awakening attention to the whole question of capital punishment:

PETITION FOR THE ABOLITION OF THE DEATH PENALTY.

To the Senate and House of Representativs: The undersigned earnestly desire you, the legislators of the state, immediately to revoke the penalty of death as now due to crime, particularly as relates to woman, who, though a citizen, property-holder, and tax-payer, cannot vote to enact that nor other laws, being denied the right of suffrage.

But if the penalty must be executed on man, who makes the laws, then your petitioners ask that the execution, being the most fearful and solemn act ever done by man, shall be made wholly a religious service, and committed to the clergy; provided always that no human being shall ever be sent into the unknown realities of eternity until, in the judgment of a clergyman of his choice, or of his nearest friends, he is prepared to meet them, and shall hav witnessed that preparation by receiving the ordinances of baptism and the sacramental supper, thus becoming a member of the visible church; and that then the dreadful act of hanging shall always be performed by an ordained clergyman, a doctor of divinity, or bishop, when practicable, with appropriate religious services, and on the first day of the week, commonly called the Sabbath.

Now consider the mighty prerogativs claimed by the priesthood of Christianity. First: They claim to know more than anybody else, or everybody else, about the vast unknown that lies beyond the veil of present sight. And, more, they claim to hav special commission from the most high God to teach the whole human race, born and to be born, the doctrins and duties designed to fit that race for a new existence in that dark beyond. And thirdly, they often quote with a shuddering solemnity the words as part of their commission: "Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven." And multitudes of them even go much further than that, and pronounce sentences dooming their fellow-mortals to eternal fire.

Now, who, in the name of all common sense, reason, justice, righteousness, should perform the dreadful act of hanging if not those whose very office treats of life and death, especially of death, and what may lie beyond, in a way and with meanings unknown to any and all other callings or works among men? By common consent governments send the clergy, not the school-master, to the condemned in their cells in the last dreary hours. Why, then, should they not perform the terrible deed of death on the victims so soon as, in the judgment of the constituted authorities, they are prepared? Tell me, O Editor! who should solemnize the awful scene, not by their presence only, but by their own ordained and sanctified hands, if not they?

A Good Move.

We understand that the secretary of the American Secular Union designs for one item of next year's work, if he shall be furnished with the necessary funds, to begin legal proceedings against the trustees of Girard College, in Philadelphia, because of their shameful betrayal of their trust and willful and wicked violation of the conditions of Girard's will.

This is a wise determination, and one that we hope will not be departed from. Stephen Girard left money and property for a specific purpose under specific conditions. The United States Supreme Court has decided that his conditions were legally binding, as of course they were morally right. The Christians hav stepped in and under the pretense of fulfilling the purpose hav virtually stolen Girard's millions to use as a missionary fund for the conversion of orphans. The facts are well known; abundance of evidence is at hand, and it only remains to take the proper steps in the courts.

The American Secular Union is the proper organization to undertake the case, and it should be done at once. As Judge Westbrook, in his book, "Girard's Will and Girard College Theology," says, "the best interests of morality require the strictest adherence to a trust," and when that trust is for the benefit of Liberalism the American Secular Union should see to it that the Christians are not unpunished for their knavery. Stephen Girard ordered in his will that the orphans who should derive advantage from his bequest should not be religiously instructed, but should be left unprejudiced to adopt, when they departed from the college, "such religious tenets as their matured reason may enable them to prefer." And especially did Girard forbid sectarian teaching. But, as is well known, the orphans are taught religion, and sectarian religion at that—Protestant sectarianism as the groundwork, and Episcopalianism as the divisional superstructure. The college curriculum is as full of piety as that of a theological seminary.

We should like to see the Secular Union take hold of more practical issues like this. In fact, we think the Union can do better propagandist work in this way than in any other. If the Union will furnish the news, the daily press will spread the arguments of the Union. A few cases in the courts, a few speeches in the legislatures, a few vigorous fights against the tyranny of the church, a few school-board trustees made to answer for their conversion of public into parochial schools, will do more for the cause of justice than all the speeches that can be spoken and tracts that can be written in a twelvemonth. The daily press will be our orator and our writer. Facts tell, and more men are interested in a fight than in a lamentation over wrongs inflicted. If thine enemy smite thee on one cheek, hit him in both eyes.

If the officers of the Union will for one year spend every dollar they can get over the secretary's salary in legally compelling the Christians to be honest and just, the Union will be stronger and hav more to work with than it ever had before.

Cardinal Manning to the Rescue.

In the North American Review for the current month Cardinal Manning has a twenty-eight-page article on the Gladstone-Ingersoll controversy, in which he contends that the church is its own witness—meaning by the church the Roman Catholic organization in which he holds office. It is a rehash of the affirmativ propositions which Rome relies upon to support her claims.

The cardinal in one way or another many times repeats the phrase, "Sift and test the evidence that Christianity is a divine revelation as strictly as if it were in a court of law;" and he talks about the "twofold processes" of intellectuality and faith. An ignorant person, bewildered by a multiplicity of words, and setting down as an extraordinarily smart man any person who can use words of which the commonalty of mankind do not know the meaning; unused, too, to going behind the glittering but often meaningless rhetoric of the advocate for the idea which he has concealed—such person might conclude from reading the article that Cardinal Manning had offered some valid argument in support of his favorit theology. But he hasn't, for the very simple but all-powerful reason that he starts from an unproved assumption. He asserts that the church had a "divine" founder, which founder is "God," through Jesus Christ, and upon these unproved and unprovable hypotheses he builds his house of cards. It needs no argument to show that such a house cannot stand the assaults of logic.

Again, he takes for granted that the world will admit the church to be its own witness, because the church itself has declared that it is, "by its marvelous propagation, its eminent sanctity, its inexhaustible fruitfulness in all good things, its catholic unity and invincible stability, a vast and perpetual motiv of credibility, and an irrefragable witness of its own divine legation." Even if this were all true it is only an assertion of an interested organization as to itself, which could not possibly be allowed as evidence, even in a court prejudiced in its favor, unless corroborated by outside testimony. And so far from being true, it is all false; and besides, would prove too much, as any other religion claiming the same would be entitled to claim divine creation and conduct. If "marvelous propagation" proves divine assistance, surely Mohammedanism had the aid of God. Catholic unity is a high-sounding phrase, but why did Protestantism lead half the Catholics out of the church? Why are there two bodies of Catholics? Why did Roman Catholics separate from their older Greek Catholic brethren? The sanctity of the Catholic church, and its fruitfulness in good things, may well not be dwelt upon by its defenders, else the unbeliever will catalog again the infamous and almost infinit wickedness and evil of that same church.

Argument based on such fallacious premises can convince no thinking person, though the changes on them were rung through twice twenty-eight pages of the Review. No doubt, when he gets ready, Colonel Ingersoll will expose Cardinal Manning's weaknesses in detail.

A Change of Diseases.

An anti-Catholic society has been formed in Minneapolis. It is only six months old, but its organizers claim a membership of over eight thousand. The order has a division in nearly every ward of the city. It is composed of Protestants who hate their fellow-Christians, and is about like the old Know-nothing organization. The following is the "creed" of the order:

"Nationality no bar to membership.

"(Confidential).

"In view of the intolerant, persistent, aggressiv efforts of Romanists, their evident determination to control the government of the United States and to destroy our civil and religious liberty, I desire to submit to you the following questions:

"1st. Are you a Protestant from principle or from chance?

"2d. Are you in favor of preserving constitutional liberty, and maintaining the government of the United States?

"3d. Do you regard Romanism as the enemy of civil and religious liberty?

"4th. Is it not in your opinion unwise and unsafe to appoint to civil, political, military offices in this country men who own allegiance to the pope of Rome, and who hav sworn to obey him?

"5th. Are you in favor of maintaining the principles of our general unsectarian, free school organization?

"6th. Are you opposed to all attempts to use the public funds for any sectarian purposes whatever?

"7th. Are you willing to be governed by these principles in your future political actions?

"8th. Are you willing to unite with others who hold these principles, and henceforth devote yourself to the perpetuation of civil and religious liberty and the great American Union?"

The main trouble with this organization is that it would substitute for the rule of one church the rule of another about equally bad. The Bible is as malodorous in our public schools when read by Protestant teachers, as the catechism of the Catholics taught by the sisters. While the Catholics would destroy religious liberty if they had the power, so would the Protestants. The religious persecutions in this country hav been by Protestants, and their Reform Association is one of the most activ agencies at work to-day in revamping our Constitution in favor of their own sectarianism. The Protestants are scarcely less inimical to freedom than the Romanists.

In the mind of a Protestant, "unsectarian" means Protestant Christianity. We don't want that sort of religion any more than we want Roman Catholic religion. Ostensibly, the Minneapolis organization is all right, but in reality, it is as bad as the Romish organization. And in it we think we see the "fine Italian" hand of the National Reform Association, otherwise known as the God-in-the-Constitution party. It never yet benefited the patient to replace small-pox with yellow fever.

The Church in the Arena.

A writer in the Christian at Work winds up a long catalog of efforts at Sunday closing in various towns in the East with these general reflections:

"These facts certainly show favorable openings for the friends of the Lord's day. The laws against labor on the Sabbath can be more easily enforced when a majority in each trade and occupation demand it. Those who resist will hav the sentiment of their own guild against them. Now is the time for the church to enter the arena, and develop this under-current of Sabbath observance. Indeed, on almost every side economic and ethical questions are arising and looking about for wise leadership, and we hav at hand Christian principles, by the application of which these struggles can result in the attainment of righteous ends."

This pietist has got the cart before the horse. Once upon a time the Christians ran this country. They had Sunday laws, and they enforced them. The man who dared kiss his wife on Sunday was punished, and the wretch who followed the Lord's example and took a walk in the cool of the evening paid the penalty by standing in the stocks. The church was in the arena in full panoply of power, and the "under-current of Sabbath observance" was exceedingly well developed. Ethical questions were all settled, and very economically for the clergy, who benefited by the various pounds of tobacco and cash squeezed from the wicked.

Since then the world has advanced considerably, and the attempt of the church to "enter the arena" is not the beginning of a crusade for righteousness, but an effort to move the country back something like two hundred years. That it will succeed more than temporarily and locally, in some ignorant districts, does not seem probable. There are too many folks in the country who can reason, for the Christian church to ever do again what she did in colonial days. Our Sunday laws are becoming virtually, and except spasmodically, dead letters. The effort to breathe the breath of life into them is like blowing into the nozzle of a blacksmith's bellows—the wind comes back into the blower's face with increased force.

The Lord and Colonel Ingersoll.

The yellow fever plague now decimating Jacksonville, Florida, is one of those horrible penalties which sometimes follow a compliance with nature's malevolent laws instead of her beneficent rules. The distress in the stricken city is terrible, and the suffering of the people appeals to every sympathetic and generous heart in the country.

The righteously pious regard the plague as a punishment for sin, the Lord having become angry at his children. No good Christian doubts that the Lord could stay the disease were he so inclined, but the fact remains that he does not, and every day adds to the long list of the dead. Other folks take a very different view of the matter, and are endeavoring by human effort to cleanse the city of Jacksonville to prevent the further spread of the poison germs. With this object in view, wicked Wall street of this city has contributed thousands of dollars, and merchants generally are going down deep into their pockets in response to humanitarian sentiments. Other cities are helping the noble work along, and with the means thus raised it is probable that Jacksonville's horrible scourge will be overcome.

Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, always first in good works, besides giving his cash donation, offers to go upon the platform and lecture for the benefit of the yellow fever victims. This means, in this city, another one or two thousand dollars.

We cannot help constrasting the conduct of Colonel Ingersoll with that of the Lord. The latter personage will do nothing, though amply able; while the former not only contributes his cash, but his services to get cash from others who will not contribute unless some service is rendered them in return. We think the Lord might, if not willing to forego his revenge upon the wicked, contribute at least a few of his cattle upon a thousand hills for the benefit of those who hav not offended him, but yet suffer through the punishment of the wicked.

The Jews.

The Christian Advocate says:

"Rabbi Joseph is a noted Jewish dignitary brought over from Russia to be the head of the orthodox Hebrews in this city. His arrival has been hailed with the greatest enthusiasm. The address which he made sets the standard of piety high. He rules with an iron hand, but consistently. A congregation had bought a Christian church and were about to dedicate it. Rabbi Joseph, on arriving, perceived the crosses still upon it, and would not allow the services to proceed. He was right. When the Jew truly reveres him who died on the cross, he is a Christian. Till then the cross is out of place on the synagog. Rabbi Joseph has not arrived a day too soon, for many of the seed of Abraham hereabouts are Infidels."

We fear, however, that the presence of Rabbi Joseph will do little to counteract the Infidelity prevailing among the Jews. Orthodox Judaism is not very powerful in this city, very few of the younger generation understanding even the language in which Rabbi Joseph exhorts them. The Reform or heretical wing of Judaism are the supporters of the Jewish institutions, and, as one Jew said to us recently, all the orthodox party do is to furnish paupers for the united charities, orphans for the asylums, old people for the Home for the Aged, and incurables for the Montefiore Home. We doubt if Rabbi Joseph will get many of the Reformers back into the fold, and as for the Infidel Jews, they smile scornfully when asked to again believe in the ancient rubbish of the Mosaic times, though many of them attend the synagog regularly. The Jews of New York, especially those of German nationality, are a level-headed and rationalistic race. The orthodox Jews are Russians and Poles, and will not hav intelligence enough for several generations yet to become Infidels. But a Jew once Liberalized seldom or never goes back to either Jewish or Christian superstition.

It is queer, though, that the Methodists would rather see a Jew superstitiously orthodox in his Judaism than an Infidel. Is it one slavedriver sympathizing with another?

Longevity and Exegesis.

With a late sermon of Dr. Talmage's on "Longevity" we take it to be our duty to express a decided dissent; and against it we shall direct all the forces of confutation in our humble power. Dr. Talmage's words are as follows:

"It is said in Isaiah: 'The child shall die a hundred years old.' Now, if according to scripture, the child is to be a hundred years old, may not the men and women reach to three hundred and five hundred? Religion has only just touched our world. Giv it full power for a few centuries, aud who can tell what will be the strength of man, and the beauty of woman, and the longevity of all? Adam lived nine hundred and thirty years. Methuselah lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years. My design is to show that practical religion is the friend of long life."

Here is the statement distinctly made, that certain persons attained a vast age, and that the cause of that longevity was Christianity. Authority is given, citation made, and the statement started on its rounds for the misleading of Freethinkers. But we shall take the liberty to deny Mr. Talmage's assertion in toto. It is not that we underestimate the strength of his position, or place too high a value upon our own powers; no, we are fully sensible of the serious nature of the task; but we are immovably convinced that the attributing of the mentioned longevity to religion is fallacious, for we hav the best testimony to the existence of equal longevity dissociated from religion; and authority for authority we will meet his statement and from works of the same known trustworthiness establish this position. Swift's works, Gulliver's Travels, Part III.—A Voyage to Laputa, Balnibarbi, Luggnagg, Glubdubdrib, and Japan; Edinburgh ed., 1869, p. 184:

"One day, in much good company, I was asked by a person of quality whether I had seen any of their struldbrugs, or immortals. I said I had not; and desired he would explain to me what he meant by such an appellation applied to a mortal creature. He told me that sometimes, though very rarely, a child happened to be born in a family with a red circular spot in the forehead, directly over the left eyebrow, which was an infallible mark that it should never die. He said these births were so rare, that he did not believe that there could be above eleven hundred struldbrugs, of both sexes, in the whole kingdom. I cried out, as in a rapture, 'Happy nation, where every child has a chance for being immortal!'"

Comment is unnecessary. It is distinctly stated that numbers of Luggnaggians, totally without Christianity, possess not merely longevity but immortality.

But we need not go so far for the needed proofs. What says the well-known Mother Goose? "Rhymes," page 264:

"Three wise men of Gotham
Went to sea in a tub.
If the tub had been stronger
My story had been longer."

Page 292:

"There was an old woman lived under a hill,
If she's not gone, she livs there still."

Now, here, doctor, you will see a meaning so near the surface as not to be overlooked. The truth is, you display distinguished merit in getting the meanings out of scriptural passages later on in your sermon, and we are not averse from showing you that you may hav your equals in this, at the same time that we attend to longevity. We find mention of two parties, of great age, and then allusion to a prolonged and indefinit continuance of those parties supposing immunity from, in the one case, bodily accident, and in the other, removal of place. If it be asked why the men of Gotham are accounted aged, the explanation is made by simply referring to the adjectiv "wise." It is proverbial that wisdom is attained only with age; and why, we ask, if it be not intended to convey this signification, is there made this remarkable use of the word? There are a hundred other words any one of which would equally hav served any other intention; why not three simple men of Gotham, or three fat men of Gotham, or three bad men of Gotham? The selection of this one quality peculiar to an advanced period of life we can consider only as part of a deep design, and that design the indication of their great age. If the tub had been stronger, this story "had been longer." "Longer?" We think the meaning here evident. If for a mere few years, why is it not so stated? Why this indefinitness, if it be not to darkly shadow forth the extended life-term surmised? In law omission of facts that would naturally hav been mentioned justifies presumption of design. If these men had had any ordinary natural limit affixed to their lives, clearly it would hav been mentioned; and we shall so assume. The testimony of the second extract is even more direct. Critics may forever carp about what they call forced interpretations, but they at least can charge nothing here. If the old woman is not gone, she lives there—how long? An ordinary period? No; note the language used. She livs there still. That is, to this day. Further remarks would be supererogatory. Under the mention of a tub and a hill are no doubt symbolized great and beneficent truths; but confidently leaving these to the penetration of future laborers, we close the argument.

Then here, reverend sir, is testimony that we conceive irresistible; clothed, it is true, in the allegorical language of which you and your fellows find your own book so full, but sufficiently clear to strike at the first glance anyone who has had the least experience in the ways of exegesis. To say nothing of the direct evidence of Gulliver, we hav two indubitable traditions, handed down through Saxon folk-lore from peoples that had never heard of Christianity; the traditions hav been providentially preserved for us to this day with a care that reason forbids us to declare unintentional, and they clearly attest a longevity vast and practically illimitable.

No, no, Dr. Talmage; you hav sent forth an unhistorical statement, and but for the watchfulness of some might by now hav deceived and converted Freethinkers more numerous than Vallambrosa's leaves; but learn that the greatest abilities must meet with failure when enlisted in the cause of untruth—that you are not the only scholar in the world and that there is erudition besides your own.

Editorial Notes.

THE following remarks, which are accurate in fact and expression, are from the Sequachee Herald, published at Jasper, Tenn.: "THE TRUTH SEEKER, published at 28 Lafayette place, New York city, subscription price $3 per annum, is one of the ablest Freethought papers published in the United States. Its corps of correspondents are the brainiest set of men of any that write for literary papers."

THE danger of intimacy between ministers and the sisters of their congregations are vividly illustrated in the adventures of Mrs. Hayden and the Rev. Mr. Holden, of Hazleton, Pa. Mrs. Hayden had invited her pastor to accompany her in a pleasure ride through the country. Their route lay across a railroad track, and as Mrs. Hayden was driving along at a very moderate speed—so the account states—and deeply interested in the conversation of her companion, the phaeton was lifted several feet into the air by an engin, bringing up against a neighboring telegraph pole. Mrs. Hayden was found to be injured internally, while the minister had his shoulder and leg both broken. The horse was killed, and the phaeton smashed. THE TRUTH SEEKER has often warned the clergy and the sisters of the danger they run in seeking lone companionship, and we trust others will now giv heed to what we hav said.

THE subjoined letter has been received in due course of mail:

"SAN RAFAEL CAL

"Truth Seeker and Co I see my suboription is up Sept 4 is up please discontine it ltle to much Anathist floting arround fur me in it Yours T M Josselyn"

If any of our readers will, from reading this letter, tell us Mr. Josselyn's reason for discontinuing, we shall be grateful indeed. At present opinion in this office differs as to whether it is because he finds Atheist or Anarchist articles in the paper. The beautiful young lady who records the reception of cash hugs the idea that Mr. Josselyn finds the paper Atheistic; our devil, a product of Pennsylvania, thinks Mr. Josselyn has found in our columns a communication with Anarchistic sentiments concealed therein. The balance of the working force are about equally divided in their guesses. While we regret to lose Mr. Josselyn as a subscriber, the poignancy of parting is softened by the hope that he will use the annual price of the paper to purchase a spelling-book and grammar.

MR. SOHUOK, priest of St. Mary's church at Millhausen, Ind., has been to Rome, and returns with gloomy reports of the church's prospects in Italy. "I cannot express my sorrow at the lamentable condition in which I found the affairs of the church in Italy, and especially in Rome," said the priest to a Pittsburgh reporter. "The only property now owned by the church is the Vatican, where the pope livs. His former summer palace is now being used as a residence for King Humbert. The Italian government and people are continually subjecting the pope and priests to every insult they can on the streets. Priests are spit on and insulted by the people. I escaped this myself, but know it to be a common occurrence. As matters now stand I hav positiv information that the pope will not remain in Rome more than two years more, and from the way matters now stand I expect he will hav to leave there within the next six months. He will go to Spain, where he has been invited to come, and is sure of a cordial reception. The headquarters of the Catholic church will then be located in Madrid. Even now preparations are being made for the departure that is liable to take place at any moment. The great hatred of the Italian people toward the church arises from the fact that so many of the former are Infidels, and hav no respect for God or man." Perhaps it is now in order to pity the sorrows of the poor old pope, but we cannot help thinking that the Indiana priest exaggerates in his statements. It is true that the educated Italians are largely Infidel, but the ignorant peasants are nearly all Catholics. The pretended removal of the pope is a political scare.

THE London Freethinkers, aroused by the official gagging of Mr. A. B. Moss, a TRUTH SEEKER correspondent, are moving energetically in the school-board elections, and intend to place as many Freethinkers in office as possible. A recent meeting is thus reported by Mr. G. W. Foote's Radical Leader: Mr. G. W. Foote presided, and was supported by Mr. Bradlaugh, M.P., Mrs. Besant, Mrs. Bonner, Mrs. Sowden, Messrs. R. O. Smith, J. H. Ellis, G. Standring, Hubert Bland, and A. B. Moss. The chairman stated that it was the intention of the London Secular Federation to maintain the Radical program of compulsory, free, and secular education. They were willing to work with Liberals and Radicals, but not to compromise their principles. They were securing candidates, who would be run in various divisions, and they meant to change the complexion of the London school board. Mrs. Besant and Mr. Bradlaugh made stirring and eloquent speeches. Mr. Bradlaugh said the real truth was, the Freethinkers had to fight the Catholic church and the principles of Cardinal Manning, and believed that in every division the Freethinkers might carry a candidate by the cumulativ vote. Many subscriptions were received for the expenses of the coming fight. The following resolutions were adopted: "(1) That this mass meeting of London Secularists resolve to fight for the secular ticket at the approaching school elections. (2) That while willing, and indeed anxious, to work in our various divisions with Radical Associations that are prepared to stand by the old Radical program of "free and secular," we shall feel at liberty, wherever the secular part of the program is sacrificed or neglected, to run our own candidates and giv them our fullest support."

Letters from Friends.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Aug. 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am surprised that every person in this world does not seek a truth and liv it, as this should be the foundation for everything in this world, and he that buildeth on this shall never fail. The Bible declares they that worship God must worship him in spirit and in truth. It also says we must prove all things, and hold fast that which is good. This is the position of the real truth seeker. How any Christian can possibly hold a truth seeker otherwise than one of the best of men, I am wholly unable to conceive.

Yours for all truth. CHARLES SACH.

SANTA ANA, CAL., Aug. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I write a word of advice to Frank H. Howe, and trust it will be of great service to him. In his article, "A Down-town Revival," he speaks of the loneliness of big city hotel lobbies on Sunday evenings. Now, he will never be troubled that way if he will spend his Sunday evenings in writing such articles as the above. It is the most interestingly written article I hav read in a long time. The spirit and style are very agreeable and his moral is well pointed. Please giv us your experience oftener, Mr. Howe.

Yours, D. EDSON SMITH.

MONTE VISTA, COL., Aug. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The article in your issue of the 18th inst. entitled, "Society and Its Criminals," from that wonderful brain of Colonel Ingersoll, is worth many times the price of a year's subscription. If I were to say fully what I think in regard to that great and good man, I suppose some crank would put me under the sod. No witch or God, devil, ghost, priest, or preacher ever bothers me, because of the power of the colonel's brain on paper. I keep my library stocked with those gems from his magic brain. I once knocked at the door of Courtlandt Palmer, and he opened unto me. Respect to his memory. JOHN TRUEBLOOD.

PARSONS, KAN., Aug. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Being interested in your paper and having been a subscriber for a few years, I thought I would write and tell you some things that I hav been doing in this priest-ridden town.

I do all the good I can with the grand old TRUTH SEEKER; I lend it to anyone whom I think will read it.

I hav made a few conversions, I am quite sure, and I might hav gained some new subscribers were it not such hard times among the working classes.

I am now an old man sixty-eight years old, and hav never seen a time so necessary for every Liberal to try and do what he can for the cause.

The churches being organized and very badly scared, knowing they cannot argue with a Liberal, will use all the stratagem and lies they are master of to put down our cause. Yours truly, M. WELLINGTON.

QUAKERTOWN, PA., Sept. 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am always anxious to receive THE TRUTH SEEKER, and when it does not arrive on time I always fear something has happened.

I like the illustrations, and they should be continued, but on looking at the illustration on the front page of the issue of September 1st, I could not help thinking that the idea of the loving and kind Robert G. Ingersoll scalping his opponents, showing the scalps on a pole and the heads from which they had been removed, was too barbaric. The balance forms a noble picture: Ingersoll with his sword of truth, breaking the swords of Presbyterianism and old Orthodoxy, of Field and Gladstone; besides, the parsons' slings might be loaded with lies. With these alterations, and got up in good size for framing, I think it would make a fine picture to decorate the homes of Freethinkers, with the one of Ingersoll and Gladstone on horseback as a companion. D. C. WISMER.

SYLVANIA, O., Aug. 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of August 11th, page 505, is an article headed, "Despoiling the Stranger," containing views on the Mormon question which do not correspond with mine. In that article, and in other previous ones in THE TRUTH SEEKER, it seems to be presented that the Mormons are being persecuted and their property confiscated on account of their peculiar religious views or opinions, or, in other words, because they differed with other Christians. Now, I think this is a lamentable mistake. They are being treated as criminals, and such they are. They are, and hav been since they settled in Utah, engaged in advocating and practicing that great crime against civilized society—polygamy; a crime punished by imprisonment in every state of the Union; a crime no less a crime because Jehovah was represented in the Old Testament as a believer in it.

I agree with Colonel Ingersoll's views found on page 498 of that issue: "If anything on earth is immoral, that is. If there is anything calculated to destroy home, to do away with human love, to blot out the idea of family life, to cover the hearthstone with serpents, it is the institution of polygamy."

Now, it being conceded that the practice of polygamy is a crime, is it not the duty of the government to break it up even if it become necessary to resort to confiscation?

What does the law require to be done with the property and tools used in smuggling, counterfeiting, burglary, etc.?

Mormonism looks to me as a gigantic criminal, an organized conspiracy against law and decency and a defiant rebel against our government, and is entitled to no protection any more than any other combination of outlaws.

I do not understand that the government has instituted proceedings against the Mormons on account of their religious belief, but on account of their criminal acts. And I shall be glad to realize it as a fact that by the simple operation of law that great nest of crime can be broken up. I hope the government has at last, after tampering with the crime so many years, taken effectiv steps to suppress it.

Inclosed please find $1, for which send me the "Field-Ingersoll Discussion," cloth-bound, and oblige,

Yours truly, J. M. HOPKINS.

VAN BUREN, ARK., July 12, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find small order, which please forward as directed.

In your issue of August 4th I notice that George Elliot says: "I do not like your emblem of the flag above the cross. Why not above the crescent, or any other superstition?" I do like the emblem. The crescent has no power in the United States. The cross has. If the devotees of the crescent were trying to place the crescent above the flag, and make the doctrins for which it stands paramount, then I would say, keep the flag above the crescent. If we retain our liberties we must keep the flag above the cross. Long may she wave above all ecclesiastical interference—the guardian of the rights of the people against the encroachments of all tyrants, religious or social.

If Clark Braden will come this way we will try and furnish him amusement for a few evenings. There are a few Freethinkers here who are always ready for any preacher that may come along. None of our local preachers is willing to meet any one of us in joint discussion, and if Clark Braden, or any other Christian, is thirsting for Infidel blood let him come around and we will accommodate him. It used to be that an Infidel who would undertake to talk religion here would hav two or three Christians "on him" in a minute; exactly the reverse of that is the way things stand now.

Yours for truth and justice, HENRY ADDIS.

NATIONAL HOME, WIS., Aug. 23, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Here is a sample from the Banner of Light anent what they call Antichristian: "We still liv in an Antichristian age, more or less, as the late death by hanging of culprit Maxwell at St. Louis will demonstrate. There he hung fully fifteen or twenty minutes before life became extinct," etc. "Antichristian," is it? O shades of our mighty dead martyrs to science and philosophy! look down with scorn and contempt on this new-fangled curse called Christian Spiritualism. Consistency is the jewel that stubbornly refuses to materialize for the benefit of Brother Colby's readers. Is it possible that on this continent, and in this nineteenth century, there exists one who would so defame the Spiritual philosophy as to connect it with this multiplicity of blood-stained creeds of Christendom? Antichristian forsooth! Who hanged Maxwell? Who murdered the five so-called Anarchists in open defiance of law in Chicago? Who instituted the holy Inquisition, and kept it in force? Who caused millions to perish in the Crusades, and nearly depopulated Europe? Were all these Infidels or Antichristians?

Shame, shame, Brother Colby! It would not take much of a clairvoyant to read thy future occupation for some time to come. In old, forsaken habitations on earth thou wilt make the night dolesome holding séances with bats and owls a hundred thousand years hence. NELSON HUNT.

JERSEY CITY, Sept. 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I send the obituary: Died, Aug. 29, 1888, at Jersey City, Pamelia Dewey, aged seventy years. These few words announce to the world that one of the most practical and consistent Liberal women has passed away.

To me they bring a painful realization of the fact that my mother has gone. After an illness of nearly one year's duration, suffering constantly, and with the knowledge that she could not recover, mother died one of the grandest deaths known to my experience.

Born in 1818, in the midst of a Methodist hot-bed, compelled by custom and fanaticism to unite with the church, still she had inherited from her father skepticism sufficient to deny the doctrin of eternal punishment. This was her salvation, and through it she was enabled to throw off every yoke that superstition had fastened upon her, and in its stead to develop a grand, independent life filled with good deeds. Her children had the first claim upon her, and hampered by poverty, opposition of every kind, she succeeded in implanting in all of their minds the necessity of living right and never at the expense of others. She never tried to control their religious views—left them free to act as best they could. She felt that the influence of church and creed could never, never outweigh her love, and it never did.

She openly identified herself with the Liberal world about ten years ago. Since that time, and particularly since the persecution of D. M. Bennett, THE TRUTH SEEKER has been her companion. Ingersoll's writings she adored. She was conversant with them from the time Robert shook hands with Moses until he left Gladstone in a deep, reverential calm. She believed that death was one long sleep. To her children she said: "If there is a God I am not afraid to meet him. I hav done the best I could. If there is a heaven I hav done nothing that can debar me from it."

During her long sickness she became quite attached to her physician. He would often spend an hour with her conversing upon the prevailing topics, religion and politics. About nine hours before her death he was sitting beside her. The family stood close around the bedside. All were crying, all thought the end was near. She suddenly opened her eyes and said: "Doctor, who do you think will be elected president?" The doctor managed to say: "Cleveland, I think. Is that all right?" She nodded and closed her eyes. Only a few words were spoken after this. She passed away in a sweet sleep at 1 A.M. No pain or suffering, not even the trembling of the eyelids or lips. The last breath was drawn and all was over.

Mother made her arrangements for the funeral and post-mortem examination. She attended with me the funeral of Mr. Leland. To her it was an ideal funeral, and she wished that Mr. Wakeman might say a few words for her. But before her death she thought that father and some of the family might feel better if a minister officiated. Accordingly she requested me to secure the Universalist minister of this place. I did so, and, to his credit be it said, he preached a grand Freethought sermon, never mentioning the word God, and freely acknowledging that in the presence of death we did not know what the future would be, but when we considered the life of the departed we did know what the past had been. In fact, it was a manly, consistent sermon, and one my mother would hav indorsed. All of her wishes were carried out except this—she wanted me to write to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav done so. Good-bye, my loving, Liberal mother. May your grand principles govern me through life. CHARLES M. DEWEY.

SNOWVILLE, VA., July 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Friend Wilson in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 28th says: "Once enfranchise women and the preachers would decide all elections." I doubt it very much, for really women are superior in intelligence to men; and they are now "the power behind the throne" and if they had the will the coming election would go precisely as they would determin. And if they decided on making Jo Cook or Talmage or Clark Braden president they could do it.

As to wars and fighting, if the mother who bore and raised her sons has no right to say when they shall go to war, who has a right? So long as we are social beings and liv under common laws, each sex must yield certain rights and wishes in deference to the rights and wishes of the other.

I may hav a right to sing, shout, thrum the piano, or ring a bell in my own house, but if there is a sick neighbor living in an adjoining house I hav no right to disturb him by making unnecessary noises, and even if said neighbor be simply nervous and annoyed by it, I should in all kindness refrain from making superfluous din.

Every argument against the right, or even expediency, of woman's vote has been met and refuted, but still they come, like ghosts at a séance—and about as substantial too.

Right is right, and no scare will long suppress it.

The ballot is sure to be in our hands, and if it fills every office with a preacher, and the preacher be not the best man for the office, he will hav to step down and out till the best is there, and probably that best will be a woman.

> Among the sons of men how few are known
> Who dare be just to merit not their own!—Churchill.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

DETROIT, Sept. 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say a few things upon the subject of your editorial in the last week's TRUTH SEEKER. I hav for the last three or four years endeavored to enlist the Liberals, and especially the writers and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in a new—and the only true—method of obtaining the objects for which we are all working and hoping; and the last sentences of your remarks upon the names Liberal and Secular do most surely coincide with my earnest convictions for years past. Will the readers of our Great Paper please take heed and think? It is now twelve or fourteen years since I entered the labor organization called the Sovereigns of Industry, and all through the life of that order I earnestly pleaded with the leaders to drop all other points they were seeking for and work for the removal of all debts, as the sole cause of all other evils. I assured them that the order could last but a short time unless they aimed at some permanent good. Time proved the truth of my words. Then came the Knights of Labor, and my brother laborers kept at me until I joined them. I told them, the same as I had said before, that nothing but failure could come of their having twenty-two demands, which were only aimed against evils which were the natural results of the government that they upheld, and it has proved just according to my words. They made me their treasurer on the night that I joined, and after five years the assembly has gone out and left their treasurer alone. And I hav said the same to the Liberals and truth seekers. The Nine Demands are absolutely useless. There is no point, no power, in them. They simply are opposed to the—claimed—rights of other people. They cannot giv us any permanent good. We must do something. We must hav a live issue which will enlist the great body of the people. We must advocate Liberty—liberty to act, to be free from debt. We must teach the people the truth that we are yet in slavery. It is only hypocrisy to hoodwink ourselvs with the cry of the past century, that this is the land of the free. We must look down deep into the history of this past hundred years in which we hav been building prisons, jails, workhouses, and asylums; creating gallows and ornamenting them with the bodies of our fathers, brothers, and friends, while supporting an army of soldiers and another of police and spy detectivs. I was quite surprised in reading the interviews of the New York World with Colonel Ingersoll that the great lawyer entirely forgot or ignored the causes of crime. In his remark upon the inhuman crime of the man who dug out his wife's eyes, he does not even allude to the fact that the wife had $4,000 in bank; that he undoubtedly married her in the selfish hope of getting that money; that her refusal to giv him the money was the inciting cause of his brutal crime. And the same is the true cause of every evil on earth socially and politically. No one can name any sort of evil or crime that our daily papers are flooded with to-day that would ever happen were the enormous loads of debt removed from the land and every cause for the payment of debt or interest removed forever off the minds of the people. A year ago, in this city, a man murdered another for the value of a five-cent glass of beer. A few weeks ago a man murdered his brother's wife because she demanded that he should pay his board. A few days ago another man shot and killed his own brother for the value of a three-cent glass of beer. Writers hav written for ages of the power and influence of the almighty dollar and yet hav never learned the wisdom of compelling their government to make them free and keep them free from this almighty evil and curse. I hav not the least hesitation in saying that the Constitution of the United States was the work of traitors; that the Tory enemies who were unable to beat the colonies in war so managed and manipulated in the convention that every shadow of those rights which were in the Declaration of Independence affirmed the inalienable property of every person born was entirely obliterated. If ever liberty is to be enjoyed by any people on earth, they must deprive their government of all right or power ever to lay a tax of even one cent upon the people, for taxation is slavery, and there never was and never can be any other way to enslave a people than by taxation.

I want to see the Secular Union take this, the one only true stand for liberty and humanity. We demand that our government shall cease all taxation and that the Constitution shall be so amended as absolutely to prohibit the laying of any tax, and we demand that the government shall create a full legal tender money receivable for all dues and with it pay all expenses of the government.

Let us take the lead in the way to our first and only emancipation from slavery. We cannot be too early. We hav no time to lose or waste. The Catholic church is wasting no time or opportunity in getting in its work for our enslavement to her rule. Not only are they building parochial schools for every church, but they are organizing and drilling one or more military companies of soldiers in every church society. We do not see that every man, almost, in each and every company will be able to command and drill a hundred more men when the Catholic church shall need and so order them. The only way to beat the Catholic church in this country and all others is to make this country free. Make one country free and all other countries must follow. Demand that this government shall cease all taxation and create a real money to pay all its own expenses, recognizing no other money, and the storm that will be raised all over the world by money-lenders will show you that you are for the first time seeking for true liberty. If the bankers of Europe could pay $300,000 to get the two "excepts" put upon the greenbacks, they will be willing to make it millions to prevent our gaining our liberty. All other questions are quite insignificant compared with this. Giv us liberty or death. Yours for liberty, J. H. Wood.

San Diego, Cal., Aug. 12, 1888.

Mr. Editor: In your issue of July 28th is an editorial headlined, "Christianity and Slavery," in which you furnish abundant proof of the fact that Christianity has always opposed every progressiv step until its final success was assured, and then with brazen effrontery stepped in and claimed all the credit.

"Christianity," says Gladstone, "abolished slavery. And Leo XIII. repeats the claim," etc. So, too, did Christianity claim, and try by every artifice to prove, that the great and good Lincoln was a Christian; but did it succeed? Not much. But what I wish to call the reader's attention to is, who and what actuating principle governed the proclamations, ukases, etc., which gave liberty to the slaves of the United States, the serfs of Russia, and, lately, to the slaves of Brazil. No doubt my statements will meet with denial and bitter denunciation by the majority, and, perhaps, by a majority of your readers, and no doubt those who claim the credit for Christianity would sooner hav slavery still dominant in all these countries than to admit the truth and giv the proper meed of praise to the cause that is entitled thereto; nevertheless, the facts that I shall state are susceptible of abundant proof, and history, in time, will so record. Abraham Lincoln was a Spiritualist, and issued his immortal emancipation proclamation by the direct advice and solicitation, given through a medium, of some of the founders of this government, which medium, I believe, still dwells in the mortal form. In fact, the latter part of his administration was largely conducted by the advice of these invisibles, so communicated.

Alexander of Russia emancipated twenty million serfs, and at the imminent peril of both crown and life, by and with the advice and earnest solicitation of his father in spirit-life, the late Czar Nicholas.

Dom Pedro, emperor of Brazil, is and for many years has been an intelligent and earnest Spiritualist, and although I am not advised as to his efforts and agency in the late emancipation in his empire, yet it is only a logical deduction from his well-known enlightened and Liberal policy, and the—to all intelligent Spiritualists—well-known teachings of all progressiv spirits, that he has been the activ agent, under spirit advice, of this last great move on the chess-board of human progress.

Spiritualism has for its be con star the liberation of every human being from all that enslaves either mind or body. All spirit phenomena are produced, not as an end, but as the means to an end, and that end the enlightenment and purification of the whole human family, until each and every individual shall be a law unto him or herself—until courts, jails, prisons, priests, preachers, and churches shall no longer cumber and disgrace the earth and the dwellers thereon. Without the phenomena the angel-world could not make their presence known, nor enlist the coöperation of mortals in their beneficent and benevolent work of uplifting humanity, coöperation of the two being indispensable to the accomplishment of the grand work so essential and so sure of ultimate attainment.

Opposition, now so rife, or indifference, on the part of mortals, may and will retard, but cannot prevent, the ultimate fulfilment of the grand purposes now being wrought out by the coöperation of spirits and mortals. The circle is broadening and the current flowing stronger day by day. Amid all the persecution and cries of fraud, new medial agents are being developed, while the persecuted ones are receiving greater powers, and new converts are being made as never before. The present and past opposition, so blindly and foolishly, not to say unscrupulously, carried on, must and will spend its fury and gradually wear away, and when men can and will look at and investigate without prejudice or preconceived opinion, they will find that they hav been warring against their own best friend, and also against the best interest of humanity.

Let no one who loves truth for its own sake pass, or treat as an idle tale, the statements above made, and especially those referring to the emancipation of the slaves of the Americas and the serfs of Russia. The truths that I hav stated with regard thereto are, as before stated, susceptible of abundant proof, and anyone wishing that proof can, on application to any well-informed Spiritualist, be supplied therewith, or referred to parties who will so supply him.

For humanity's sake, all true Spiritualists deplore the blind war so furiously being waged against our best mediums, and especially do they deplore the worse than foolish opposition of those calling themselvs Spiritualists; all of these are their own worst enemies, and will so understand in time. But no opposition can prevent the ultimate triumph of the cause now so little understood and so bitterly persecuted. Nor does the loud cry of "Fraud exposed" in the slightest degree weaken our confidence in the honesty of the manifestations occurring in the presence of our materializing mediums, against whom so much is published and said.

Liberalists hav few or no friends outside the ranks of Spiritualism, and it does seem strange that so much opposition and denunciation should be heaped on us from Liberal sources. What harm, my good "Liberal" friends, can come to you if you should learn for a fact that life for all is continuous and unending? Would that be such a calamity that you must needs fight the proof thereof? We do not abuse you for not knowing, although we would, for your own sake and for humanity's sake, that you might know. Then why abuse us when we tell you we do know?

Let us contend against the common enemy and be friends. Meet us one-third of the way and we will gladly travel the other two-thirds to meet you. O. B. Lisher.

Milwaukee, Wis.

Mr. Editor: I hav been very much interested in the articles that hav appeared in The Truth Seeker of late on the subject of protection and free trade. While I do not consider it the all-important question to be settled at the present time for the laboring classes, as other questions of still greater importance should be discussed, nevertheless, the two parties, Republican and Democratic, are making this their principal issue in the coming campaign, and one of their main objects in doing so is to draw the attention of the people from the more vital questions of the hour, and blind them with their arguments upon this subject.

But as this subject is before the people, and will not down during the campaign, I hope and expect it will do good in the way of education so that the people will become better posted in our system of government. But how a wage-worker can see that protection protects him is what puzzles me. It protects the man that employs him, if he is engaged in any of the industries, and puts money in his pocket.

But as long as he can go into the market and buy labor wherever he chooses in any country and import it free from duty, it seems to me that he enjoys the privilege of free trade in what is the most expensiv article he has to buy—that is, labor. But the laborer cannot buy even the necessaries of life—not even the articles he helps to manufacture—unless he pays a high tariff upon them. In that case, I do not see that the laborer is protected at all.

Protection is class legislation in the interest of certain persons engaged in certain kinds of business, and not in the interest of the whole people, as all class legislation is an injury to the whole people.

You might as well say, make a man a millionaire and he will be able to do a great deal of good with his money by employing so much more labor. But don't you see that it takes the hard earnings of thousands of laborers to make one millionaire to begin with, and then he must hav all the benefits of protection, so that he can afford to employ labor, and the laborer must bless him because he givs him a chance to earn a mere subsistence to barely liv?

I was well pleased with the article by the man from Canada. I hav forgotten his name. But in the same paper I saw what was reported as said by Colonel Ingersoll to a reporter on the subject of protection.

He said we must hav protection for the interest of labor, or words to that effect, and I was sorry to see that he had not any clearer conception of that question, after reading his controversies with Field and Gladstone, and to see how grandly and magnificently his arguments and logic entirely demolished his opponents.

And then he comes down to the cry of the politician: "Protection for labor!" The politicians, every campaign, are so wonderfully interested in the laboring classes!

I do hope the the laborers themselvs will study this question for themselvs, and not be led by political demagogs any longer, but think for themselvs earnestly and strongly, and act with manly courage in casting their vote for their own interest. A. B. Severance.

Vineland, N. J., Aug. 28, 1888.

Mr. Editor: "Passiv resistance." Very well, but it must be of an order that has vital significance and results. Progressiv sentiment must take certain action or it is a dead letter. Even if written and circulated, practical change must accompany to effect aught against activ aggression. Mere demand may aid tyranny by revealing the weakness of victims who knowingly but listlessly suffer wrong. Passiv resistance is the true method, and should be ever watchful, instilling, and moving—not delaying till great advantage is gained. Delay is recklessness that admits minor slaveries, till atrocities invite revolutions. Applied to present wants of this country, to inflictions on laboring majorities, and on seekers for constitutional and natal liberties, passiv resistance means just inculcations accompanied by deeds corresponding with the whole people's needs. It means the doing of what has been neglected—the educating of the masses in what their real needs are; what they now do that sustains tyrannies, and what human rights and sound characters require to be done. In other words, in what speculating and sectarian interests hav entailed upon them and must be discarded and what true customs should be adopted instead. Not only the views of sordid compacts, but usages sustaining the system, must be shown to be false, and the wholesome aspiration to abandon them and institute the health-reviving and truth-supporting habits must be practical features of the education. National prosperity under insidious manipulations fostered vain opinions of reputation, which laid a basis for cowardice that could not face ridicule and scandal, which had become the inquisitor's rack, and courage to enact convictions failed. Traits characterizing free men and women of a hundred years ago withered to the status of invalids and slaves, or took the warped opposit of knaves of all grades, tyrants in all lines. Under auspices like these the reformation of oppressors must needs come through the uplifting of the oppressed and abated service. This necessitates much judicious labor, but it is the humane work the whole world calls for. It will be done for all nations when done for our own, and naught else can save from darkest doom. Past neglect of privileges, indifference to evident treachery, to declining principle and enfeebled freedom, hav evidently precipitated this overwork that work in due season would hav obviated. It will now avert, if aught can, a sanguin struggle and a series of agonizing ages. It will direct toilers to prosperous pursuits and giv women understanding of themselvs. Are those having wealth who know these wants prepared to wisely choose between lending portions to the most needed purposes and having it robbed by the craft of greedy despots? Are teachers for these wide lazar-fields of delusion prepared for the call to dot them with lyceums that will thrill with real life and hope the thoughtless dupes of superstition and vanity? Liberal thinkers must be aware that while the usages of false systems are conserved their aims are answered, the vassalage of the many secured, and liberty but a sound without leverage.

Foolhardy daring on one hand is complemented by helplessness on the other that cannot change a beaten course without direction by firm instructors. There is much in common society, in manners, fancies, fashions, and appetites, that are almost as stupefying and injurious as the strongest stimulants. These well explained, with encouragement for sustainment in right, in view of the dangers ever lurking in falseness, now seen in general disasters, and people will enlist with earnest heed. When good work makes inroads on yielding ground, and government becomes less crazed and corrupt, public funds will be furnished, but events do not admit of waiting—we are too near being captured by monstrous combinations. Small beginnings in counteracting evils may grow to triumphant powers. A revolution of arms would but destroy men and means, leaving survivors as ignorant and more helpless, with all the educating and self-governing ability to acquire afterward. Since in any state of national peace or strife, the empowering by knowledge with the rich of the poor, the folly-dazed and craft-betrayed population, is the momentous consideration of a just and stable nation, there is more than double inducement in saving for good uses, noble achievements, and world-wide progress in scientific truth this peerlessly beautiful and productiv country and its as peerless people. To do otherwise is yielding a continent to unscrupulous ravages, a hemisphere to inushering pestilence. History furnishes abundant examples of the cruel nature of bigotry and hypocrisy, also of corrupting tendencies of great wealth in sordid hands, through ambition, vanity, and excessiv luxury ever engendering opposit extremes of penury, misery, and ultimate general calamity. These warning blights hav long been visible in modern ages, still men of large capacities tread the despots' mills for shares of gain, unsound position, and unworthy fame, compelling labor to accept the offered task and wage, and sanctioning old conspiracies against women's freedom in all things, save the freedom to accept some open services. And women, though grown to artists and thinkers, are so stifled by wily appeals for popular reputation and morbid desires for artificial prettiness, that they acquiesce in sinister measures and savage demands, even to pledging their persons for life to legal masters' dictates; to deforming, trammeling, and diseasing their bodies by unnatural fashions, urged by mercantil avarice and sensuous cravings. This derangement of the functions of motherhood conserves oppression by heredity, by culture, and example, yet an age in which science has influence, and sanitary laws hav advocacy, has no reasonable apology for subjecting further generations to barbarous customs and their slavish results. Integral education for both sexes, old and young, in my judgment, and not mine alone, must balance the scales of normal life ere human equity has a basis. While there are many free minds, many sterling lovers of justice, and large surplus treasures in the land, such culture should and might be put in permanent operation.

Scholars, physicians, thinkers, authors, editors, teachers, and well-wishers, can you reason on these conditions when false life and fatal schemes are merging into chaos, and still work oppression's machinery, still sleep over its abyss?

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Child's Hymn.

SIX HUNDRED YEARS OLD.

Guard, my child, thy tongue,
That it speak no wrong!
Let no evil word pass o'er it;
Set the watch of truth before it;
That it speak no wrong.
Guard, my child, thy tongue.

Guard, my child, thine eyes;
Prying is not wise;
Let them look on what is right;
From all evil turn their sight;
Prying is not wise.
Guard, my child, thine eyes.

Guard, my child, thine ear;
Wicked words will sear;
Let no evil word come in
That may cause the soul to sin,
Wicked words will sear;
Guard, my child, thine ear.

Ear, and eye, and tongue,
Guard while thou art young;
For, alas! these busy three
Can unruly members be!
Guard, while thou art young,
Ear, and eye, and tongue.

Birds and Boys.

Down in the meadow the little brown thrushes
Build them a nest in the barberry bushes;
And when it is finished all cosy and neat,
Three speckled eggs make their pleasure complete.
"Twit-ter-ee twitter!" they chirp to each other,
"Building a nest is no end of bother;
But oh, when our dear little birdies we see,
How happy we'll be! How happy we'll be!"

Up at the cottage where children are growing,
The young mother patiently sits at her sewing.
It's something to work for small hobbledehoys
That will tear their trousers and make such a noise;
"And one must admit," says the dear little mother,
"That bringing up boys is no end of a bother;
But oh, when they kiss me, and climb on my knee,
It's sweetness for me! It's sweetness for me!"

On Circulation.

As seen by aid of the microscope, human blood is composed of two parts—the "plasma," which is a white fluid containing the nutritiv material, and the "corpuscles," which are somewhat the shape of little pearl buttons, but are so wonderfully small that it would take fourteen thousand one on top of the other to stand an inch high. These corpuscles giv the blood its red color. They differ in different animals, which fact has often proved very important in trials for murder.

The canals through which the blood passes are called, as a whole, blood-vessels; they are, however, divided into two classes—"arteries," which carry the pure blood, which is of a bright-red color—and "veins," which contain the impure blood, which is dull blue or purple, after the good part has all been given up and it has absorbed all the waste matter in its journey through the body.

When a wound is made so that it causes blood to flow, it is noticed that in a short time it begins to "coagulate—" that is, to become half solid. This is a most important property, and it solidifies much more rapidly in the lower animals, and in birds almost immediately on exposure to the air, which is one of those most wise provisions of nature.

The arteries are, of course, better protected than the veins; but in case of a serious injury to any blood-vessel, it is important to know how the flow of blood may be checked. As the arterial blood flows from the heart, the pressure should be made above the wound—that is, between it and the heart. In case of a vein, apply the pressure below the wound. The arterial blood does not flow evenly, but flows with every heart-beat, while the venous blood is sluggish and steady.

While we liv, the blood is in constant motion, flowing, with the heart as a center, over the entire body, excepting such parts as the hair and nails.

From this circular movement it is called the circulation of the blood, the true theory having been given to the world in 1619, by William Harvey, the great English surgeon.

The heart, which is the "forcing engin," is but little larger than a man's fist; it is in the chest, slightly to the left of the breast-bone. It is hollow and contains four cells—two "auricles" at the base and two "ventricles" at the point. Each auricle connects with the ventricle next it, but between cells of the same kind is no connection. The muscles of the heart are involuntary—that is, they are not governed by the will. Its movements consist of contractions and expansions, the expansions being the time the heart rests—one-third of a second at a time, which in twenty-four hours amounts to nine hours of repose. This organ retains life longer than any other part of the body. In cold-blooded animals its wonderful power is more remarkable, the blood of a turtle having been known to circulate for several days after the head had been cut off.

And now let us follow the blood in its journey through the body.

The impure blood returns by the veins to the right auricle, which it enters as that cavity expands. It contracts again almost instantly and sends the blood to the right ventricle. As this contracts the blood rushes on to the lungs, where it is purified by coming in contact with the oxygen we hav breathed, and then it is hurried to the left auricle and again to the left ventricle, and, pure and bright, once more it goes forth to nourish the different tissues of the body and in less than half a minute has returned to the lungs.

And now, to think of it, what a grand and wonderful study is Physiology, the study of our material selvs.

Ralph Waldo Emerson must hav realized the whole truth when he said, "The human body is the magazine of all inventions—the patent office where are all the models from which every hint was taken."

LAURA PRICE STEWART.

George Washington's Youth.

George Washington was born in Westmoreland county, Va., on the Potomac river, Feb. 22, 1732. His father was a planter, and he died when George was about ten years old. George's mother, a woman of ability and intelligence, taught him his first lessons. He went to several common schools, but was never sent to college. George was very bashful and hesitating in his speech, but his language was clear and manly. His favorit amusements were military and athletic sports, and he also delighted in horsemanship. He was a lad of superior physical strength and fine build, and was hard to beat in athletic exercises. He was a lad of good moral character, truthful, honorable, and intelligent, and his youthful examples are worthy of imitation by all young folks of this and future generations. G. JACOB REMSBURG.

Correspondence.

DENVER, COL.

DEAR MISS WIXON: You see I am much interested in the study of physiology, this being the third article I hav written in that line.

I hope there are no mistakes. But if there are, I shall be glad to hav them corrected by you or the readers of the Corner.

Your friend, LAURA PRICE STEWART.

COAL CREEK, TENN., Sept. 1, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I now will write to you, after so long a time. We hav two boarders. I am going to start to school. We hav moved up to a place. They are talking about naming it Carbondale, Tenn. I like the name. Our town is building up fast. They argue very much about Infidelity. I like to liv here. We liv between two stores, where everything is handy to us. I was glad to see my letter in the paper. I would like to see this one too. There are three stores in this town. So I will close.

Yours truly, CLARA LEINART.

GRANTFORK, ILL., Aug. 31, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I would like to call the attention of the readers of the Children's Corner to the letter of Father Hacker in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 25, 1888, on page 533. I think any boy or girl that can afford it ought to send for a volume or two and try to get others to take a volume or more. Even those that hav contributed to the J. Hacker Fund ought to respond to his call again, for it would not be throwing money away. So let all of us help the general again (for he was a general in battling against superstition and the church). I hav sent for two volumes.

Hoping I hav not taken too much space away from the Children's Corner, I remain,

Your Infidel friend, NICHOLAS J. KRAFT.

DECATUR CITY, IA., Aug. 22, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I havn't written to the Children's Corner for some time, so I thought I would write a letter, if you hav room for it. We had a holiness camp-meeting here, and they got only two converts, and one of them was an old woman that had fits, and the other one was an old maid and didn't hav very much sense. The preacher said he was a prophet, and said if the people didn't come and be saved that something terrible would happen to them. But nothing ever came of it, only a wind storm, that blew all of the tents down, and the preacher and crew got wet. I was very much interested in your piece about the polliwigs, and I want to know if you wouldn't tell me how wiggletails get in rain water. I hav my playhouse in our tent, and I hav lots of fun in it.

Yours truly, MAUD PARRISH.

Truth Stranger than Fiction.

Twenty-five years ago a boy went for a pint of milk. He hid the can beneath a stone, directed his course to the nearest wharf, shipped as a cabin-boy, and went to sea. Years went by and he was given up for dead. But he wasn't dead; he was amassing vast wealth—a common thing, by the way, with sailors. The other day he returned, found the can where he hid it, procured a pint of milk, and going to his boyhood's home entered and said:

"Father and mother, here's your milk."

He was given a warm welcome, but he noticed that there was a change in his parents' appearance; they had not the old, familiar look. He questioned them and explanations followed, through which, though they were still his parents, the change in their appearance was accounted for. Shortly after his departure from home his father died and his mother married again, then his mother died and his new father married again. Thus on his return he found the old home as he left it, the only difference being that he had a new father and mother. Verily, truth is stranger than fiction.—Courier.

What the Little Ones are Saying.

Little Philip fell down stairs one day and injured his face so seriously that for a long time he could not speak. When he did open his lips, however, it was to no complaint of pain. Looking up at his mother, he whispered, trying to smile:

"I'm pretty glad 'twasn't my little sister!"

TOO MUCH SWEETNESS.—How easily bitterness may be produced by too much sweetness was illustrated the other day by a car incident. One little girl about five years old leaned over the back of the seat in front and whispered in the ear of a small boy, "I love you." Having no reply, she again said: "I love you."

"Yes," said the boy, "but don't say that again."

"I will," was the determined answer of the girl.

"You won't!" replied the boy with equal determination, and thereupon began a fast and furious quarrel which lasted until the girl was borne away by her nurse, her voice sounding shrilly down the car aisle, "I love you, I love you, I love you," over and over again.—Boston Journal.

A HANDSOME PROFIT.—Aunt Emily: "Why do you think you will be a doctor, Bobby, when you grow up?" "Because I swallowed a ten-cent piece the other day, and the doctor charged pa $2 for curing me. That's a good business."

A child of seven or eight said that when the Bible speaks of "children's children" it must mean dolls.

Minister: "And do you like to go to church with your papa and mamma, Bobby?" Bobby (inclined to be non-committal): "Well, I guess I like it as well as pa does."

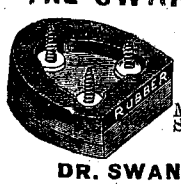
FAITH OR AGNOSTICISM?

—o—



Two Letters from Dr. Field, D.D., editor of the Presbyterian Evangelist, to Colonel Ingersoll, and two Replies thereto. Dr. Field is one of the exceedingly few Christians who hav opposed Colonel Ingersoll kindly and courteously, and the Great Agnostic has used him accordingly. Dr. Field's arguments, however, are broken in pieces.

WANTED.

A genial Infidel of ability and education, twenty-six years old, who has been confined indoors by shop-work and study, wants to get a place to work at herding on horseback or some outdoor life. Compensation not so much an object as to gain an extra fund of physical power preparatory to entering the lecture field in a year or so. Will not some Liberal offer me a chance? Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

Religious Problems,

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

Poetry.

Courtlandt Palmer.

From Freethought.

When shall we know the life within our life—
The heart that makes us hope and dream and toil,
Though sorrow crushes and death gives no sign
Above the marble stillness of its face?
Why is it that we cannot be shut in
To narrow walls, however poor we be,
But still must pierce beyond the seas of light
And summer skies, and claim them for our own?

Will it be ever solved what life may be,
Though one might circle the eternal round
And pass the gates of death a thousand times
To higher, brighter, and diviner spheres?
Would one then pass all sorrow and all pain?
Would not the shadows be as deep as now,
And grief as terrible, and love as sad?

Such thoughts crowd o'er me when the sudden pall
Of thy heart's silence doth make blind the sight.
Life is more great than ever in thy death;
The rushing tide grows still—a mirror vast,
Wherein the majesty of time appears
Like crystal sky within a crystal sea,
When not a breath is on the boundless deep.
A moment I must pause, and let the past
Make sweet the present with unquestioned joy.
More than a name thou art, dear friend;
A beautiful and noble spirit thou,
Bright, delicate, like Shelley's glorious soul,
And shining with the ardor of his mind.
Like him thou wast to me an impulse, mild,
Beneficent, with youth's sublime romance,
And manhood's power, and thought's far-reaching flame.
In mine own struggle did I find thee brave;
Midst varying fortune ever still the same,
Thy word a summons and thy hand a help.

Knight of the people, in the people's cause
Is thy true claim to honor and renown.
With thee no bounds were set; no narrow creed
Of wealth or fashion marred thy soldier's grace.
The toiler was thy comrade; earnest hand
And earnest brain were royal in thy choice;
The chivalry of labor was thy pride,
The reign of freedom thy most loyal wish.

O blessed friend, and art thou dead to these?
Thou canst not be, but living unto all
The beautiful, the noble, the sublime.
I greet thee still in hope's immortal realm.
Thou art not fallen in the flush of life,
Like flower cut off and never more to bloom
And make the summer's air a sweet delight.
Thou art an inspiration now, a star
In the bright firmament of time's elect.
From mortal to immortal thou hast passed
In the clear purpose of thy noble life.
Thou hast become a part of that great world
Wherein all love is centered and all hope—
The world sublime above life's restless sea,
Where genius triumphs, and the glorious throng
Of human virtues make the heaven we seek.

Liv on, brave spirit, in our hearts' deep throb;
Liv in our hope, our virtue, and our toil;
Liv in our dreams of happier life for man;
Liv in our consecration to the truth.
Thy stream runs to the ocean vast and bright,
And makes the ocean a more glorious world
Of symphonies magnificent. Life's frailties drop
From thy exultant and heroic course.
Thou hast burst forth to death's white, radiant crown;
In tears we see thy perfect grace of life,
That could not be except through sorrow's gaze.

Our task is nobler for thy golden sheaf;
Our harvest gladder for thy presence still.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Courtlandt Palmer.

"Let one song be a pean of triumph."

O tender, brave, and faithful soul,
Above whose bark the waters roll—
The Silent Sea—
Yours is the good man's gentle fame,
In grateful hearts to write a name
Immortally.

O hero in the soul's deep war,
Of superstition conqueror,
Your fear was slain;
No more the cark and care of life,
No more confusion, no more strife,
And no more pain.

. . . . . .

Weep not the tear, withhold the sigh,
As brave as this how sweet to die,
So wisely calm;
It cometh swiftly to us all—
To close the act the curtains fall—
And death is balm.

Quenched is the corse's funeral flame,
All quenchless burns the living name
We read and bless;
Enshrined within the people's heart,
His fadeless, deathless, better part
We still possess.

We leave him where his field was won,
In dreamless sleep of duty done
(Wreathe asphodel);
He is relieved, and he may sleep,
But ours is still a watch to keep—
Comrade, farewell!

J. WM. LLOYD, in Liberty.

Walk, —— You, Walk!

Up the dusty way from "Frisco" town,
To where the mines their treasure hide,
The road is long, and many miles
The golden store and town divide.

Along this road one summer day
There toiled a tired man;
Begrimed with dust, the weary way
He cussed as some folks can.

Our traveler hailed a passing team
That slowly dragged its load along
His hail roused up the teamster old
And checked his jolly song.

"Say, stranger!"
"Wal'? whoa!"

"Kin I walk
Behind yer load
A spell on this road?"

"Wal', no, ye can't walk;
But get up on this seat,
An' we'll jest talk.
Git up, hyar!"

"That ain't wot I want;
I ain't thet kind;
Fer 't is on behind,
Right in yer dust,
Thet's like a smudge,
I want to trudge,
Fur I desarve it."

"Well, pard, I ain't no hog;
I don't own this road 'afore nor 'hind,
So jest get right in the dirt an' walk,
Ef thet's the way yer 'clined!

"Yeh hup! gelang!" the driver said;
The creaking wagon moved amain;
While, close behind, the stranger toiled,
And clouds of dust rose up again.

The teamster heard the stranger talk,
As if two trudged behind his van;
Yet, looking 'round, could only spy
A single, lonely man.

Yet heard the teamster words like these
Come out the dust, as from a cloud;
For the weary footman spoke his mind,
His thoughts he uttered loud.

And this the burden of his talk:
"Walk, now, —— you, walk!
No use to talk.
Don't like it, eh?
Not the way
Ye went at 'Frisco?'
Walk, —— you, walk!

"Went up in the mines
And made yer stake;
'Nough to take
Ye back to ther state
Whar ye wuz born.
Whar, now, is yer corn?
Walk, —— you, walk!

"Dust in yer eyes,
Dust in yer nose,
Dust down yer throat
An' thick on yer close;
Can't hardly talk.
I know it; but you jest
Walk, —— you, walk!

"Wot did ye dew with yer tin?
Oh, blew every ounce of it in!
Got drunk, got sober; got drunk ag'in.
Wal', walk, —— you, walk!

"Wot did ye dew? Wal', I swar,
When ye wuz down thar,
Tell me wot ye didn't dew?
Yer gold dust flew;
You thought it fine
Fer ter keep op'nin' wine.
Now, walk, —— you, walk!

"Everyone wuz yer friend,
When ye had dust fer ter lend
An' coin fer ter spend;
Didn't think of the end;
Tried to 'buck a queer game'—
Nary a red, now, to yer name.
Wal', walk, —— you, walk!

"Had a cool forty thousand or so.
Now, wot yer got ter show
Fer all thet?
Not a cussed red cent.
You let her went—
Nuthin' too good
Fer yer youthful blood.
Now, walk, —— you, walk!

"Chokes ye, this dust?
Wal', that ain't the wust—
When ye git thar
Whar the diggin's are,
No pick, no shovel, no pan!
Wal', yer a healthy man—
Jest walk, —— you, walk!

"Wish ye could stop to drink—
What—water? Wal'! jest think
How at 'Frisco'—wal', water thar
With ye wa'n't anywhar—
It wuz wine—'Extra Dry.'
Oh, you flew high!
Now, walk, —— you, walk!

"Ye say ye've 'sunthin' larned.'
Wal', I'll be darned!
Hearn ye say thet afore;
Yet ye tried—jest wunct more."
'Wal', thet's so; but this is the last!
I'm done! Jig's up! All's past!'
Ye hear me talk?
Walk, —— you, walk!

"'I've swore off.' Guess yer late.
"No more on my plate.
Ef I ag'in git my DILE—
Wal', I should smile!—
Let me ag'in salt her down;
I'll go 'roun' that 'Frisco' town
If I walk;
Yes, —— me, walk!"

MORAL.

The fools don't all go to "Frisco" town;
Nor do they all from the mines come down.
About all of us hav, in our day,
In some sort of shape, some kind of way,
Painted the town with the "old stuff;"
Dipped in stocks, or made some bluff;
Got caught in wedlock by a shrew;
Mixed wines, old and new;
Seen the sights, been out all night,
Rolled home in the morning light,
With crumpled tie and torn clawhammer;
Waked up next day with a "Katzenjammer"—
Then walked, ——! how we walked!

Now, don't try to yank every bun:
Don't try to hav all the fun;
Don't think you know it all;
Don't know that stocks will fall;
Don't try to bluff on an ace;
Don't know the horse in the race;
Don't get scooped by a pretty face;
Lest, when you awake,
You may talk,
And the burden be:
"Walk, —— you, walk!"

—Elok in Puck.

A Late Obituary.

DIED.—May 2, 1888, Barnabas Smith, of paralysis, at the home of his daughter, Mrs. J. N. Amsden, near Lupton, Weld county, Col., aged seventy-six years.

The subject of this sketch was born at Earnestown, Lower Canada, in 1812, and was the eldest son of Rev. Joseph H. Smith, a minister of the Methodist denomination, and whose ancestry is traced back to the settlement of Windsor, Conn., in 1630. Mr. Smith was a man of more than ordinary ability and of marked characteristics, being remarkably well read and much of a philosopher, as the character and extent of his library, before he scattered it during his later years, attested, and he was very outspoken in the promulgation of his opinions.

In 1820 Mr. Smith's father moved to the region of Detroit, Mich., and in 1833 Barnabas was married to Miss Anna Cornwall, at Maspeth, Ont., and in 1840 they moved to Boone county, Ill., where he lived for many years.

When slavery was the absorbing subject before the American people Mr. Smith was in the prime of manhood, and he devoted much time and talent to the cause of the enslaved black man. His voice was heard from the platform, and his pen did manly service, by means of the press of the country, against the institution of slavery.

He was among the most prominent of the few Abolitionists of that part of the state, and the writer of this imperfect sketch, as a mere boy, often listened to him as he championed the cause of the oppressed race, and as a hero who worked and talked for liberty, and for this work has ever revered him.

In 1857 Mr. Smith moved to Minnesota, and in 1860 to Cuba, Mo. This was a hot place for him at this time, and the rebel element repeatedly notified him to leave, but he was not the leaving kind of man.

Once they came for him while he was away from home, but one of his boys received them so well that one of their number was left dead.

While in Missouri Mr. Smith was, for two years, collector of internal revenue for the second district of the state.

In 1872 Mr. Smith came to Colorado, and moved here in 1873 at the head of a mining company he had organized. This scheme was not a success, and this same year our friend was stricken with paralysis; but his iron constitution withstood the disease for nearly fifteen years.

In religious belief Mr. Smith was an outspoken Infidel of the Spiritualistic stamp. At the age of fifteen years he joined the Methodist church, and when, ten years later, his father left them and joined another denomination, young Barnabas undertook to convince him of his error. He was himself convinced, and, like an honest man, joined the other sect. Soon after the advent of Spiritualism he investigated the phenomena, and soon became a convert to the same, in which belief he remained steadfast to the end.

When D. M. Bennett became the object of persecution, Mr. Shaw was his firm friend, and he invested all the little means at his command in Mr. Bennett's publications and traveled about and sold them, and obtained many subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. This he did after disease had nearly deprived him of speech.

It was his regret for some years past that he could do no more for Liberalism. A source of much enjoyment to him was to hav THE TRUTH SEEKER read to him. His mind seemed to remain clear, even when disease was far advanced. Our friend was a scrupulously honest and fair-dealing man, and of an exceedingly generous and hospitable nature. All in all, he was one who contributed toward making the world better than he found it.

His companion for so many years still livs, at the age of seventy-eight years, beloved by all for her many virtues as well as intelligence. She also was a firm Liberal.

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

Gems of Thought.

VIRTUE owns a more eternal foe
Than force or fraud: old Custom, legal Crime,
And bloody Faith, the foulest birth of time.
—Shelley.

IT is on opinion only that government is founded; and this maxim extends to the most despotic and most military governments, as well as to the most free and most popular.—Hume.

AN idle reason lessens the weight of the good one you gave before.—Swift.

SLAVERY, its perpetuation and crimes, are an eternal blot upon the Christian church of America.—D. M Bennett.

I CANNOT get rid of the idea that the Christian creed will yet be traced to a Buddhistic source.—Schopenhauer.

MEN who are singularly shrewd and hard to impose upon in their own line of things, are often the most weak and credulous in everything else.—Herron.

Is it the arm of God which has carried the sword into your cities, and fire into your fields, which has slaughtered the people, burnt the harvests, rooted up trees, and ravaged the pastures, or is it the hand of man? Does sanctity consist in destruction?—Volney.

THE preservation of health is at least not less important than the preservation of Hebrew mythology; and communities who force their children to sacrifice a large portion of their time to the study of Asiatic miracle-legends might well permit them to devote an occasional hour or two to the study of modern physiology.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in The Bible of Nature.

THE Christian divines declared geology "not a subject of lawful inquiry," denouncing it as a "dark art," as "dangerous and disreputable," as "a forbidden province," as "infernal artillery," and as an "awful evasion of the testimony of revelation."—The Warfare of Science, by Professor A. D. White, president of Cornell University.

ATTEMPTS hav been repeatedly made to reconcile the revealed with the discovered facts, but they hav proved to be unsatisfactory. The Mosaic time is too short, the order of creation incorrect, the divine interventions too anthropomorphic.—Professor Draper, LL.D. (University of New York).

SOME drill and bore
The solid earth, and from the strata there
Extract a register, by which we learn
That he who made it, and revealed its date
To Moses, was mistaken in its age!—Cowper.

ALL orthodox ministers now know that fossil animals—that is, representations of animals in stone, were placed in the rocks on purpose to mislead men like Darwin and Humboldt, Huxley and Tyndall. It is also now known that God, for the purpose of misleading the so-called men of science, had hairy elephants preserved in ice, made stomachs for them, and allowed twigs of trees to be found in these stomachs, when, as a matter of fact, no such elephants ever lived or ever died. These men who are endeavoring to overturn the scriptures with the lever of science will find that they hav been deceived. Through all eternity they will regret their philosophy. They will wish, in the next world, that they had thrown away geology and physiology and all other "ologies" except theology. The time is coming when Jehovah will "mock at their fears and laugh at their calamity."—Ingersoll.

WHAT are theologians good for? A fool after repeating every piece of scholastic nonsense for two years, receives his cap and bells with ceremony, and struts and decides on every subject; and it is this school of Bedlam which leads to honors and riches: what can be said to it? Thomas and Bonaventure hav their altars, and they who hav invented the plow, the saw, and the plane are not even remembered!—Voltaire.

VOLTAIRE was the intellectual autocrat of his time. From his throne at the foot of the Alps he pointed the finger of scorn at every hypocrit in Europe. He left the quiver of ridicule without an arrow. He was the pioneer of his century. He was the assassin of superstition. Through the shadows of faith and fable, through the darkness of myth and miracle, through the midnight of Christianity, through the blackness of bigotry, past cathedral and dungeon, past rack and stake, past altar and throne, he carried, with brave and chivalric hands, the torch of reason.—Ingersoll.

So died the Chevalier de la Barre. He was nineteen years of age. Then, O Voltaire! thou didst utter a cry of horror, and it will be thine eternal glory! Then didst thou enter upon the appalling trial of the past; thou didst plead, against tyrants and monsters, the cause of the human race, and thou didst gain it. Great man, blessed be thou forever!—Hugo.

THE world is upheld by the veracity of good men; they make the earth wholesome. Life is sweet and tolerable only in our belief in such society; and actually, or ideally, we manage to liv with superiors. We call our children and our lands by their names; their works and effigies are in our houses.—Emerson.

THE LORD LOVETH A BEAUTIFUL FRINGE.

Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments, throughout their generations, and that they put upon the fringe of the borders a riband of blue.—Num. xv, 37-38.

When stuck with a rancid old hamn,
Or, when paying for lamb,
To be bilked with old ramb,
I'd cuss if 'twere only by Samn!

"I'M very glad to hav been of any comfort to your poor husband, my good woman. But what made you send for me instead of your own minister?" "Well, sir, it's typhus my poor husband's got, and we dinna think it just reet for our ain minister to run the risk!"

AND now with "reverential calm,"
Vacation past, each reverent sham,
His old dead horse astride,
Doth in the holy places stand,
The bridle firmly in his hand,
Nor knows his horse has died.

MARY: "Don't you dislike to hav a man talk shop when he comes to see you?" Jennie: "Indeed I do! Who's been talking shop to you?" Mary: "Oh, my young man. He's a street-car conductor, you know, and nearly every time he comes to see me he gets off his shop talk." Jennie: "What does he say?" Mary: "Sit closer, please."

SUPERINTENDENT (of bobtail horse-car line): "The driver of No. 75 ran over an old lady to-day, and broke her arm." President: "Well, people ought to be more careful." Superintendent: "And the amount of money in the box indicates that he is careless about fares." President: "Wha-at? Discharge him at once!"

THE CHRISTIAN'S LAST TRUMP.

To prove there is a hell to him
Who does to doubt it dare,
The saint with satisfaction grim
Does always send him there.

Oh, oh, the awful judgment day
When Gabriel shall a solo play—
His strength upon his horn expend
Till eyes bulge out and cheeks distend
(For need his lungs will great inflation,
To send a blast through all creation),
To call the dust and mummies dried
Of all the people who hav died
Since man's innumerable army
Began its march on terra firma.
And since men walked, not only earth,
But countless worlds of older birth,
Adown to time's conclusiv tick,
When nature givs its dying kick,
Unto Jehovah's great white throne,
To be restored to flesh and bone.
There, if no sad mistakes are made,
Each shell receives its former shade.
God's ledger's opened, and the record
Of every soul, however checkered
Has been its course, is ascertained,
As severally all are arraigned
Before the final judgment seat,
Which sweeps the docket's page complete.

No lawyer is allowed about,
For "saving grace" is all played out;
Their faith in Christ the judge does gage,
And if they born were since his age,
And disbelieve he was their savior,
He won't be, even for good behavior,
And with the bad goats they must go
Who Christ's name ne'er before did know,
For ignorance of law helps none,
And they are all lost, every one.

None chance hav now to be enticed
To ramble with the sheep of Christ,
And many scores to one are sent
To suffer endless punishment.
In fine, a mighty mass of souls
God's faithful sheriff soon controls,
Who takes them to his stew-pan vast,
Within which they are quickly cast
To be well cooked, but full done, never,
For they must fry in hell forever.

Brothers and sisters—some in heaven
And some below—are places given;
Parents can hear their children groaning
While they celestial songs are crooning;
Children can see their parents burning
While they the heavenly tunes are learning;
Wives can behold their husbands frying
While they the golden harps are trying;
Husbands can hear their wives' cries ringing
While they the lambkin's praise are singing;
And angels look from bowers of bliss
With joy on the fire-swept abyss.

What nonsense, for sane men to preach,
Make weak men howl and women screech,
Or on the floor roll in a fit,
And wallow in tobacco spit—
An exhibition of human folly
More ridiculous than melancholy,
Which has been witnessed many a time
In this poor saint-infested clime.
Methinks that God and son, when they
The fools innumerable survey
Whose cases they hav called to try,
Will soon adjourn the court sine die,
Concluding that it does not pay
To try such idiots, anyway.

As for this hell your Bible teaches,
And every reverend ninny preaches,
It seems high time that men disclaimed
The thing, or of it were ashamed.
Yet oft we hear the holy "crook,"
With naught of wisdom but his look,
In grum, or solemn long-drawn voice,
As though he a morceau had choice,
Thus speak of satan's principality—
"Hell—is—a—ter—rible reality!"

Bellevive picked up a shovel and struck Tuttle on the head, inflicting injuries from the effects of which the intruder died.

ST. PAUL, Minn., dispatch of the 16th: More than a hundred women and children ran out of the Westminster Presbyterian church this morning yelling at the top of their voices, "Murder! help! police!" There was a great commotion inside, and in five minutes more than a thousand people had gathered about the sacred edifice. A free fight was going on in the church, in which everybody seemed to be taking a hand. Organist Joseph Sayles was pulled backward from his stool by Elder Jefferson, and fists and feet were used with effect by the angry parishioners. Finally the police rushed in and quelled the disturbance. The fight was the culmination of a quarrel between factions in the parish over the immorality of Pastor W. H. Roberts.

GERMAN journalism has just entered on its third century. In 1688 Christian Thomasius, who thought that the exclusiv use of Latin was an impediment to learning, and who wanted to see Germany free from the influence of scholastic pedantry, established at Leipsic a monthly periodical in the German language, in which he showed great skill in dealing with the questions which interested him. Thomasius's monthly lived two years, and was the first journal or periodical printed in the German language.

A DISEASE has been discovered among church-members which has been called "Morbus Sabbaticus," or Sunday sickness. The Presbyterian describes it thus: "It attacks church-members with violence on the Sabbath from 12 to 12 o'clock, and it takes the rest of the day to recuperate, for in no case does it continue until Monday morning. The patient begins to convalesce after the meridian, and about 3 o'clock a stroll is taken, or if his finances will permit, a drive in the park. It is very fatal in large cities. In the country it attacks the horses, and during these same hours they are too sick or stiff for duty, and the pious family that owns them is obliged to stay from church. Like malarial diseases, it observes the law of periodicity, and runs through the scales of sevens. This disease never interferes with either sleep or appetite, but is so regular in its return that many take pills on Sunday and repair themselvs for Monday, as some Christian manufacturers stop their mills piously on Saturday night, but devote Sunday to cleaning their boilers."

Resurrection and Ascension.

Of all the many untruthful, contradictory, and absurd stories in the Bible, this story of the resurrection and ascension, as told by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, is the most preposterous, unreliable, contradictory, and unnatural. Who are Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John? All we know about them is the assertion that they were fishermen. Does the occupation of fishing giv men engaged in it such a character for truth and veracity that we are to take their words when they tell us of the most unnatural, the most improbable, and the most wonderful events that ever happened, without a doubt, or without an if or an and?

The pulpit for ages has preached and taught the false doctrin that these apostles were something more than mortal—superior beings—that it would be almost sacrilegious to doubt or question one word of their alleged writings, be they ever so contradictory or improbable. These false teachings hav been emphasized from the pulpit for nearly eighteen hundred years, until to many they hav become almost a second nature. Now, if we could only divest our minds of this priestly influence and look at these four men as they really were, namely, low, illiterate fishermen, and, as far as we know, without character or standing, and belonging at that day to a nation of people steeped in ignorance and superstition, we could then determin in our own minds the truth or falsity of their alleged writings, unbiased and unprejudiced. To show the savage, ignorant, and barbarous condi tion of the Jewish nation at the time of Jesus, I quote from an ancient historian, Tacitus. He says: "In point of ignorance, superstition, and exclusiv bigotry, they had no equal in the Roman world. As a nation, they could scarcely be said to hav a common language. By some, no doubt, in the neighborhood of the capital, Hebrew was spoken; by others, farther removed from it, Syriac, Arabic, and a language made up of a conformation of all these languages. The means of communication seemed to be almost entirely on foot, and not one in a thousand could read or write; and, indeed, it would be a great chance whether a verbal narration of an event that had happened in one district could be understood in another, or even the same."

This fact alone should be sufficient to convince anyone that the four gospels were not written by Jew fishermen. If we knew they were, and knew the characters of these men for truth were good, such testimony as they furnish in regard to these miracles would not be taken in a court of justice to-day where the small sum of $5 was involved. First, because it is hearsay evidence; second, because on most of the important points they do not corroborate or agree with one another; third, because none of them say they saw either the smallest or the greatest of the events narrated, but on the contrary say they were told these things by others, and they did not believe them themselvs. If such miraculous stories were related to-day by eye-witnesses, and by men that we knew to be credible, very few, if any, would believe them, and among the disbelievers would be many of the intelligent people that believe these fabulous stories of centuries past. And further, it would be well to bear in mind that the Old Testament was written first, and the fact that we are told in the New Testament that such and such things were done, or had to be done, in order to fulfill prophecies in the Old, shows that the writers did or could make these records of events in the New Testament fit into prophecies in the Old.

Profane history informs us that there were many dissolute and bad men at the head of the church when the New Testament was written—supposed to be about the third or fourth century—and also that the people, under the influence of the Catholic church, were becoming grossly ignorant and superstitious, and therefore required a Bible and religion suited to their ignorant and superstitious ideas.

To show how obscure this man Jesus was it is only necessary to mention the fact that, when the officers came to arrest him, he had to be pointed out to them by Judas giving them a sign (Matt. xxvi). On the first sign of danger every one of his disciples forsook him and fled (Matt. xxvi). A pretty lot of disciples truly! Now, here was a case of the blackest ingratitude on the part of these disciples, and cowardly, too, for there seemed to be no danger that these followers of Jesus were in that they need desert him and flee for their lives. This man Jesus had been their leader for three and a half years; had done much for them; had preserved them from shipwreck, and done many other miraculous things for their benefit. They had called him master, and professed great friendship and love for him, and yet scarcely had the officers appeared to arrest their beloved master when everyone, like a cur dog, fled, leaving him to his fate—leaving Jesus to fight his own battles, and to perish ignominiously on the cross between two thieves—and not one of these men that he had done so much for was present to giv him a cup of water to relieve his thirst in his terrible sufferings and agony. Among bands of robbers and banditti we find more gratitude and honor for their leaders than in this case. At the time of the crucifixion we read that there was darkness, and the temple was rent in twain, and graves were opened and the bodies of saints came out and were seen walking in the city. (I always thought that the souls of saints were all in heaven, and I suppose in this case they were, as only the bodies came out of the graves. Consequently the bodies must hav been seen walking in the city without souls.) Now, it is possible that there might hav been a storm just at the time of this execution lasting for two or three hours, making it darker than usual for that length of time, and a flash of lightning may hav rent the temple in twain, but it was real cruel in these writers to tell us that bodies came out of their graves and were walking around the city, and not tell us who saw them, where they went, or what became of them, thereby keeping us all in terrible suspense. Perhaps instead of there being but one Wandering Jew there may be many, and these are all Wandering Jews and are walking unto this day.

The chief priests were afraid the disciples would take the body out of the sepulcher, and no doubt it was done, for notwithstanding that story of the watch taking money for circulating such a report, Matthew says it was generally believed among the Jews of that day; and that is the reasonable and natural explanation of the story. It would seem from this fear of the high priests that these disciples would commit the crime of body-snatching, that they were no more above suspicion of wrong-doing than their pulpit-followers of to-day are.

I quote from Mark xiv, 59, upon the trial of Jesus: "But neither so did their witnesses agree together." As we proceed to review the testimony of these four writers in their relation of these supernatural wonders, let us keep this passage of scripture in mind. Now let us see how these four witnesses agree together.

First. As to the time the sepulcher was found empty: Matthew says it was at the dawn of day. Mark says it was at the rising of the sun. John says it was yet dark.

Second. As to what was seen at the sepulcher: Matthew says there was a great earthquake and an angel descended from heaven and rolled away the stone and sat upon it. Mark says the stone was rolled away, and Luke says the people that went to the sepulcher found the stone rolled away. John also says the stone was rolled away. Neither of the last three writers says a word about earthquakes, or an angel descending, rolling away the stone and sitting upon it. Common every-day occurrences in that day, I suppose, and not worth mentioning.

Third. As to what was seen inside the sepulcher: Matthew says nothing about what was seen inside. Mark says there was a young man sitting on the right-hand side clothed in a long white garment. Luke says two men were there, standing up in long, white, shining garments. John says there were two angels, one sitting at the head and one at the foot of where Jesus lay.

Fourth. As to who was at the sepulcher: Matthew says there were two women, Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary. Mark says there were three, Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James, and Salome. Luke says there were an indefinit number of women, namely, Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James, and other women. John says there were one woman and two men, Mary Magdalene, Peter, and the other disciple.

Now, who told Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John of the resurrection and ascension of this man Jesus? Mary Magdalene and Peter were the sources from which they obtained these wonderful and contradictory stories.

Who was this woman, Mary Magdalene? Mark says she is the woman that Jesus cast seven devils out of a few days before his death. A woman with seven devils in her must hav been a terror in the land, and it is possible that he might hav left one remaining. If so, I suppose he was the one that is said to be the father of lies. Is it any wonder, then, that the apostles did not believe her, and her words seemed to them as idle tales (Mark xvi, 11, and Luke xxiv, 11)? Peter, the other prominent witness in relating these marvelous stories, according to the record in the New Testament was a hypocrit, a perjurer, and an utterer of profane oaths. Jesus was always suspicious of Peter, for he called him Satan, and told him to get behind him, for he savored more of man than of God (Mark viii, 28); and again in Luke xxii, 31: "And the Lord said: Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to hav you, that he may sift you as wheat." I always thought that bit of sarcasm, "Sift you as wheat," uttered by Jesus, was applicable to Peter in this case. This is the man that the church exalts to the highest position and invests with the keys of heaven. This man, whom Jesus said the devil desired to hav that he might sift him as wheat; this man, with hypocritical protestations declaring, "that should all be offended, yet will not I," and, with greater vehemence still, "said he would die before he would deny Jesus"—this is the man that stands at the head of the calendar of saints; and this is the man whose word we are to take of these supernatural and wonderful events. Is it any wonder, then, that Jesus was suspicious of him? And these suspicions are what made Jesus prophesy that Peter would deny him, and happening to think of cock-crowing, he mentioned that as the time, even if there are different times in the night that cocks crow. According to orthodoxy this Saint Peter must be suffering in the place set apart for the wicked, for after declaring he would never deny Jesus, he swore great oaths at divers times, saying, "I know not this man of whom ye speak." How do the two following passages of inspired writings "agree together:"

Matt. xxvii, 5.	Acts i, 18.
And he [Judas] cast down the pieces of silver in the temple, and went and departed and hanged himself.	Now this man [Judas] purchased a field with the reward of his iniquity, and falling headlong, burst asunder in the midst, and his bowels gushed out.

Peter told the story in Acts. Could I humbly ask the clergy which one of these saints uttered such a glaring falsehood? If such a question was propounded to me, I would say: Peter, thou art the man, though I hav my suspicions of both. Only two of the apostles—Mark and Luke—say anything about Jesus going up. The other two deserve credit, at least in this instance, for lacking such elastic consciences. Luke says this upward flight of Jesus took place at Bethany. He does not say a word about anyone being present but the apostles, and for such a wonderful occurrence, givs a very meager account indeed. Perhaps his conscience smote him when he wrote this fiction, for he told it in the least number of words possible, as also did Mark. In those anonymous writings called the Acts some writer says—and from the character the book givs Peter, he is a man whose conscience would not trouble him much in writing any kind of a story—this upward tendency of a human body took place at a lonely place in the country called Olivet, where two men stood by in long, white apparel. This last writer, like Luke, givs no particulars of the modus operandi or manner in which this ascension was made. We read that Elijah took his aerial flight in a chariot propelled by fire and wind-power. There is a similar and much more important occurrence, and we are left entirely in the dark as to particulars. Now, if it had only been known at the time who the men mentioned by the last writer, that stood by in long, white apparel, were, there might hav been considerable information obtained from them in regard to this upheaval.

Strange that men and women that were familiar with the features of Jesus, and only about three days having elapsed since they parted from him, should not recognize him after the resurrection. Mrs., or Miss, Magdalene thought he was the gardener, and no doubt she thought correctly. When his disciples saw him, some doubted. A man should hav been selected with features more closely resembling the man the Jews crucified than the gardener in order to make a complete success of this part of the farce. Mark says Jesus was received up into heaven and sat at the right hand of God. As we hav no account of Mark having a telescope, would it be considered impertinent to ask the preachers how he could see this man sitting at the right hand of God? Perhaps heaven was nearer earth then than it is now, or the men of that day had more powerful vision—I think the latter, for the apostles certainly saw some wonderful things.

Luke says Jesus ascended the same day he arose. John says he did not go up until the eighth day, and in Acts he was seen on earth forty days after the crucifixion. Luke xxiii, 43: Jesus said unto the dying thief, "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise." In this passage these writers not only contradict themselvs, but make Jesus utter a falsehood; for according to Luke he was not with the dying thief in heaven until three days after Jesus said he would be. John says it was eight days afterward. And the Acts makes it forty days from the day Jesus was crucified until he was with the dying thief in paradise.

Jesus says that in the resurrection they are as angels in heaven. If resurrected men are as angels, and angels are spirits, that was not Jesus that appeared to the disciples after the resurrection as described by Luke. This man that was representing Jesus to the disciples says: "Behold my hands and feet; that is I myself; handle me and see. For a spirit hath not flesh and bones as you see I hav." That Jesus then, or the gardener, was not the resurrected Jesus, but a mortal man, for the fact that he ate baked fish and honey proves it, for no spirits like angels in heaven could eat such a mess. I hav asked the pulpits so many questions that I feel like giving them a rest. But I am dying to know whether a resurrected man is a spirit or a man of flesh and blood that eats baked fish and honey and calls for meat.

There must hav been thirteen disciples after Judas hanged himself, then afterward stumbled and fell with such fearful results, for Luke says that two disciples went to a village called Emmaus and Jesus appeared unto them there and they arose up at the same hour and returned to Jerusalem and found the eleven gathered together there. One passage in the New Testament says Jesus was the first to arise. What about Lazarus, whom Jesus himself stood up? It certainly is easier and more convenient for a man to arise that is laid loose in a sepulcher than those that are put in a box and the lid screwed down. In this case of resurrection some one must hav been assigned the duty of furnishing the resurrected party with clothes—as the grave-clothes were found in the sepulcher—for it would be necessary for even a resurrected man that sojourned upon the earth forty days to hav some wearing apparel. Instead of arising on the third day he arose some time during the second night. For further particulars we will hav to inquire of the men that had part of the play assigned to them. The body was put in the sepulcher Saturday night about 6 o'clock. Then the following Monday morning—according to Matthew, at dawn of day; Mark, at the rising of the sun; and John, when it was yet dark—the sepulcher was found empty.

These four apostles in their writings hav reference to but one visit to the sepulcher. That has never been questioned. Then all four relate the time the visit was made, who went there, and what was seen there at this one and the same time only.

Chicago. JOHN IRWIN.

We Are as We Think.

I hav come to the conclusion that all the miseries of mankind, aside from those few caused by nature, are the result of opinion. If we all had knowledge of the truth, our conduct would be in accordance. The masses hav ever been enslaved or outwitted because of wrong views carefully instilled into them by interested persons. In savage society a few superior men combine and terrorize (that accounts for the many cruel practices of savages who are not unkind by nature). In semi-civilized society these few dominate by force and cunning; in enlightened, by cunning mostly. As to the masses, half of whom are women and the remainder children and feeble men, they hav nothing to say under any form of government ever devised.

Wrong opinions are instilled, and customs based on such views, or institutions, grow up and become stronger than the people. It then becomes a mighty task to reform, and, indeed, those who try to instil the right ideas are looked on as wretches, and persecuted horribly. All human sympathy is withdrawn; they are mocked and maltreated even on the scaffold, where the vilest murderers and human tigers hav kind and tender consideration; they are reviled; they are stabbed; gall is given them to drink, and their last dying words are choked by the rope. There is no demon raging from the burning gates of hell so relentless as the tyrant when questioned of his rights. Let us not be mistaken and deceived. Ladies and gentlemen would to-day, as they did a few years ago at Valadolid, Spain, travel hundreds of miles to see offenders against authority burnt to death, and Charles Dickens wrote the literal truth when he said that here in the United States it was infinitly safer to slowly roast a man to death in the public streets than it would be to teach him his letters. Questioned authority is a heartless devil, and always has hordes of servants to obey its dictates and curry its favor. But nowhere could tyranny hav such a hold over mankind were it not for error of opinion in the masses. Never was a monarch more absolute than the French king when he could declare: "The state! I am the state." Nobody seemed to doubt it. Opinion changed slowly and quietly, but almost unanimously. Then, at the first attempt of the monarch in name to assert power—alas, poor king! He found none poor enough to do him reverence.

Opinion made such monstrous revolution, the very hirelings of the throne fraternizing with the sans-culottes. To be No breeches—Tog-rag—was far more honorable than to be my lord duke and infinitly safer. The epaulet was exchanged for a patch—all fashion—merely a matter of opinion.

Wealth itself is merely a creation of opinion. Nothing could make a people who hav no wants whatever any richer than they are. There is no wealth except commodities—creations of the labor of man, or of his care and risk. Money is only the representativ of those forms of wealth, and except as a convenience of very little importance. Compared with many commodities it is of no importance to mankind. The opinion that money is anything of intrinsic value is one of these errors of mankind that, like many others, has led to fatal evil. So long as it prevails man will be more or less a slave. Had all men the correct idea of money some very great changes would come over the face of human affairs, unless some other species of idolatry should take the place of the present. Even some of the greatest writers on the subject, who hav perfectly "orthodox views," admit that money bears to the ideal transaction of an exchange the same relation that the exchange itself bears—the latter being a physical act, but incomplete because it requires something to perfect it. All admit that money is merely an instrument to facilitate the exchange of commodities. Had every transaction from the beginning of the world been equal, money had never been thought of. It is an invention made to square uneven trades, and all the business of life is merely the exchange of commodities when you reduce it to the last analysis. Labor may exchange for labor, but the basis is commodities in the ultimate. It is as though some transaction was had—some trade of things—all perfected, but lacking something whereby to move the things. Money does ideally what the power to move does physically. Money is then merely an instrumentality used for convenience in squaring exchanges. How comes it then that this thing, this mere tool, this invention of man, has become ascendent lord? Simply because we hav been taught that money is a thing of intrinsic value. A sends a cargo worth $100,000 to B, at Liverpool. B, having credit at A's place, sends a draft, which draft A turns over to C, who has sent him a cargo; C in turn delivers the draft to D, whom he owes. And this is all money can ever do—square trades or exchanges. In the great trades of the world money is hardly ever seen. Small change is used in the petty transactions. I buy some tobacco and sugar, etc., and pay the merchant $1. But I got the dollar for some commodity or my labor.

I believe that the best study for the people is this money and trade question. Commerce is nothing but exchange of commodity. The United States is constantly exchanging farm products for manufactures of various kinds. Each farmer sells his surplus for cash, but the result is that the aggregate surplus of all finds its way to England or France, and other lands. So with the cargoes brought here from other countries. If by reason of any law our surplus is discouraged from leaving here, its price must fall till it is so very low that empty ships can afford to come here to buy. But such a case will rarely occur. This may be dull reading for some people, but if we do not get to understand such questions we shall become little better than poor slaves of designing classes.

To come back to the point where I began, we must get correct opinions. All the constitutions and statutes and institutions in the world cannot prevent an ignorant people, or, what is worse, a wrongly opinioned people, from becoming little better than slaves. How shall we know we are right when we see so many people divided in opinion? Use your common sense, guided by the grand doctrin: Liberty, equality, fraternity. Anything that givs a few men advantages over all; any law favoring a few at the expense of all; any law that requires thousands of spies to enforce it, and givs a few the opportunity to annoy and prosecute others on trifling charges; any law that increases what courts call mala prohibita—all such are unworthy of a free people, and contrary to liberty, equality, fraternity. Miseducation is worse than no education. Books, newspapers, and schoolhouses will not save us if the great masses are constantly taught to be narrow and il-Liberal, and to hate those who think differently from them. HOLT.

Fairness and Generosity.

It is natural for us all to wish to defend ourselvs when misrepresented, and as McArthur commences his "Promis of Proof" by misrepresenting or misunderstanding me, I "rise to explain." First I wish to say that, born of a race of preachers and schoolteachers, and having been myself a Yankee schoolmarm for fourteen years, off and on, I hav become, by inheritance and environment, rather dogmatic and dictatorial in speech, despite all my efforts to the contrary.

While feeling kind and tolerant, I speak more positivly than I should do.

But I qualified the word "impossible" by the prefix "almost," and therefore the strictures of our friend upon it are out of place, so far as my use of it is concerned, while he himself uses its equivalent when he says, "There was no possibility" of deceit.

This very impossibility is just what so many were certain of when witnessing the phenomena at Liberal, Mo., which Dr. Bouton has confessed were all deceit, proving it by explaining how they were done.

And again, in quoting the rhymes "Convinced against his will," as having my indorsement, McArthur neglects to say that in the first sentence after repeating them, I controverted the old couplet and made it null and void, by saying that so long as he was of the "same opinion" he was not converted at all!

I cannot possibly believe that a coat or vest can be dematerialized into atoms so as to be removed from a medium, and then come together again fiber to fiber, even to a knot in the thread it is made up with!

You may cut a globule of mercury all to pieces and the fragments will unite again, into apparently the same identical ball, but the particles never will take their same old places, as do those in the coats and vests!

If the "distance from here to the sun" were disputed, denied, and debated over as are the main points of Spiritualism, "bias, heredity, and other influences" would no doubt come therein as factors of belief or unbelief. "'Antichrist' in his antiquarian researches" tells us nothing so improbable as that the dead still liv, and write between screwed together slates, and appear to us in their real forms as living flesh and blood palpable to our senses. No one loves "harmony" better than I do, and few would do more to promote it; but would it be right in me to keep back my honest opinion, and especially when letters pour in upon me on all sides asking for it?

Why can we not giv our arguments pro and con in perfect good humor?

I hav no feeling of hardness towards any Spiritists, but claim them all as Liberals. I hav taken from one to five Spiritual papers for twenty-five or more years, and read and circulated them all—does this look as though I meant war or peace, disunion or union?

I think McArthur's experience with George will be similar to Mr. Lacy's with me. At first Lacy was sure he could point me to a plenty of genuin slate-writing mediums, but when he commenced looking in earnest among such as he knew, they narrowed down to one, and he was so habituated to drunkenness he would not recommend him, but proposed that himself and others interested should help pay my way to New York and vicinity, where I could see all phases of the "ism" and report thereon.

I got slate-writing then, but not on my slates, and not on the two the medium insisted I should take, for I marked the frames of those, and when I received the two with the messages on the marks were minus.

If there is genuin independent slate-writing, I hope George will be able to testify to it.

Of course I grant that all that is, is "natural," but the dispute is whether it is fact or fraud, and I trust that patient investigation will decide that question in the near future. I congratulate McArthur on his willingness to help along this investigation by keeping George "in the fight," even if he puts Elmina out of it!

"To speak his thought is every free man's right," male or female, but please feel that I speak it in kindness, love, and an earnest desire for truth.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Snowville, Va., Sept. 8, 1888.

What We Need.

Labor's Reply to the Letters of Acceptance of the Democro-Republico-Rebel Party: We need, throughout our Union, millions of laboring immigrants; but we need, also, a well-regulated currency, a fixed, honest measure of values, such as was suggested in the last of "Letters from Friends," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 18, 1887, else the laborers that are already here must starve to death, under the star-strangled banner of the Benighted States.

The "trusts," "syndicates," "associations," and "courts" (conspirators and shysters!), by and through robbery and bribery, under the misnomer of "interest on bonds" and "retainers," now wear the stars, and hav about strangled honest labor, which bears the stripes.

A custom house for duties on imports is, like a Christian church or a Mohammedan mosque, a premium on crime and a relic of barbarism. He who, through temptation, smuggles most—commits the most crime—makes the most money. The barbarous Africans exacted import duty, to the extent of a few bandana handkerchiefs, of Dr. Livingstone, to permit him to bring his goods into their territory. They did not learn that from civilization: civilization learned it from them. G. N.

The Democratic Plan.

This is stated nowhere so fully as in the Mills bill, which the party has indorsed formally. The New York Evening Post has just printed all the provisions, and shown what changes would be made in the existing rates of duty. Among the most characteristic of these alterations are the following:

In the first place, a number of articles, which are now taxed, would be admitted free of duty, for instance, timber, lumber, salt, flax, garden seeds, grain bags, tin plates, soap, needles, dates, figs, Bibles, rags, books in foreign languages, and wool.

In the second place, most of the protectiv duties on manufactures would be slightly reduced. Some typical cases are paris green, 25 per cent to 12 50; paints, 25 to 20; plain china, 55 to 40; pig iron, 56 60 to 50 50; steel rails, 84 to 55; nails, 43 to 37; screws, 40 to 30; manufactured metals, 45 to 40; wooden ware, 35 to 30; sugar, 82 to 67; corn starch, 95 to 48, and oilcloth, 40 to 25. The duty on cotton thread is now from 42 to 53 per cent, and on cotton cloth, 48 to 75; but it would be 35 or 40. The duties on woolen goods now range from 45 to 90; but these last figures include the weight tax, which simply repays the manufacturer for what he loses by the tax on wool. His protection has been 30, 35, or 40 per cent, and would now be either 40 or 45.

Which of these changes would do any harm, except to the trusts? F. M. HOLLAND.

Official Call for Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Local Secular Unions, Life, Charter, and Annual Members, and all Liberal citizens who support the Nine Demands of Secularism, Greeting:

You are hereby invited to attend the Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, which will convene at Lafayette Hall, Wood street, near 4th, Pittsburgh, Pa., Friday, October 5, 1888, at 10 A.M., for a four days' session—5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th inclusiv.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State or Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Unions are entitled to seats and votes in this Annual Congress. Each Local Secular Union is entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates. Annual Members who pay or hav paid $1 in the national treasury are entitled to seats, but not to votes, except by unanimous consent of the Congress.

This Congress will specially consider practical questions tending to further agitation for taxation of church property; the abrogation of state aid to sectarian institutions; abolition of state, national, military, and prison chaplaincies; repeal of judicial oaths, Sunday and other oppressiv and unjust ecclesiastical laws; nullification of attempts to subvert our Constitution by a legal recognition of Theism in the American Magna Charta, and such other measures as will not merely thwart intended theological encroachments, but will absolutely expunge from our laws, state and federal, such insidious acts as hav already crept in to blot out mental freedom from our republic.

It is to be hoped that the addresses delivered will deal with the practical issues of the organization, so that there will be such an awakening of the people to these vital questions of the hour that a revival of the instinct of liberty and justice for all will necessarily result; that again from the Keystone state—the birthplace of our association—the clarion voice of freedom shall vibrate throughout the land.

Pittsburgh being situated almost in the center of a district containing many of our most distinguished workers, thinkers, and writers, besides the activ host within its limits, there is little doubt but that this Congress will be a glorious gathering of the forces who stand for mental liberty, as expressed in the desire for complete Secularization of the government.

"Freethought at the Tabor.

"A GREAT CROWD LISTEN TO A PROMINENT AGNOSTIC LECTURER."

The above are the display lines which the Denver Republican givs over its report of President Putnam's lecture in that city. The celebrated Opera House, built by Senator Tabor, was completely crowded, the report informs us. Lawyer C. W. McCord introduced the lecturer in a brief speech, extolling the intelligence of an age of steamships, telegraphs, telephones, steam-cars, and newspapers, and the toleration that greeted a disciple of Freethought with so vast an audience.

"From first to last," remarks the Republican reporter, "Mr. Putnam's lecture was a clear, able, and eloquent exposition of modern Agnosticism. He began by stating his ideas of the differences between Christians and Liberals in search for truth. All people must understand that there is a great difference, in the consideration of the Bible, between the book and the theory concerning it. A minister had claimed to him that, in his degenerate days, he had been an Infidel and taught that the Bible was a humbug. If the minister had ever taught that, he could not hav been an Infidel. All Infidels accept the Bible for what it is worth as literature. They object to the claim of its inspiration, as they denied its genuinness, its authenticity, and its infallibility. The speaker dwelt for some time on the position now generally held by Liberal scholars as to the doubtful authorship and time of origin of the divine book.

"In regard to a God, the position of the existence or non-existence of such a being transcends the limits of human reason. Even Sir Wm. Hamilton, the Christian scientist, declared it impossible that anyone could, from science, prove the existence of God. Through faith alone could the supreme being be accepted. He quarreled with no one over his faith.

"The Darwinian theory had proved false the claim of infinit love in nature. Thousands and thousands of forms were brought into life, and but few of them survived. If we had the sunshine and the flowers, we also had the viper and the lion. The study of nature taught that every motion in the universe was a continued struggle for life. Mr. Putnam paid eloquent eulogies to the great Deists, dwelling for some time on Thomas Paine."

At the conclusion of Mr. Putnam's brilliant address, an informal meeting of Colorado Liberals was held, during which arrangements for future work were perfected and contributions received.

A ludicrous incident of the evening was the exhortation of a member of the Salvation Army to the crowd to turn from Satan's path to the Lord's.

The Liberals of Denver are doing splendidly.

E. A. Stevens, Sec. A. S. U.

Kent and Cleveland.

In the beautiful blush of the first autumn days our friends in Kent gave a course of lectures for the enlightenment of the believers of Kent and all the country "which compasseth it round about." That noble exponent of the philosophy of Freethought, ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham, with your scribe, were the speakers of the occasion; and, what with the favoring influence of golden weather, attentiv audiences, a splendidly organized working force, due mainly to the untiring exertions of the energetic secretary, Marius Heighton, the venerable president, Mr. Joseph Heighton, and such earnest workers as L. G. Reed, A. D. Swan, and others, the lectures were a pronounced success. Nor must I forget to speak of the kindness of the Hon. Marvin Kent, a model for all rich Infidels, to whose kindness we were indebted for the free use of hall and grove. I wish that in every place the Liberal cause might find such help.

The effects of that great platform educator, Chas. Watts's, teachings, are to be found in the Liberal mind of Kent. Mr. Watts has often treated the Secular Union with his wonderfully powerful logic, and on repeated occasions put the belligerent Father Leeming to rout. Whether he considered discretion the better part of valor after his drubbing of last March and so concluded not to attack us upon this occasion I am unable to determin, but certain it is that the exponent of Roman Catholicism "failed to materialize."

The Campaign Fund of the American Secular Union received a $5.20 contribution, the donators being L. G. Reed, B. F. Conaway, Joseph York, Joseph Heighton, and several others whose names were not given. The city of Kent itself is a pretty little place of between four and five thousand inhabitants. The country all around is a wonderful rolling of low, green hills, with bright roads winding in and out like yellow ribbons, with bending trees in this rich fall time all laden with blooming, downy fruit, and shining fields all mellow with the hazy light. Pippin Lake Farm, the residence of the pleasant-voiced, smiling-eyed secretary, who can manage to do more effectiv work in a day than some can do in ten, is a lovely home of quietness and content; and the dwelling of that stanch old Abolitionist, Joseph Heighton, is fairly a garden of sunshine. It was not without regret that I bade them all adieu, but yet with a lively hope that some time in the future I may once more hav the pleasure of meeting them all in this world. The Kent Secular Union is certainly a noble monument to Freethought, and all I can wish is that they may continue as they hav begun, and "be not weary in well-doing."

Betaking myself to Cleveland, I was met at the depot by that earnest worker so well known to Liberals, especially about Pittsburgh, Mr. S. F. De Jones. Mr. De Jones is one of the quiet kind, armed with a faultless appearance and no less faultless sarcasm, which he administers in concentrated doses whenever the orthodox savages air their barbarous doctrins too "freshly." That evening I had the additional pleasure of renewing my acquaintance with Mr. G. R. Griffith, also an ex-Pittsburgher. These two black-eyed individuals are anxious to see the work once more well on foot in Cleveland, and, judging from the developments of the past few days, their wishes are likely to be realized.

After consulting with T. F. Lucas, the social little secretary of the old society, and further with Thos. Lees, the man whose energy has built up the Spiritualistic society of Cleveland, with reference to obtaining a hall, a lecture was arranged for; and on Sunday evening, Sept. 9, the cases of Justice and Jehovah were reviewed before a fair-sized audience—indeed, considering the short notice, one might say an excellent audience. After the lecture, a number of the wicked remained to decide upon the appointment of a place of business meeting; Mr. L. B. Silver kindly offered the use of his elegant office on Euclid avenue for that purpose, and on Sunday, Sept. 16th, the members of the Cleveland Secular Union, together with quite a number of new-comers—among whom are Mr. See, formerly secretary of an English society and a very able and enthusiastic gentleman, two Canadian friends who hav recently settled in Cleveland, Mr. F. S. Merrill, who has enthusiasm enough for half a dozen and energy to economize it too, Mr. De Jones and Mr. Griffith—will meet for the elect on of officers and the discussion of the best methods of work.

I am pleased to be able to say that the most radical person in Cleveland is a woman, and those John Geo. Hertwigs who are afraid of the subversion of mental liberty as a result of the extension of the franchise to women, want to call on Mrs. Mary Smith, and then forever after hold their tongues.

To speak of Cleveland Secularism without mentioning Mr. and Mrs. Gillsen, that venerable old couple over whose grand white heads the snows of seventy years hav fallen, yet in whose hearts burns the young fire of a bright hope—a hope that livens and warms and throws up a clear, pure flame, as sometimes you hav seen shooting from a red, warm core of coals a playing flame that leaps about over the rifted and fallen ashes of whiteness—to speak of Cleveland Secularism without mentioning them, I say, would be like the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out. They are as anxious as the youngest to see the work go on, and will render all practical assistance in their power to keep it moving.

Anyone who visits this most beautiful city can see at once the appropriateness of Liberal ideas in a place like this. Everything is broad and wide and free. The streets are straight and level, with a generous disregard of economy in space, which would paralyze an Easterner who is accustomed to economize even in air. No need of that here. The great fresh breeze comes blowing up from the blue lake, and a grand rush of freedom seems to sink into the lungs when one inhales that invigorating breath. The houses do not wear the cooped-up look of the larger cities, and wide, velvety lawns make a sheening border to the beautiful drives and walks which invite one to try his horsemanship or pedestrian endurance. It is a beautiful child of the lake, set smiling here by the broad, fair waves; and as it is liberal in air, and earth, and sea, it should be Liberal in thought.

I can cannot close without extending my thanks to Messrs. Lucas and Copeland for that kindness on my behalf, and perhaps, too, to that anomaly of a reporter who gave the most correct, impartial, and gentlemanly report in the Cleveland Plain Dealer I hav ever received at the hands of the daily press.

With gratitude for the past and hope for the future,

V. de Cleyre.

Sketch of Professor Proctor's Life.

From the World.

Richard Anthony Proctor was born in the quiet little city of Chelsea, England, March 23, 1837, when his father, who was very well-to-do, had retired from business. In early boyhood he was very sickly and unable to attend his school. In his eleventh year he became restless at home and was entered in the academy in Wilton-on-Thames, where he remained for three years, and soon became the head boy in the institution. His father died in 1850, and the family property got tied up in a chancery suit. So Richard took a clerkship in a London bank.

After hours he devoted himself assiduously to mathematics, for which he had developed an early fondness. When the chancery suit was settled he entered King's College, London, and subsequently entered St. John's College, Cambridge, where he was graduated in 1860 as twenty-third Wrangler. Immediately after his graduation he married. For the next three years he devoted himself to study, and in 1863 his first article on astronomy, entitled "Double Stars," appeared in the Cornhill Magazine. It drew considerable attention to him, but as he was so young he found it hard work to get his ideas accepted. Nothing daunted, however, he followed it up, and in 1865 published a monograph on Saturn, and early in the following year his "Gnomonic Star Atlas" and his "Handbook of the Stars" appeared. These works were not of a popular nature, and he did not reap much of a substantial harvest for his labors. His ability, however, was acknowledged, and he was appointed Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society.

About this time a bank in London in which he was interested failed, and he lost the whole of his fortune. He was a man of strong will-power, and set to work at once to make a fortune of his own. In 1869 he made some suggestions to the Astronomer Royal, Sir George Airy, as to the best methods of observing the approaching transit of Venus. At a meeting of the principal astronomers held at Greenwich in 1873 his views were unanimously adopted. To assist him in his work he analyzed the results collected by the Herschels, Struve, and others, and carried out original researches, including the construction of a chart of three hundred and twenty-four thousand stars, and was led to a new theory of the structure of the stellar universe. He maintained on theoretical grounds in 1869 the since established theory of the solar corona, and also that of the inner complex solar atmosphere afterward discovered by Professor Young.

He was appointed honorary secretary of the Royal Astronomical society and editor of its proceedings in February, 1872, but resigned both of these offices in November, 1873, that he might hav more time for his researches.

He was a most prolific and entertaining writer. In 1868 he published, "Half Hours with the Telescope," and a year later, "Half Hours with the Stars." In 1870 he published a work entitled "Other Worlds Than Ours," which had an extraordinary success and attracted the general attention of the scientific world. Since that time he has been a most fertil and popular writer on all astronomical subjects. Among the well-known works which he has published are: "Light Science for Leisure Hours" and "Elementary Astronomy," in 1871; "Border Lands of Science," in 1873; "Transits of Venus," "The Expanse of the Heavens," "The Moon," and the "Border Lands of Science," in 1874.

He first visited this country in 1873 and delivered lectures on "Birth and Death of the World," "Life in Other Worlds," "Religion and Astronomy," and "Other Suns Than Ours." He made a trip to Australasia in 1879, visiting all the principal cities, and in 1881 he started a weekly journal called Knowledge, but it was altered to a monthly form in 1885.

His great ambition when he came to this country was to found a monster observatory at Corona, Orange Lake, Fla. He had been offered the assistance of a great many wealthy people, but when everything was ready the plan fell through, and Mr. Proctor said that some of his associates broke faith with him. This was a severe blow to him, as he had based the hopes of some new discoveries on the observatory at Corona. He settled down in St. Joseph, Mo., a few years ago, having previously married a lady of that city, who still survives him. While there he wrote a great many articles, but left the state because the climate was too dry for him, and it seemed to make his flesh crack. He went to England and, returning some three years ago, took up his abode in Florida. He was charmed with the climate, and proposed to make that state his home.

Of late years he has devoted himself largely to writing for newspapers, and was a regular contributor to the World. His last article, "The Canals of Mars," appeared three weeks ago. Among some of the subjects on which he has written short articles are, "Weighing the Earth," "Moon Eclipse," "Solar Heat," "The Sun and His Satellites," "Comets and Meteors," and "The Genesis of Life." About a year ago he wrote a scientific treatis on the game of whist, and it was published in pamphlet form. He advanced the theory that certain combinations were invincible and got into several controversies on the subject with celebrated whist-players, and notably with the Troy Whist Club, which took issue with the professor, and the views on both sides were published far and wide. His treatment of well-known subjects in a purely scientific way was very popular, and he wrote on dice and poker.

Only recently he got into a controversy with John M. Ward on the subject of baseball. The latter claimed that it was purely an American game, while Professor Proctor held that it was simply an adaptation of the old English game of rounders, played by every English lad. The wordy fight was bitter, and before they finished both of the contestants admitted that they found evidence to prove that the game first started among the ancient Greeks.

Personally Professor Proctor was a most pleasant man. Very few equaled him in conversational powers, and he had a rapid and sharp way of talking that charmed his listeners. One of the most striking things about him in the drawing-room and on the lecture platform was his aptness of illustration. When asked a question he gave the answer so quickly and in such an accurate manner as to create the impression that he had given great study to that particular answer. In figures he was a phenomenon. His old training when he studied mathematics after working in the bank never deserted him, and the mental calculations which he made with comparativ ease were wonderful.

The last letter that Professor Proctor wrote to the World in reference to one of his articles was almost prophetic in one of its sentences, where he said that he intended to make his home in England, but this was "a world of changing plans and purposes." The letter was as follows:

Corona Lodge, Orange Lake, Fla., Sept. 7, 1888.

To the Editor of the World: I am sailing, or proposing to sail, from New York Saturday, the 15th, for England, where I hav arranged to giv lectures at the St. James Hall—two courses in October, 1888, and February, 1889—and other lectures throughout the country. I think it somewhat doubtful whether I shall leave England after that—but this is a world of changing plans and purposes. Believe me, very truly yours,

Richard A. Proctor.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. Jamieson will begin his fall and winter lecture campaign by giving courses of lectures in Alamosa and Monte Vista, Col., some time in October. Address at Monte Vista, Col.

Mr. Charles Watts will lecture for Friendship Liberal League, of Philadelphia, in Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets, Sunday, Oct. 14, 1888. Subject at 2:30 P.M., "Bible Morality: What is Taught as God's Word;" 7:30 P.M.: "Evolution and Special Creation." The public are cordially invited to these free lectures.

Jno. Geo. Hertwig, of Washington, D. C., desires to lecture during the coming winter, and solicits engagements for this purpose. In religious matters he is an absolute Freethinker, and as to public questions generally, he is a thorough Radical. He was born in Germany, where he received a collegiate and university education, and has lived in the United States thirty years. He will lecture in English. His address is, P. O. Box 706, Washington, D. C.

Reason and Justice.

Where there is the most so-called divine law there is the least justice, as shown by the pages of the history of the race.

In the family of the Bible God Hagar was made an abandoned outcast. Eve's posterity were characterized as sons of God and daughters of men. Solomon required one thousand women for his seraglio.

When God sent out his salvation armies for conquest, the order was to kill all, and take or destroy all property. In the case of the Midianite slaughter, when the army returned and reported success in killing all except some women and children, they were rebuked and ordered to "kill every male among the little ones, and every woman that hath known man by lying with him; but all the women-children that hav not known a man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselvs." This barbarity continued not only during the direct rule of the supreme autocrat but after, when he called to his aid the mythical Moses. Still after that failure, a boy called Jesus was taken in hand by a syndicate of God-makers to be made the antidote of past failures and blunders. This boy, a son of a grass-widow virgin, was told by his mother that about nine months before his birth she was visited by a tramp who said he was an angel, and told her that she would hav a boy, and that he would become, essentially, the future god.

Jesus, or his God-makers, while holding allegiance to the boss God, refused to accept or ignore the burning to death of the people of Sodom with fire and brimstone from heaven, the indiscriminate destruction of all life by drowning the world, and other tragical horrors so abhorrent to humanity. They concluded to abandon the old failures, and invented an everlasting hell of fire and brimstone on the life insurance plan. Churches must be organized under the guidance of a preacher or priest. He receives premiums, and issues policies. The policies, to the superstitious man or woman, are as essential as a stamp is to a letter. Without the stamp of the church they are thrown in the waste-basket of hell.

I hav read the Bible carefully for the past six or seven years to see if I might be wrong in considering it the most stupendous calamity that ever befell the race of man.

I find there are two ways in which the Bible is read. One is through prepared theological goggles that, by reflex law, throw back upon the mind the word, God, God, God, until everything is thus colored. The other way is through the naked mind's eye of reason. Hence the conflict.

The Bible and Bible God was a plan, a scheme. It was not started until about twenty-five hundred years after the so-called genesis—say in the days of the mythical Moses, and of Joshua, and of David, Solomon, etc.

Mythical Moses was sent back these twenty-five hundred years to make a genesis, and report what the god they proposed to make had been doing during this time.

His report is the Pentateuch, or first five books of the Bible, the most sanguinary, brutal history ever published, though closely imitated in the early reign of Christianity.

Henry Ward Beecher, and some other so-called eminent divines, could not die in peace with themselvs until they declared the Pentateuch an allegory and postulation. What of it, so long as the word God is in the first chapter thirty-one times, and the whole thing a disgusting picture of fantastic idiocy? Not an act of charitable kindness, but insidious acts of cruelty and inhumanity imitated and justified through subsequent ages, the master over slave, the husband over wife, or "sons of God over the daughters of men."

Such has been the rule since these God and Bible makers, in the shadow of prehistoric times, undertook to destroy polytheism, the gods of the people, and merge their attributes in one grand, boss God Their object was rule and dominion over the masses by the use of this boss God.

Our country, under a Secular though tolerant Constitution gained, organized, and carried on for nearly a century by men nearly all outside the church and mostly admitted or pronounced Freethinkers or Infidels, has not as yet suffered much in comparison with what it may suffer, judging by the now threatening outlook. How do we stand?

Rome has a secular pope stationed here, whose mission appears to be to organize disorder and general perturbation. Secret societies, or associations, are said to be nests in which nearly all crime is hatched. Such is their method whether secular, religious, or political.

Catholics giv birth to their children in the church, and embalm them in ignorance and superstition that make them mummies for life.

Of the less than about 19,000 000 of all sects and denominations in our country, Catholics claim about 7,000.000, leaving say 12,000 000 of souls, as they call them, to nearly one hundred other different creeds, societies, organizations, or churches, and their Gods.

The millions and millions of dollars expended for the support of the useless clergy and their stipendiaries, would, if properly applied, giv a good secular education to every child in our country. The Secularist, or Infidel, would not destroy the temples of so-called worship, but preserve them for schools, academies, and institutions of learning, and let them stand, as now, free from taxation.

Dr. Darling, when forced to notice this growing complaint, brought it into his pulpit in Albany, and argued the necessity of the embellishment of the churches with costly beauty, and spires on steeples pointing toward heaven; because—"because it pleased God."

About this time, Protestantism made a contract with a theological syndicate to reconstruct the hell made by Jesus. When they finished the job, their reported revision showed they had not meddled with hell except to freeze it over with a patented ice called sheol, to make a skating-park large enough to accommodate all creeds and sects in their growing festivities. About this time, the Protestants here in Albany joined in a grand Sunday-school festival, and hired two professional magicians in New York to come and amuse the children.

Thus the two nominal antagonisms are moving passivly on side by side, the Catholic looking for power, the Protestant for aggrandizement. Both being cannibals, and eating the same flesh, they dare not quarrel, as between themselvs, but unite in robbing the state and taxpayers for their support and aggrandizement.

How much longer in our land will this last? All founded on Bible postulations thousands of years old, postulations that never hav, nor never can, be proved; inventions of God-makers like Moses and David and Solomon, monsters who would not be tolerated in any respectable community in our country, not even in their modern Utah.

As a rule, our Protestant clergymen do not know what they are talking about, or, if they do, they do not believe what they say.

Which way are we drifting?

Albany, 1888. M. McGowan.

Mr. Benjamin Continues His Assault.

My experience with the press was, to say the least, unique and extremely amusing. The editors of the secular press pleaded that their columns were too profane to enter into a religious discussion. When I expostulated that my sole object was to demonstrate the sacrilege practiced by the irreligious fraud Freshman, they gravely replied: "It is a religious question, all the same. Our columns are for the sole purpose of catering sensations, scandals, murders, etc. If you could giv us 'tips' on sporting matters, such as walking matches, dog and man fights, we would copyright you from head to foot. At present, however, we would advise you to appeal to the religious press." Thence I wended my way. At first, the religious editors informed me that the subject is too profane for their sacred columns, each claiming that his contemporary's columns are better adapted for such a subject. Thus I traveled for a few years among the religious sanctum sanctorums. Finally I returned whence I started—the Independent. There I met its chief, Dr. W. H. Ward, a most scholarly gentleman. At first he tried to bluff me off by claiming Freshman to be honorable. But he soon caved in by telling me that he would consider it a calamity were I to cheat my God and myself by emulating Freshman and becoming a convert like himself.

Encouraged by Dr. Ward's confession, I moved to the Christian Intelligencer, whose chief is Dr. Ferris. His venerable appearance gave promis to lend his ear for truth and justice. He, like his predecessor, dragged me for fourteen months, feeding me upon promises which were never fulfilled. Finally he, too, confessed that Freshman was an A 1 fraud.

Fortified by this, I dragged my weary limbs to the Christian Union. Its editor, Hamilton W. Mabie, though not a doctor, is yet very intelligent, sporting a pair of genuin English mutton-chop whiskers. He received me very cordially until I let the cat out of the bag and began to talk Freshman to him. Then he became suddenly busy and remembered that it was press day, which in truth it was, Wednesday, when the paper had just come out of the press.

To present my other experience and a detailed account of the correspondence passing between me and the Christian editor gentry, The Truth Seeker would resemble Webster's Unabridged. Suffice it to say that the editors, after exhausting all their trickery, became convinced that I am thoroughly familiar with all their newest designs of tricks. More than once I gave them to understand that there is more honesty among burglars than among the religious editors' fraternity.

In the mean time, Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby, chairman of the so-called advisory board of the Freshman swindle, felt the pressure of my writing so burdensome that he humiliated himself by coming out in Freshman's "organ" imploring the Jews not to molest or run away with poor, helpless Christianity. This the Jewish press grabbed as hungry mongrels would a shin of beef. In plain English, they went for the meek and humble Dr. Crosby. Dr. Ward, of the Independent, came to Dr. Crosby's rescue and flung a column's worth of editorial, challenging me to put up or shut up. I chose the former. I put up columns of proof in the Jewish Messenger, exposing the rascality of Freshman and his converts so plainly that a blind man could see it. As a matter of course, I paid a visit to Dr. Ward, who felt like the small boy when caught at the jar of preserves. Since there was nothing for me to blush for, I boldly remarked, "Doctor, how do we stand now? Will you let me say something in the Independent?"

"No, thank you. I would prefer it should come editorially from a respectable Jewish weekly." Accordingly, the Jewish Messenger, one of the most reputable and oldest of Jewish weeklies, came out the next week with a few columns of editorials. The Independent still held on to the Golden Rule of silence, but dumped out a column of petrified stuff furnished by the champion fraud, Freshman, into the columns of the Independent. That shameless ignoramus, instead of disproving my statements, confirmed them, admitting that Oppenheimer, Feinstein, and others, after being baptized into Christianity in the name of faith and holy greenback, could not now be found in its ranks.

No sooner did I see how the Independent permitted pollution of its columns with such inconsistency, than I paid another visit to Dr. Ward, inquiring whether I would be permitted to reply to the silly and laughable assertions made by fraud Freshman. This time he consented, providing I could make it short enough. I wrote an article—a model of brevity.

"Will this suit, doctor?"

"Admirably," Dr. Ward replied. But in vain did I scan the Independent for my brief reply. It was nowhere to be found. Once more I climbed two flights, which brought me to the sanctum sanctorum.

"Why, doctor," I remarked, "has somebody stolen my thunder?"

"No, but it was crowded out."

"Will it appear next week?"

"Yes." Next week did come, minus my article. Another tramp up the stairs.

"Why, doctor," I hinted, "my article seems to be rather lazy in coming out."

"It has been misplaced, and now it is lost."

I appeal to thee, O Christianity!—not the Christianity of Freshman or that of the culprit when at the gallows, not even the Christianity professed by Madam Diss Debar, but the true and pure Christianity of Peter Cooper, President Garfield, and Frederick II.—to look down upon the Christianity counterfeited by Freshman and passed through the clearing-houses of the Christian pulpit and press as genuin. I appeal to every truth seeker to see the falsification stamped upon Christianity by paid ignorant agents indorsed by learned ministers and editors who force the truth to the rear by the unlimited power which Christianity monopolizes. Here is a pretty state of things. Tens of thousands of dollars is appropriated for the saving of Jewish souls. A board of trustees of eminent divines, in whose hands the business is intrusted, engaged a manager whose salary consists of faith only. This faith paid for Mr. and Mrs. Freshman's first-class passage to Europe. The same faith pays for their luxurious living in New York. In fact, the expensiv bric-a-brac that adorns their dwelling, and the hight of fashion followed by the faith-consumer, Mrs. Freshman, would keep many a poor family whose faith in substantial necessities of life and rent by far excel the faith manifested by Freshman and wife. Yet this faith-champion lost faith in me when he smelt the rat that my seeking Christianity was not to obtain his faithful $10, but that I was willing to pay a thousand dollars toward his movement providing he could substantiate that he is not a black, falsifying, hypocritical, ignorant tramp. This, of course, he could not do, hence my clamoring for truth and justice.

His backers, the clergy, whose duty it should be to court investigation—especially when "my yoke is easy and my burden is light," as all I desire is to pay dearly for one hour's private conversation—not only permit Christianity to be criticised but adopt means of defense which are decidedly unchristian and unmanly. One permits himself to make false statements over his own signature; another lowers his dignity and winds up the so-called sixth annual report: "But the gospel will always bring a sword before it brings peace to the human heart."

My dear Dr. Crosby, let the dead past bury its dead. Leave the sword out altogether. Let it serve as a monument upon the graves of the grand inquisitors. Let us substitute the pen of civilization, which is mightier than the sword of the medieval period. Christianity ought to be convinced by this time that the Jew is proof against the dull sword, but is sensitiv to the keen edge of the pen. Consequently I keenly feel when you write, "Earnest Israelites hav come forward and confessed Jesus as their savior." I hope you are not alluding to the Feinsteins, Oppenheims, D. G. Rubins, etc.

All that I know and am ready to prove is, that

Freshman's establishment, of which you are the honorary chairman, is a school for scandal, and, like the grog-dens on a Sunday, whose rear entrance is open but whose front doors are guarded by a policeman's club, has its rear entrance too, which is open to all who are willing to confess Jesus as their messiah for $10 and a suit of clothes; while the front door is guarded by eminent divines against honest inquirers like myself.

I am a branded Saul of Tarsus, but am prevented from becoming a modern St. Paul simply because I am willing to pay for my Christianity, provided it is the pure, genuin article, but not the Christianity manufactured by the famous ignoramus son of a rabbi, Freshman.

Shame, where is thy blush? A. BENJAMIN.

Tariff Fallacy.

A great deal is said about England in the political contest this fall. It is urged that she was a protection nation until she had built up her manufactures and was ready to beat the world, and that then she proclaimed free trade. Let us see about this. Surely the speeches and proceedings of her statesmen in parliament during the time of her protectiv tariff will enable us to judge. Knight's History of England is a good authority. Brougham's speeches on "manufacturing distress" in England during her tariff era will be a good authority. I quote from his speeches referring to the periods of distress from 1816 up: "Everyone is aware that there exists in this country a great and universal distress—a distress wholly without parallel in any period of its history. We hav known former times of great national sufferings, but no man can find an example of anything like the present." He then examins the different trades to show their condition. In clothing he shows that one-third of the cloth-dressers are wholly idle, while of the remainder, who hav any work, only two men out of each nine hav full employment. In the iron trade, he takes Birmingham as an illustration. "Out of eighty-four thousand iron-workers, over twenty-seven thousand were compelled to accept pauper relief. Of the remainder only two-thirds hav half work and the others none."

Bad as this is, yet it is "far worse in the cotton manufactures. In Lancashire over half a million souls derive their support from weaving. Their wages hav fallen from thirteen shillings and three pence, $3.31 cents, per week, to three shillings and three pence, eighty-one cents, per week. This to support human life for seven days. When I paused over this scene of misery, unequaled in the history of the civilized world, I felt impelled to ask how it was possible to sustain existence in such circumstances."

At another point, when it was proposed to still further raise the duties, he remarks that, "generally speaking, our duties are now so near amounting to prohibition" that no hope can be in that direction.

I think that ought to be enough to prove that England had not built up her manufacturing industries to such a mighty hight under protection. Why, her exports had never exceeded £50,000,000 sterling and were mostly £37,000,000 in the average until after she accepted free trade. She reduced her tariff in five different installments, and her trade expanded after each reduction, until now it amounts to $3,500,000,000 per year—this, too, without any addition to her territory or population, but, on the contrary, while she was giving to other nations millions of her people and billions of dollars to build up factories in opposition to her. She has built up in Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Canada, Australia, and the United States, enormous factories. And yet they say she is jealous of us. Thus has her trade grown since 1847. In 1854 we were leading her in almost every respect and our shipping was about twice as much. Since then we hav added all the South and the great prairie West to free labor. We have doubled our population by natural increase and drafts from other lands, and yet our shipping has become insignificant and our trade is not half as much as England's. The trade per capita of all progressiv nations far surpasses our own.

England's trade was a mere trifle, a mere flea-bite, before she became a strictly revenue-tariff state. Our trade is little ahead of that of Russia, Turkey, Mexico, and other protected states. CLARKE IRVINE.

Infernal Deception of Rome.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 18th you say: "The latest among the miraculous cures reported from the shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre, Can., are those of an old lady totally blind, a man who has always used crutches, and a confirmed epileptic."

Hav you read Charles Chiniquy's "Fifty Years in the Church of Rome?" If not, you may here read what he says of the "miracles" wrought at the "Church of the Good St. Anne du Nord." Before making the quotation, I should say that Mr. Chiniquy, as priest, had charge of the marine hospital of Quebec, Can., at that time, 1837, and was brought down with a ship-typhoid fever and came near dying, but a vision appeared to him, as he then supposed. It was the two saints, St. Anne and St. Philomene. To them he prayed. He promised that, if they would restore him to health, he would hav their portraits painted and hung in the Church of St. Anne. He recovered and fulfilled his promis. His cousin, a much older man than himself, was curate of St. Anne's, and was a sensible man though he was a priest, as will be seen by what follows:

As soon as we were left alone the old curate said: "Is it possible, my dear young cousin, that you will make such a fool of yourself to-morrow? [This refers to his formally placing the portrait in the church.] That so-called miraculous cure is nothing but 'naturæ suprema vis,' as the learned of all ages hav called it. Your so-called vision was a dream of your sickly brain, as it generally occurs at the moment of the supreme crisis of the fever. It is what is called the 'turning-point' of the disease, when a desperate effort of nature kills or cures the patient. As for the vision of that beautiful girl, whom you call St. Philomene, who has done you so much good, she is not the first girl, surely, who has come to you in your dreams and done you good!" . . . When he had laughed at me to his heart's content, he said: "My dear cousin, you are the first one to whom I speak in this way. I do it because, first: I consider you a man of intelligence, and hope you will understand me. Secondly, because you are my cousin. Were you one of those idiotic priests, real black-heads, who form the clergy of to-day—or, were you a stranger to me—I would let you go your way, and believe in those ridiculous, degrading superstitions of our poor, ignorant, and blind people. But I know you from your infancy, and I hav known your father, who was one of my dearest friends. The blood which flows in your veins passes thousands of times every day through my heart. You are very young and I am very old. It is a duty of honor and conscience in me to reveal to you a thing which I hav thought better to keep till now a secret between God and myself. I hav been here more than thirty years. And though our country is constantly filled with the noise of the great and small miracles wrought in my church, every day I am ready to swear before God, and prove to any man of common sense, that not a single miracle has been wrought in my church since I hav come here. Every one of the facts given to the Canadian people as miraculous cures are sheer impositions, deceptions, the work either of fools or of skillful impostors and hypocrits, whether priests or laymen. Believe me, my dear cousin, I hav studied carefully the history of all those crutches. Ninety-nine out of every hundred hav been left by poor, lazy beggars, who, at first, thought with good reason that, by walking from door to door with one or two crutches, they would create more sympathy and bring more into their purses. For how many will indignantly turn out of doors a lazy, strong, and healthy beggar, who will feel great compassion for and giv largely to a man who is crippled, unable to work, and forced to drag himself painfully on crutches! Those crutches are, then, passports from door to door. They are the very keys to open both hearts and purses. But the day comes when the beggar has bought a pretty good farm with his stolen alms, or when he is really tired, disgusted with his crutches, and wants to get rid of them! How can he do that without compromising himself?

"By a miracle! Then he will sometimes travel again hundreds of miles from door to door, begging as usual, but this time he asks the prayers of the whole family, saying: 'I am going to the good St. Anne du Nord, to ask her to cure my leg [or legs]. I hope she will cure me, as she has cured so many others. I hav great confidence in her powers.' Each one giv twice, nay, ten times as much as before to the poor cripple, making him promis that, if he is cured, he will come back and show himself, that they may bless the good St. Anne with him. When he arrives here he giv me sometimes $1, sometimes $5, to say mass for him. I take the money, for I would be a fool to refuse it when I know that his purse has been so well filled. During the celebration of the mass, when he receives the communion, I hear generally a great noise, cries of joy. A miracle! A miracle! The crutches are thrown on the floor, and the cripple walks as well as you or I. The last act of that religious comedy is the most lucrativ one, for he fulfills his promis of stopping at every house where he had ever been seen with his crutches. He narrates how he was miraculously cured—how his feet and legs became suddenly all right. Tears of joy and admiration flow from every eye. The last cent of that family is generally given to the impostor, who soon grows rich at the expense of his dupes. This is the plain but true story of ninety-nine of every hundred of the cures wrought in my church. The hundredth is upon people as honest, but, pardon me the expression, as blind and superstitious, as you are. They are really cured, for they were really sick. But their cures are the natural effects of the great power of the will. It is the result of a happy combination of natural causes which work together on the frame and kill the pain, expel the disease and restore to health, just as I was cured of a most horrible toothache some years ago. In the paroxysm I went to the dentist and requested him to extract the affected tooth. Hardly had his knife and other surgical instruments come before my eyes than the pain ceased. I quickly took my hat and left, bidding a hearty good-bye to the dentist, who laughed at me every time we met to his heart's content.

"One of the weakest points of our religion is in the ridiculous, I venture to say diabolical, miracles performed and believed every day among us, with the so-called relics and bones of the saints.

"Don't you know that, for the most part, these relics are nothing but chickens' or sheep's bones? And what would you say were I to tell you of what I know of the daily miraculous impostures of the scapulars, holy water, chaplets, and medals of every kind? Were I a pope, I would throw all these mummeries, which come from paganism, to the bottom of the sea, and would present to the eyes of sinners nothing but Christ and him crucified as the object of their faith, invocation, and hope for this life and the next, just as the apostles Paul, Peter, and James do in their epistles." (From pages 328, 329, 330, and 331.)

Mr. Chiniquy has now published the foregoing to the world. It may be asked: "If the Rev. Mr. Ranvoize saw thus the corruption of Rome, why did he not leave that church?" Well, let us thank the gentleman for the favor of revealing so much, or rather, thank Mr. Chiniquy for publishing it. His "Fifty Years in the Church of Rome" is the most captivating work I hav ever read. The most delicate and corrupt subjects are written on in such pure language as to be inoffensiv to the most sensitiv ears. The book should be read by every lover of liberty in the United States. JOHN DAVEY.

Gotham's Saintly Editor.

"Pa, there is one good, pious newspaper editor in New York, isn't there?"

"Oh, yes, my son; one truly good and properly pious editor—piety personified!"

"What is the name of this piece of personified piety, pa?"

"The name of this truly good and properly pious editor, who really outpiouses the pious Childs of the City of Brotherly Love, is Shepard, my son—Elliott F. Shepard."

"Yes, pa. Does he write pious pieces for his newspaper?"

"Well, he does not greatly expand himself in pious composition for daily consumption—more is the loss to his subscribers—but he does better, my son, in daily printing a scriptural text at the head of his editorial page!"

"Every day, pa?"

"Every day, my son, Sundays excepted. Not for all the world would this truly pious saint and editor issue a paper on Sunday."

"Not if he was offered the whole world, pa?"

"It will never be offered, my son, and my proposition must stand as presented."

"Yes, pa. Is the text the first thing on the page?"

"Yes, my son. It is the Alpha, and, I may say, the Omega, with everything betwixt and between. You see, the readers of his paper earnestly peruse the text the first thing, skip through the rest of the matter, then peruse the text again, most earnestly, deciding that it is the most newsy article presented. So you see that text is all my fancy painted it—the Alpha, the Omega, and all betwixt and between, so to speak; in short, altogether lovely and divine!"

"Has he got a pious name for the paper, pa?"

"No, he has not, my son; and this worries the good Shepard greatly, I hav no doubt. You see, the paper—two papers in one—was not a bantling of his, but a publication of age, and to change the name would be to commit financial harikari, you know; and our pious ones never do that if they can help themselvs!"

"Does he want to make money, pa?"

"Does a duck want to swim, my son? Yes, he—Shepard, not the duck—follows his great prototype, David, in this respect. David, 'a man after God's own heart,' engaged in all sorts of enterprising trusts, and waxed great with 'exceeding much' wealth."

"Has this good editor waxed rich, pa?"

"Well, yes, but by a slant as it were. It was not the waxing of the worker but the waxing of the wooer, my son, that led him on to fortune—he married one of Commodore Vanderbilt's daughters."

"Yes, pa. Didn't the commodore say something funny about him, one day?"

"It was reported that, one day in facetious mood, he declared the pious Shepard to be 'more kinds of a damn fool than any other fellow he ever struck!' But then the commodore was nothing if not brusque at times, and luridly extravagant of speech, my son."

"Would this good Shepard print Colonel Ingersoll's name in his paper, pa? George Washington Childs, P.X.Q.Y.Z., wouldn't."

"Oh, yes, my son; of a surety he would. The good Shepard will admit the colonel's name to his columns whenever a chance offers to say anything derogatory to that good name."

"But is that good and fair, pa?"

"My son, you pain me by your lack of understanding. Don't you know, can't you see that falsehood, detraction, vilification, slander, et hoc genus omne, are eminently Christian, and that to be eminently Christian is to be eminently good and fair?"

"Yes, pa. This pious editor wouldn't knock out poverty if he could; would he, pa?"

"Most assuredly not, my son. For his own sake he would retain it, that he might shine by contrast, and for Christ's sake, because Christ said the poor would be with us ever, and, consequently, it would be most sacrilegious to abolish poverty! It would be flying in the face of, and kicking against, the 'prince of peace,' who brought a sword! Oh, but he is a saint, my son—I refer to Shepard, not Christ—and a sweet-scented son of sanctification!"

"Yes, pa. What does this saintly editor print texts for?"

"What does this sanctified son print texts for? O my son Absalom! O Absalom, my son, my son, you make me tired! Get thee apart from me and commune with thyself closely. If you don't tumble to the 'why' within a week or so, go and buy the newest puzzle out and wrestle with it You may possibly solve that. Go, I would be alone."

SI SLOKUM.

No Disguise In This.

From the Freeman's Journal (Catholic).

In England, which has an Established Church, separate schools are practicable. But here, where there is no Established Church, a school system without Christ is forced on men of all beliefs. What Great Britain has granted, the United States does not dare to grant. It must come. Catholics are improving and strengthening their school system in every conceivable way. In New York no step forward in secular education made by the public schools will be lost on the directors of Catholic schools. One has only to glance at the report of the Fort Wayne school board and the Detroit school board to see what great advances the parochial schools hav made in the West. This school question, on its political side, is, in one sense, a local question. Its satisfactory settlement would be easier in New York and Brooklyn than in Philadelphia or, perhaps, Boston. It is not really a question for the politicians, but a question for the courts. Can a large body of the people of New York and Brooklyn be forced to bear a double tax because the authorities insist that they must accept a non-Christian education or go without any? This burden is forced on them now. How long, as the protesting population increases, and as public opinion becomes more enlightened, can it remain? If the Baptists, Methodists, and Presbyterians prefer Christless schools to the loss of money made necessary by the founding of schools of Christian morality, their demands for a share of the school fund on conscientious grounds might well be looked on with suspicion. In our political system, numbers count. The majority is supposed to settle all political questions. But the opinion of a large minority has weight in proportion to its numbers. As Catholics we are bound to hav what we want, for two reasons: we are right, and we are numerous. Moreover, we hav always been consistent on this public-school question. Catholics ask for what they save the state. It is an enormous sum. With the multiplication of Catholic schools, it becomes greater every year. If the Protestant Episcopalians build schools, let them hav what they save the state. When the Congregationalists or the Hebrews can show schools like ours, they may consistently make the demand that we are making.

Professor Proctor Dead.

No necrological event has been more unexpected than the death, in this city, on the 12th inst., of Prof. Richard A. Proctor, the eminent astronomer. For weeks Jacksonville, Fla., has been ravaged by yellow fever, but it was not known that the germs of the disease had reached other places, and probably last of all to suspect the nearness of his death was Professor Proctor himself.

Professor Proctor had been spending several weeks with his family at Oak Lawn, Marion county, Fla., where he has an observatory, and arrived in the city Monday the 10th to make preparations for his departure for Europe next Saturday. He had secured passage on the steamship Umbria, of the Cunard line. He went direct to the Westminster Hotel, at Irving place and Sixteenth street. On his arrival he complained of fatigue and general indisposition, and went directly to his room and summoned a physician. His symptoms were peculiar and mysterious, and he was kept in his room in practical isolation, no one but the attending physician being admitted. Tuesday morning the professor grew worse, and his symptoms were so much like those of yellow fever that his physician advised the board of health of the suspicious circumstances of the case, which he diagnosed as that disease. Dr. Edson and his most expert assistants visited the eminent patient in his room, and they coincided promptly with the diagnosis already made, which pointed so unmistakably to the Florida epidemic.

Tuesday, an attempt was made to remove him to the hospital on North Brother island, but the storm prevented the passage of the carriage farther than the foot of East Sixteenth street, where he was cared for in the Wilard Parker Hospital. The physicians no longer doubted the character of the disease. They decided it to be yellow fever, with a strong probability of a fatal termination before daylight Wednesday morning. A telegram was sent to the family of Professor Proctor at Oak Lawn, Fla., advising them of the condition of the patient, and of his expected death within a few hours. When the professor was taken ill he told his physician that Marion county, Fla., had had no case of yellow fever, as it was some distance from any of the infected centers. It was learned also that he was a sufferer from Bright's disease and weak action of the heart, and these complaints, the doctors say, made his recovery a grave question of doubt from the outset of his illness. Death occurred about seven o'clock Wednesday night.

We giv elsewhere a brief sketch of Professor Proctor's career, with the work he has accomplished. He has been an exceedingly industrious worker in his chosen field, and his labor has been of great importance to astronomy. As an author he made astronomy a popular study by his complete and easily understood books. He possessed the faculty of making difficult subjects plain to the ordinary comprehension, and it was this faculty as much as his great attainments that gave him fame.

Professor Proctor was one of a quartet of brilliant Englishmen to whom the present generation are incalculably indebted for the facts and generalizations which hav shown our present religious system to be so ill founded and illogical. Darwin, the gentlest and most patient investigator in all fields of nature; Huxley, the biologist; Tyndall, the chemist and philosopher; Proctor, the astronomer—to these four the world owes an enormous debt of gratitude. Previous to locating here, Professor Proctor made two lecturing tours in this country—the first in 1873–4 and the other in 1875–6. Those who heard him will recollect his easy and graceful style on the platform, and his instructiv and entertaining subject-matter. He was one of the very few men who could put sufficient interest in a column of figures to hold the average audience for an hour and a half. It was during one of these tours that Professor Proctor lectured upon "Religion and Astronomy," a lecture which at once drew down upon him the anathema of the pietists, and he was vehemently denounced as an Infidel, an epithet he never cared to disown. A few of his most pointed sentences were the following: "Between astronomy and dogmatic religion there has been a long-standing feud. Astronomy, first of all the sciences, introduced doubts respecting the truth of portions of the Bible record. These doubts were not met by reasoning or expostulation, but by a resort to force and cruelty. Galileo was tortured for opposing the doctrin of a central earth. Giordano Bruno, venturing further to assert that other worlds besides our earth exist, was for that and similar heresies burnt at the stake. . . . But soon after securing the first success, science raised new and more troublesome issues. Again astronomy was the offending science. . . . This attack, as it was considered, on the Bible narrativ, though fiercely opposed by the few among the theologians who understood its significance, caused by no means so widespread an excitement as the first attempt to introduce the system of Copernicus. It was not till geology began to present the evidence of the earth's crust, indicating a history far older than the Bible account, that theologians began to be notably disquieted. I need not remind you of the fierce contest which thereupon ensued."

Of late years Professor Proctor has not offended the Christians save by his statements of facts, which, if true, proved that Christian theology could not be. He left the generalizations and applications for others to make. It is, perhaps, a matter of regret that he could not hav been put in charge of the magnificent Lick observatory, so that the bequest of the millionaire Freethinker should not be belittled by such religious ceremonies as attended its transfer to the state university. Professor Holden may be Professor Proctor's equal in astronomical knowledge, but certainly not in courage.

The English-speaking world is a good deal wiser because of Professor Proctor's existence here, and his death will be sincerely and deeply lamented.

The Real Danger.

In the Daily Saratogian lately, a Mr. John Alexander, on behalf of the "National Reform Association," made these remarkable statements:

"The fact that no man or association in the country advocates a union of church and state, and the fact that a deep-seated opposition to such a union in any form or degree, is a deeply settled American conviction unequivocally maintained and expressed in the constitution and teachings of the National Reform Association, shows that a reunion of church and state is impossible in this country.

"The National Reform Association was organized about twenty-five years ago. Its object, as stated by the Christian Statesman, its weekly organ, published in Philadelphia, and other publications and oral teachings from pulpit and platform, is to aid in cultivating public sentiment in behalf of the improvement, maintenance, and perpetuity of the religious laws, institutions, and usages of our nation.

"The so-called Liberal League, with the Index, a periodical published in Boston, as their organ, is an association of Infidels or Freethinkers who are aiming at the abolition of these Christian laws, institutions, and usages which our organization is laboring to uphold. They demand the repeal of all laws against blasphemy—against the so-called oppressiv laws which require the preservation of the Christian Sabbath, the maintenance of chaplains in Congress, the army and navy, and in the state legislatures, and the Bible in the public schools. The Liberals hav their auxiliary organizations throughout the country. Their work and that of the National Reform Association are directly antagonistic. They seek to repeal; we seek to build up and preserve. And as an important means for securing our ends we are laboring to secure an amendment to the Constitution of the United States that will furnish an undeniable legal basis for all our Christian laws, institutions, and usages in the fundamental law of the land.

"Our association has, in its work, become greatly broadened in late years. As occasion offers, all moral reforms for the good of our race and nation receive attention and discussion. It may, however, be said that the central idea of the National Reform movement is 'the kingship of Christ' and 'the supreme authority of his law in the church and state.'

"From this fundamental central principle and the logical deductions that flow from it, we derive the authority and incentivs for our work."

Without commenting upon the back-date knowledge of Mr. Alexander regarding the Liberal League, we should like to know how he reconciles his first statements with his last. If the National Reform Association is not seeking to bring about a closer union of church and state, the English language needs revision. With the "kingship of Christ" legally acknowledged, and the "supreme authority of his law" as the basis of legislation, the church and state, it seems to us, would be pretty thoroughly united, with the church as the head.

It is fortunate for the people of the country that the Reform Association is as yet as impotent as it is designing. The coming religious war is not with it, but with the Roman Catholic church, which is attaining dangerous power in various states. The New England and the Middle states are perilously near being priest-ridden, and in Senator Blair's own state the Protestants are being bulldozed into building parochial schools while the militant senator is lobbying in the interests of his church. Mr. Alexander and his Reform Association are infinitly less dangerous than the pope and his association.

The Harm Done Now.

Sometimes a person is heard to say that though he knows Christianity to be false, and is aware that it persecuted and did vast evil of old, he sees no great need of consuming energy in combating it now. Such a one's penetration into social matters has not been very deep.

Saying nothing of the harm that has already been done by that belief—calling no attention to a picturing of the state of knowledge and happiness we should by now hav reached had the healthful naturalism of the pagan empires been allowed to keep its course unbroken by the thirteen centuries worse than wasted on the Galilean's earth-blighting fantasies—ignoring, for the moment, all this, let us consider merely the harm done by Christianity at the present moment.

Man's happiness is constituted by the gratification of his desires, and the gratification of those desires is secured by the means of knowledge, and is great or less just in proportion as his knowledge is great or less. If a portion of what is accepted by him as knowledge is not such, but misinformation, by so much is his power of obtaining happiness decreased. In the devotion, then, of incalculable time and effort to the untruths of Christianity, is sufficient motiv to urge every person with pity for his fellow-creatures' pain to earnest and sustained efforts for the abolition of that religion.

However, let us see if there is not about Christianity something distinguishing it from other bodies of untruth, that may explain the peculiar bitterness with which thinkers regard it.

Suppose that among various mistaken systems of thought there be one that makes the strange claim of finality—of having reached the point beyond which there can and shall be no further advance. Suppose one that interpenetrates and ignorantly treats upon all other branches of knowledge and assumes a superior authority over all, and then interdicts all inquiry beyond the lines it has drawn.

Suppose a mistaken system that besides teaching its untruth singles out for destruction every principle that could possibly lead to its investigation and a progress beyond it—every principle, indeed, conduciv to human welfare, either physical or mental. Consider for a moment a system that unwearyingly strives to eradicate every condition essential to its own removal; that endeavors to subvert man's whole nature, extinguish every normal instinct, and leave a ruined race weltering in fantasy, miracle-worship, helplessness, and faith. The use of the wrong drug for a disease for centuries, the practice of an imperfect system of mining, do not eradicate the conditions necessary to the discovery and use of new drugs and new mining apparatus. Is there a grave difference to be discerned here?

Suppose a system tha [provides men with a counterfeit of virtue—a formalism adherence to which gradually comes to determin one's standing, to the supplanting of the criterion of real morality and worth.

But this is not all. We hav yet to consider what may be the safety of society while there exists a creed the necessary logical outcome of which is the duty to deprive of life, even as a humane act, every person rejecting that creed, the only escape from an eternal hell.

And, finally, let the reader conceive such a system as we hav described, flourishing and powerful, controling a majority and wielding the civil power, working unremittingly for a return to its blackest periods of bloody massacre and slothful misery.

These are the differences between Christianity and all ordinary bodies of untruth. A little time devoted to these considerations will giv some glimpse of why thinkers so bitterly hate Christianity, the most dangerous and successful system ever devised to ruin mankind.

Two Dispatches.

We call the attention of the public to the following. The first is to the Herald:

"BOSTON, Sept. 8, 1888.—The excitement which prevails in this community over the 'Catholic question' received a new impetus to-day, when last night's action of the Waltham school committee was made public. A parochial school has just been built in that city in a parish which has a population of seven thousand, and on Monday it was opened for business.

"The public schools began their sessions on the same day. It was then found that some eight hundred boys and girls had been withdrawn from the public schools to fill the desks in the rival institution. Rev. Dr. Fulton, whose crusade is just now carried on in this vicinity, addressed a meeting in the Baptist church last evening, using very strong language on the subject, and advised the Protestants to wake up to the danger which, he said, was menacing our public school system.

"The Waltham school committee held a long and important meeting last evening, at which the whole subject of the opening of the parochial school and its effect on the public schools was discussed. The result of their deliberations was a decision to close the Exchange street and East schools, and a vote to dismiss two teachers, viz., Miss Cecil McBride and Miss Mary Mullen. The Exchange street school had only three scholars left, and the East school about seventy. A change in the rules governing the admission of pupils to the High school was determined on, and it is very possible that a further cutting down in the force of teachers will be made at an early date."

The second is to the Sun:

"MALDEN, Sept. 10th.—Father Flatly of St. Mary's church yesterday announced at all the masses that he had received instructions from the archbishop that at a meeting of the church dignitaries held at Baitimore instructions were issued that all Catholic parents having children must send them to the parochial schools under pain of sin. A number of pupils who formerly attended the public schools began to-day to attend the parochial school."

It is unnecessary to say anything concerning these dispatches. The facts are ample danger-marks.

Swallowed by the Church.

It is said that Rome has "recognized" the Knights of Labor, and that the order can now go on without fear of the church. This means that the church has obtained what she wanted from the Knights, and has been allowed to revise their constitution.

When the order was working in secret it aroused the animosity of the clergy, and many Catholics refused to join it. At the general assembly of 1881, held in Detroit, Mr. Powderly, who was then grand master, said:

"At the beginning of the year many locals were anxiously awaiting the result of the deliberations of the general assembly on the question of making the name of the order public. Many locals were already working under protest, the alternativ of leaving the order or the church in which many of them were born and raised staring them in the face. Night after night hav I sat thinking and deliberating this matter over; for, gifted with what intelligence we may be, as unwilling to yield to its influence as we may be, yet we must admit that we want the men of all religions, and to get them we must make concessions to the church, for its influence is too vast to be idly passed over."

At that session the name of the order was made public, but still the Catholic clergy refused to admit members of the order. Two years ago Cardinal Taschereau, of Canada, issued a mandament against the Knights. The general master workman laid the matter before Cardinal Gibbons, instructing him in the secret work of the order, and that prelate undertook to hav a proper presentation of the case made to the pope. A stay of proceedings was granted in Canada, and the decree will now place the Knights in full accord with the church, and the result will be that the church will control the order.

Workingmen who hav joined the Knights with the hope through organization to better their condition will soon find that the Catholic church is not a poor man's friend. She is bent upon conserving the Christian system of society, which assumes that God made some men to rule and hav an easy time, and some to be ruled and to do the work.

The Oaths Bill.

Mr. Bradlaugh further explains his Oaths bill in the Reformer of September 2d. He says:

"The Editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER disapproves the Oaths bill as it has gone to the House of Lords, and adopting the view of Dr. W. A. Hunter, it says the bill

"'practically makes the people of no religious belief a sect who are allowed to affirm as a favor, as is a Quaker. Most Freethinkers will object to taking a right thrown at them in this way.'

"But by the law of Great Britain, as it has existed for many years, Quakers affirm as of right. There is no favor in the matter; they can insist on affirming. If the Oaths bill becomes law, Freethinkers who object to an oath, who are without religious belief, will be able to affirm as of right. Then the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER says

"'that the bill is not a final settlement of the question, and if its passage will defer a satisfactory settlement it should not pass. Mr. Bradlaugh is in Parliament without it, and it is not so important that Freethinkers should sit on juries as it is that all men should possess equal rights as citizens—not as favors but as a natural and inalienable right.'

"No bill is a final settlement of any question; but every statute which diminishes penalty or disabilities for opinion helps to hasten more complete liberty. If the Oaths bill is passed by the Lords, persons without religious belief in Scotland will be competent as witnesses. None of them are at present so competent. If my Oaths bill did nothing beyond this, it would be an enormous advantage gained to the Freethought party and, I think, to the general public. No Oaths bill could giv all men equal rights as citizens, and if the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER only means equal rights in cases where oaths are not exacted, the Oaths bill does place persons with and without religion in equal position. The words 'natural and inalienable right,' when used in relation to affirmation or oath, seem to me misplaced. The common law duty and right of every subject of the British realm was to swear his allegiance. The common law right to swear as witness was subject to many restrictions. The common law has been modified in some respects and extended in others by statute. My bill, if it becomes an act, is an ameliorating and extending measure. The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER adds:

"'Mr. Bradlaugh does not say how a man who rejects both scriptures and oaths-taking, yet has a religious belief, would get around the amendment.'

"All he has to do in such a case is to say that the taking of an oath is contrary to his religious belief if it be so; and if the taking of an oath is not contrary to his religious belief, it is no part of my duty to legislate for him. The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER winds up his condemnation by saying:

"'The bargaining for the reading of the bill—what in this country is called log-rolling—is politics, not statesmanship.'

"I am unaware of any bargain save that openly made in the House of Commons on the 14th of March, and which was then approved and supported by the whole of those in the House who hav since objected. I hav strictly adhered to what I then promised, and if that be 'log-rolling,' then I can only say log-rolling is more honorable than I imagined."

We trust that the bill will work just as Mr. Bradlaugh anticipates, and certainly it is a generous concession to wring from the Christians. But it is, after all, only a concession. The Christians in Parliament who hav voted for the bill will claim great credit for their "toleration" in allowing Atheists to giv evidence in Scotland and sit on English juries. And the acceptance of this toleration carries with it the admission that the right exists in the state to deny such favor. The position is this: The Christians of one sect are in power. At first no one belonging to another sect is allowed any rights. Gradually the other sects obtain legal rights—not given them because the members possess them naturally, but because it saves trouble to the ruling sect. The Quakers, for instance, obtained the right to affirm not because the Episcopalians held that the members of that sect naturally possessed all the rights of other citizens, but because the Episcopalians were pleased to grant it. Lastly, come the Freethinkers, and a bill is to be passed giving them the right to affirm if they will tell the judge that they are Freethinkers. The point that we object to is that any man should be obliged to open his lips at all about his religious belief or lack of belief. When this bill becomes a law Freethinkers, so far as oaths and jury duty go, will be a legally recognized sect. Giving them legal rights is not recognizing their natural rights.

Our criticism of the bill was, and is, that a man must declare himself to hav no religious belief in order to obtain its advantages, and this will prejudice his case or himself in court. What is wanted is, that nothing whatever need be said about religion. This alone will secure equality.

We notice that the Freethinkers of England are withdrawing their objections and accepting the bill as read. Mr. Bradlaugh is a powerful and persuasiv leader.

Editorial Notes.

CONCERNING the Rev. Mr. Green, a brief biographical sketch of whom we printed last week, a Chicago correspondent sends the following verse:

"Now languishes the reverend Green
In durance vile, for being mean
To women six or seven.'
He is a patriarch, you know—
He's growing very old; and so
He soon will go to heaven."

It has a merit unattained by most poetry, inasmuch as it is stern truth.

THE London Radical Leader publishes this pleasant paragraph about a Hindoo gentleman who used THE TRUTH SEEKER composing-room as a base of supplies while taking observation in this country: "We see from the journal Hope of Calcutta that the editor, Babu Amrita Lal Roy, is issuing two new works. The one is entitled 'Three Years Among the Americans,' and the other, 'England and India.' We know Mr. Roy to be a cultivated gentleman, fully competent, from his residence in this country and in America, to write with instruction upon the topics he has undertaken." Everyone in this office who knew him has a warm corner in his heart for the little dusky-faced philosopher and scholar, whose modesty kept him in positions below his merit, but whose courage and worth made him known in spite of himself.

IN the National Reformer of August 26th Mr. Bradlaugh wrote:

"Many folks write me as though now Parliament stood adjourned I could be easily taking holiday and rest. I wish this were possible, but in truth I hav to work very hard to reduce my debts and liv. I shall, I hope, hav four and a half days' fishing in Loch Long from midday on Monday, September 3d, to the morning of Saturday, the 8th, but this short holiday is more than counterbalanced by the heavy lecturing work of the recess. This week, for example, address seven meetings, next week eight. Many write me to giv lectures in aid of branches, clubs, and associations, and I do help very often, but surely it is not necessary for me to constantly repea that my only means are those I earn from day to day by tongue and pen. My great trouble now is lest I should be unable to earn enough to meet my many heavy obligations, in which case I should be most reluctantly obliged to relinquish my parliamentary career.

In the very next issue of the Reformer he acknowledges the receipt of several hundred pounds, subscribed to clear off his debt of about £1,500 remaining due from his six years' parliamentary struggle, and records the formation of a committee to raise the balance. This shows the regard in which the Atheist champion is held not only by the Secularists, but by the Liberal public. The address of the treasurer of the committee is, George Anderson, 35a Great George street, Westminster. The Pall Mall Gazette, Star, and other journals are actively aiding in the collection of the fund.

POLITICS and religion run hot down in South Carolina, and the ministers occasionally take a hand in. In the Farmer's Friend, published at Timmonsville, we find the following ministerial protest against the election to Congress of a Freethinker. The writer is the Rev. S. M. Richardson: "The continued renomination of Hon. G. W. Dargan for Congress is a thing which demands a protest. It is well known that Mr. Dargan some years since became a convert to Agnosticism, and in consequence abandoned the church of his early choice. That Mr. Dargan is not an aggressiv opponent of Christianity as is Colonel Ingersoll, the arch-apostle of Agnosticism in this country, will be readily acceded. Still, his position, well understood by those who hav a right to know, is that of a rejecter of revelation. The writer maintains that the selecting of Mr. Dargan to represent this congressional district is a grave mistake. 1. It is an injustice to the Christian sentiment of these counties. This people are emphatically a people of simple trust in the reality of a God, a life to come, retribution for sin and a reward for righteousness. Surely some one could be found in six counties competent to fill this office who would not misrepresent the dearest convictions of the heart of a noble people. 2. It is a wrong to Mr. Dargan himself. The temptations of political life are too well known to need mention. The allurements of political life in Washington are well-nigh irresistible. Few, and only such as are supported by strong religious convictions, can withstand them. The wine-cup and the gaming-house spread their enticements upon every side. A man of loose views on those points of belief which underlie all moral principle will almost inevitably run down in the corrupting atmosphere of the capitol. History, the 'only prophet' of Agnosticism, will bear me out in this assertion. 3. It is an insult to God and a dangerous experiment." Not being familiar with South Carolina politics, we know not what effect this protest will hav, but we imagin that if Mr. Dargan gets the regular Democratic nomination, he will be elected, and take his chances in wrestling with the wickedness of Washington.

The Higher Morality.

From the London Commonweal.

Hardly has the pope responded to the cry of the Irish landlord with a plea for the high morality of rent-paying by compulsion, when he is to be asked for what in a lower rank of life would be called a legislation of incest. As it is the brother of a king and the daughter of a prince, and the union is to produce an heir to a throne, it would be impolite to use such a word, and the whole thing is again in accordance with the higher morality reserved (by divine grace) for the great ones of earth.

Letters from Friends.

CHILLICOTHE, MO., E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: We are in hopes, upon my renewal, to hav the pleasure to send in a few subscribers to your noble and instructiv journal, and thereby gladden the hearts of the Truth Seeker Company, including the devil—printer's devil, of course, as you hav no use for any other. L. CHUTE.

BABYLON, N. Y., Sept. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Yes, there is no more important question for Liberals than organization. When your Courtlandt Palmers, rolling in wealth, are desirous of such proceeding, they will certainly hand over to the Secular Union funds enough to make a start, and build up a monument of what might adorn our professions. For my part in similar proceedings, between 1850 and 1855 I was associated in what we termed the Independent Order of Liberals of the City of New York. We had a fund of several hundred dollars. We had associated with us a Mr. Palmer, G. Vale, Dr. Hull, and many others. The operations of the Paine farm movement were the means of breaking us up, and throwing cold water on our movement. If there are any survivors, I would like to hear from them. P. H. FOSTER.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Ritchey wishes to know the use of that "peculiar projection about the size of a goose-quill half-way down the intestins, and which is found only in the human system." I presume she refers to the "vermiform appendix." Now, in the first place, it is an error to say it is found only in the human system. That portion of the large intestin from the closed end to the valve leading from the small intestin is called the cæcum. In the human system the cæcum has been shortened by the shriveling up of the closed end, and this shriveled or atrophied portion is what Mrs. Ritchey wishes to understand. It is inexplicable except from the evolutionary standpoint. The very fact of its atrophying proves that it has ceased to perform any useful function in the physical organism. The only purpose which it serves now is to teach man the lesson of his humble origin. As the assumption of the upright position is known to hav produced other structural changes in the human system, it is probable that it also had something to do with this. The present is merely a transitional stage. As we shall never get down on all-fours again, the "vermiform appendix" will continue to atrophy until it wholly disappears. That this is the correct explanation of the matter is proved by careful researches in comparativ anatomy and physiology and the development of the human embryo. Yours truly, C. L. ABBOTT.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Sept. 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The views of Colonel Ingersoll on divorce, like everything else he advances, contain some food for reflection. Colonel Ingersoll would put it in the power of the woman to be divorced on demand, while he would grant no divorce to the man except for a breach of the contract. This is in many respects an improvement on the present rule, which does not grant a divorce to either party except for a breach of the contract. But what is a breach of the contract? Colonel Ingersoll, being an eminent lawyer, must be aware that it is a capital breach of the contract for the woman to refuse satisfaction to her husband's lusts, and his own reason for the discrimination, that her youth is her capital, does not suggest the idea that he feels very strongly on this fundamental point. The woman oppressed in this way would, under his program, hav only two remedies: to demand a divorce herself, or be divorced for breaking the contract. In either case, it is not very clear how her youth, or an equivalent therefor, is to be recovered. But perhaps Colonel Ingersoll thinks that unnecessary, if she chooses to break the contract in that way. Is not the reason he givs for granting the woman a divorce at will a reason rather for such arrangements about property that her youth will no longer be her capital? And would not absolute freedom in the relations of the sexes be more likely than anything else to bring about such arrangements? But if Colonel Ingersoll should advocate that, the long-eared animals which he mentions, and also some animals with shorter ears, would be apt to call it free love. And if the animals with long ears should call it free love, I fear Colonel Ingersoll would forthwith hunt his hole. Aside from the fallacious reason given, I see no cause for discriminating against us "unprotected gentlemen." Helen Wilmans, a lady who would hav been reckoned among the first humorists in America if she would hav let reform and mental healing alone, lately published a very just and very long tirade against the brutalities of husbands. Having exhausted this part of the subject, she suddenly changed it with this fitting sentence: "The brutes are not all males." That is dreadfully true. The brutes are not all males. Swine, snakes, and polecats are of both sexes, and a female of either of these interesting species, once covered with the ægis of matrimony, can make a man so miserable without technically breaking the contract that, if divorce were denied him, it would probably end in his taking either his own life or hers. In short, Colonel Ingersoll's plan is as practical as the proposal of Joseph Cook to grant a divorce after a jury consisting of Lucretia, Panthea, Cæsar's wife, and Queen Elizabeth, has signified approbation.

I, as an Anarchist, believe liberty the true panacea for sexual as for other evils—the cure for incontinence, excess, infant mortality, "contraception," abortion, infanticide, prostitution, obscenity, matrimonial murder, and over-population. Evidently I am one of those who do not understand Colonel Ingersoll. To me it appears, very much to my gratification, that his view of marriage, instead of being the opposit to what is known as free love, resembles free love considerably, and is getting more like it the more he reads and thinks. C. L. JAMES.

LEXINGTON, KY., Aug. 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: We hav Mr. O. Barnes lecturing in our vicinity. He proves, it is said, that Christ was illegitimate. No one is surprised and only a few are indignant at this assertion. So does one doctrin after another fade before the light of truth. The Swedenborgians hav lectured here, but made no impression. Like Averroes and others, they make spirit the cause of sensation: "God positiv; his creation negativ." Such overwhelming force, however, would destroy as fast as it could create. "Our God is a consuming fire."

Genius may sometimes be capable of synthetic judgment, but to assert that thought is created first and the brain afterward is an affirmation too disgusting to proceed from any but an ignorant and cowardly source.

A life of pleasure consumes the meanest atoms, but benevolence and knowledge require nobler materials, and feed the brain with grand discrimination.

Matter is semi-intelligent, and craves that which it needs for industrious action, while the revels of indolence weaken the organization. The progressiv spirit soon becomes aware of this. If it takes so long for an individual to know itself fully, how could a stranger, a God-fragment, irradiate the darkness of matter? Intelligence is predicated of exertion, involving means to an end. The finest sentiments belong to abnormal states of the brain, when secret chambers are opened, filled by unconscious cerebration. Unusual influences appeal to subtle magnetic forces, and we become a wonder to ourselvs. I hav means of explaining this further, and Spiritualists may, perhaps, assist me in such elucidations.

But, with regard to civilization, we hav abused the clergy sufficiently. Now, let us turn our attention to the editors. On them we depend principally to guide us out of the labyrinths of ignorance. Think of the multitude of them, molding our opinions as they please! How do we find them? Head up, like men, speaking the truth? About a dozen in the United States, perhaps, hav souls and can do this. But the majority, a vast crowd of thinking beings, supposed to hav brains, are crawling, hat in hand, after the meanest of the clergy. Flattering, fawning, licking up their spittle, praising their sermons, from which proceeds not a glimmer of original thought, repeating their idiotic ravings about a ghost who acts upon the human mind, to make fools of us, and candidates for the lunatic asylum. What style of civilization is this, and how will it read in history? When prominent men are time-serving, imbecil, pusillanimous, insincere, crawling, effeminate; prevaricators, defamers, underminers, mental lepers, breeders of moral pestilence? To succeed in business, they must belong to a church.

The Prohibitionists hav left the Republicans, who only wanted to make little servants of them. And now, if the women could vote for them, they would be delirious with joy. Let the women, then, seek political equality—at least, to bring matters to a crisis. When they come to know their strength, they will no longer be humble servants of the clergy.

The mighty streams of moral and scientific advancement did not take their rise in religion. When the pressure of God's footsteps, the burning of his sacred heart, were facts in the Holy Land, the names of towns, the conversation of friends, were too indelicate to be mentioned at the present time. A decent prophet, now and then, tried to reform the people, even in ancient times, but such were thrown into pits or sawn asunder. A force of mind almost superhuman was requisit to break up the darkness, corruption, and stupidity of the Middle Ages—the boldness of Philip the Fair, who humbled the lordly will of Boniface, or that of Frederick II., who rebuked the base tyranny of the pope of Rome. The order of the friars were ashamed of the deep ignorance of the masses under priestly rule. A schism in the order of St. Francis d'Assisi was a successful effort in the direction of Protestantism. The University of Oxford "resisted papal exactions." For going too far, Wickliffe was banished from this seat of learning. The masses were trampled under the feet of church dignitaries. There was no chance for education or morals. Thumb-screws and other instruments of torture were found on Spanish vessels after the destruction of the Armada. Was the church the mother of truth, holiness, and civilization? ALHAZA.

JASPER, TENN., Sept. 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 1st inst. Mr. F. M. Holland has undertaken to answer Mr. Griffith on "Wool and Whisky." Whether his answer is intended for me I am unable to say, as one TRUTH SEEKER failed to reach me, and it may hav contained a letter written by myself.

Mr. Holland says that Mr. Blaine says that "the repeal of the internal revenue laws will make whisky cheaper," and increase its consumption. From the tenor of Mr. Holland's article we take it that he is opposed to taking the tax off whisky and tobacco, and would instead reduce the tariff. Mr. Holland appears to be a friend of labor, and wishes the tariff reduced in order to benefit labor. Our object for repealing the tax on whisky, tobacco, etc., and retaining the tariff, is also for the benefit of labor. Labor pays all taxes, both national, state, and municipal, and that mode of taxation which will be the lightest on labor is exactly the kind of taxation we are in favor of. Labor not only pays all taxes, but it pays all debts of every description, national, state, municipal, and individual. Labor not only pays all taxes and all debts, but labor actually produces all wealth, and supports the world. Labor doing all these things, that system of laws and legislation which will make it the easiest for him to bear the burden of the world, is the system of laws that I am in favor of, if it can be come at and put in force. Being a friend to the laboring man, who pays my taxes and furnishes me grub, and also being grateful to him for his kindness, I will giv my reasons for wishing the repeal of the internal revenue laws. The United States does not need the money derived from the taxes levied under them. Many, if not all of the states are in debt, and do need the taxes that are now paid the government by tobacco and liquors. The repeal of the law would do away with an army of internal revenue officers that are now acting as spies and informers, and exercising a species of espionage and inquisitorial powers over our citizens that is humiliating to our pride, as well as engendering strife and law-breaking in many portions of our country. For the past twenty years internal revenue officers hav acted as judges, jury, witnesses, and executioners, all through the mountains of Tennessee, Kentucky, Georgia, Alabama, North Carolina, Virginia, etc., and hav destroyed millions of dollars' worth of property in these states, without the semblance of a trial, much less a conviction of any of the parties upon which they vented their power, under this infamous law. We hav been present and seen distilleries demolished and thousands of dollars' worth of property destroyed without even the owner having been summoned before any court of the country to answer whether he was amenable to the laws for any violations of their commands or edicts; the officer committing the destruction not even having a warrant or summon for the owner at the time of the destruction of the property. Talk about Anarchy! Is it any wonder that the poor devil who livs in the mountains, away from any market for his surplus of corn, or apples, or other fruits, should hate a government, or its laws, that deprives him of the privilege of putting it in the only shape in which it can be transported over his rough-and-tumble roads to market? It was the loyalty of these very same hardy mountaineers that made it profitable for the United States to maintain its independence at a time it needed assistance. Had it not been for the huudreds of thousands of these same poor men joining the forces of the late United States army, the tide of battle would not hav progressed so smoothly, or it might hav had a different termination altogether. These same hardy sons of toil feel that the state needs all the taxes they are able to pay, without the government forcing them to abandon their farms because they hav no market for crops. I am a Prohibitionist in principle, but at present the people are not ready to receive Prohibition. In reference to the tax on wool I will say that in the history of our tariff laws since the first tariff act went into effect, the price of the articles on which the tariff was levied went down, and the higher the tariff the cheaper the article. And when the tariff was removed or lowered, the price went up. There is only one exception that I now remember in which the rule did not work, and that was quinine. It got cheaper as soon as the tariff was taken off, while coffee went up. So they will offset each other. Why this has been so, I confess I am unable to tell, but it is a fact all the same. It is cheaper to collect the money to run our government at our ports of entry and in our custom houses, when it only requires a few officers to collect the tariff, than it is to collect the taxes on property of the citizen. If the tariff is removed it will require an army of internal revenue officers to collect the taxes, where only a few will be necessary under a tariff law. This makes it lighter for the laborer, who has it to pay anyway, no matter how it is levied, or on what. Foreigners pay no internal taxes to run our state or municipal governments, and it would not be treating our home folks right to allow the foreigner to bring in his goods, wares, and merchandise and sell them in competition with our home merchants without requiring him to at least pay his modicum of taxes for the protection given the foreigner and his goods. To sum up. The government does not need the internal tax; the states do need it. The law works a hardship to the citizen, and is more expensiv to collect than a tariff. Repeal the law and the officers will not be here to pay, in fact, will not exist. The foreigner, not being responsible or liable to taxation under our state laws, ought not to be allowed to sell in competition with home folks without contributing toward paying the expense of the government for the protection and privilege of selling. As the poor laborer pays the taxes anyway, a tariff is the easiest and lightest on him because the cheapest. It is not the tariff that is grinding the poor. It is our interest laws that are acting as a wedge that is lifting the rich up, making him richer, and pressing the poor man down, making him poorer. Interest pauperized the labor of the Old World, and it is pauperizing the labor of the United States. Read "Labor and Capital," written by Edward Kellogg, and study it, and you will find where the trouble is between the rich and the poor. You will find out the exact cause of financial panics coming over the country every few years. It is a book well worth reading by all, and especially by the laboring man. If we can find out what is the matter, we can then, perhaps, find a remedy. AMOS L. GRIFFITH.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Sept. 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Many years ago I read our veteran hero's Pleasure Boat, that dealt such strong and effectiv blows to priestcraft and the inhuman absurdities and practices of popular Christianity. Twenty-one years ago I met Father Hacker at a convention of all sorts of reformers at Ancora, N. J. Among the many speeches I reported was one made by our venerable friend in behalf of poor, suffering, down-trodden humanity. It was impressiv and effectiv. I hav been in sympathy with him and hav been his coadjutor for fifty years. Seven years ago, when I was sick, a friend sent me $2, and I sent Brother Hacker one of them. Now, reader, if you hav a head to think and a heart to feel, I want you to realize that "it is more blessed to giv than to receive," by sending an aged and worthy pioneer, to whom we are all so much indebted, money in proportion to your ability, and let his last days be made happy by substantial gifts which, with the spirit that they will indicate, will cheer and inspire him, and cause him to feel that Freethought and Liberalism are not mere abstractions. That noble humanitarian, Mrs. Slenker, has pleaded for our brother several years, and he has received but little. Let him now receive much. I hav to liv on five cents a day, but I will send him a letter and a mite. Perhaps my plea is not necessary after Father Hacker's own appeal. I hope not. O ye Liberals and Infidels! do you realize how much you owe our aged veteran? J. H. Cook.

WHY NOT PRINT BOTH SIDES?

Monte Vista, Col., Sept. 1, 1888.

Mr. Editor: Several weeks ago (July 31st; this is September 1st) you wrote me, saying: "I don't propose to advertise Braden any more," and you returned my article, "Is it Liberal?" in which I discussed the il-Liberal position of the editor of Secular Thought in reference to Braden. Nearly every issue of The Truth Seeker, since my side of the debate question was refused a hearing, has contained Braden's name, so I hav concluded that you reversed your decision about not advertising the elder, and that you are now willing to publish both sides. Indeed, I do not see how a Freethought paper can consistently refuse to do so. We profess to hold firmly to our principle, old as our system of thought, "Hear both sides, then decide."

In your last number Brother Reynolds has an article couched in language far from polite, denouncing Braden.

For nearly three months I hav been in correspondence with Silverton, Ore., Liberals, having been invited by them to meet Braden in debate. It now appears from Brother Reynolds's letter, printed in The Truth Seeker of August 25th, that in July he consulted with the Silverton Secular committee, and offers to lay aside his "self-respect" and debate with Braden at last, and do it for nothing, besides paying from his "own private resources" one-half the expense of hall, advertising, etc., and devoting the proceeds to the sick and needy of Silverton, Braden to do likewise.

If Braden is as bad as Reynolds charges—"mercenary," extorts money, etc.—Mr. Reynolds knew he would be safe from debate. Why should a man be expected to debate for nothing any more than lecture for nothing? In his California travels Reynolds complained bitterly of Los Angeles Liberals and of Liberals of other places, on account of their unwillingness to pay him, and accuses them of having "no respect for their word," and of having "lost all sense of common honesty." The burden of our brother's song was inadequate pay.

If Braden accepts, the Oregonians—from all I hav heard of them—will not stand idly by and see both men disburse private funds for the benefit of those who are in good health and deriving benefit from the free speech of both disputants. In spite of Reynolds's few stray legal phrases, "paid, given, or devoted to them or either of them, directly or indirectly," both would be well paid, as they ought to be. For my opinion is, that Reynolds would make a good debate, and Braden would keep it interesting.

I wish our brother could hav had this change of heart earlier in the season. It would hav saved the Pacific coast Liberals and myself much correspondence. I was willing to debate with Braden on the coast, because I was invited, and none of the lecturers there were willing to "associate" with him, while I could meet him without a sacrifice of self-respect, which they cannot do.

I would hav been glad if Brothers Reynolds and Putnam had encountered Braden, instead of retreating. It would hav looked better for our side, for we hav ever challenged the entire Christian world to meet us in debate through their chosen representativ indorsed by some Christian denomination. The Christians of the coast are so uncharitable that they make no allowance for a lecturer's self-respect, and openly charge that our men are afraid and run away. It only seems so. But Christians will not discriminate.

Virginia E. Vance, in The Truth Seeker, Nov. 26, 1887, thought it would be difficult to "find an opponent for this delectable gladiator," Braden. Yet at that very time, as publicly announced, Mr. Hull, a natural-born debater, to whom even enemies listen with undisguised pleasure, and myself, were ready to meet him. Since then, as I showed in the letter you returned to me, B. F. Underwood, a host in himself, published his willingness to debate with the "gladiator." It is agreed, on all sides, that a more self-respecting Freethinker and scholarly gentleman does not liv. There surely is something the matter with the assumption of nearly all the Liberal papers and some Liberal lecturers that no self-respecting lecturer would "condescend" to encounter Clark Braden. Even cartoons failed of their aim in this instance.

At the eleventh hour, as "one born out of due season," Brother Reynolds shies his castor into the ring, and he announces himself ready, at last, to tackle the animal that has been chasing Brother Putnam, olfactories or no olfactories. I sincerely hope that he can go into the debate retaining his self-respect and good humor both. For, if he does not, he will be giving the Christian an advantage at the very start. No debate is of so much value when interlarded with such personal epithets as he employs in his last article—"mendacious fraud," "disreputable fraud," "bombastic bully," "foul calumniator and unprincipled blackguard," etc. How such expressions can help the cause of him who uses them is hard to discern—I mean a good cause, full of humanitarianism and Liberalism. Their use by Christians may not hurt Christianity, but it appears to me that when employed by a reformer they injure manhood, true dignity, and genuin self-respect. For the use of such expressions we hav often censured Braden and other preachers, conscious all the while that "'tis their nature to." But when it comes to Freethought lecturers we do look for better things.

Brother Reynolds loads his offer to debate with so many conditions that even the "credulous Christians," of whom he writes, may, in their blindness, say it is only a "ruse" on the part of our lecturer to avoid debate. While he may retain his self-respect, he will not win their respect. They may even go so far as to hurl "Cuttle-fish!" at him. I would hate to hav them do that, but it is just like them.

Frequently Christian clergymen hav said, if we lecturers really love truth and our fellow-man, why not lecture and debate for nothing? It is noticeable that after giving that unselfish advice, the preachers continue to pass the hat for Christ's sake.

Brother Reynolds requires Braden to be indorsed by "any number of orthodox ministers in good standing in their own denomination, that they regard him as a good, moral man, and a worthy representativ of Christianity." That is a new rule for debate, and a very weak one.

1. Suppose Braden should require Reynolds to obtain the indorsement of "any number" of lecturers in good standing among Freethinkers? Those lecturers who hav too much self-respect to debate with Braden, knowing the use to which their indorsement would be put, certainly would hav too much self-respect to let it go on such an errand.

2. Underwood, Hull, and myself hav lost our standing for self-respect. Our indorsement would be rejected.

3. Orthodox clergymen, who can regard the Bible as a good, moral book, will hav no difficulty in indorsing Clark Braden as a "good, moral man." As a debater Brother Reynolds ought to hav seen this.

Mr. Reynolds, in order to prevent Mr. Braden's "mercenary and nefarious schemes to extort money from credulous Christians," he says, will require Braden and his opponent to pay hall rent, advertising, "and all and every expense of holding such discussion."

It is a favorit pastime with Christians to represent Colonel Ingersoll's dollar admission to his lecture as a "mercenary and nefarious scheme to extort money" from the people.

The proposition to devote all moneys received on account of the discussion to the "poor, sick, and needy of Silverton" has, to say the least, a benevolent cast of countenance. "Thus the discussion would be held for truth's sake," he says, and the "poor, sick, and needy be benefited."

Infidel lecturers get such counsel often from the church—to prove their love of truth and humanity by lecturing for nothing and "find themselvs." This would satisfy the Christian's conscience that it is not for gold they speak.

Notwithstanding the Silverton committee requested me to hold myself in readiness to debate with Braden, and I refused calls to lecture East on account of the prospectiv debate West, I will release the gentleman, and Brother Reynolds will conduct the debate at a cheaper rate than I possibly can; hurt Braden worse than I could find it in my heart to do; vindicate Freethought; prove that it was not Braden the coast lecturer feared, but that credulous Christians would hav money extorted from them! This ought to hav come out earlier in the campaign. Deeply as Brother Reynolds loves Silverton's sick, it cannot be that he would turn a deaf ear to the cry of the sick of other cities. Let them be visited, by all means, for "truth's sake." It will strain the brother's purse-strings to "pay," as he says, "from his own private resources half of all the expenses of such discussion." But, like blind Samson, he is willing to bury himself if he can also smother his enemy. The scheme is a good one, if it can be made to work and nobody sees through it.

W. F. Jamieson.

Vallejo, Cal., Aug. 31, 1888.

Mr. Editor: Some time ago a Methodist minister of this community propounded twelve questions which he proposed to answer publicly after his own orthodox fashion, for the edification of the people generally, irrespectiv of creed.

I presumed to attempt to answer the said questions. I published the series in a daily morning paper. The audacity of this action of mine well-nigh cost me my social, and I might add, my political existence.

I hav been horribly abused. But I bear it. Some time I shall take the liberty of telling you of the persecutions that I hav undergone at the hands of the priestly jackals of Rome.

I send you two of the answers to two of the questions in the series referred to.

The church or the playhouse: which shall survive?

"The passions act as winds to propel our vessel, our reason is the pilot that steers her; without the winds she would not move, without the pilot she would be lost." The passions are the great main-springs of existence. They are like unto a throbbing, never-ceasing engin that turns a multitude of wheels. Their action is ceaseless. Their mighty results are as hard to gage and are as boundless as the workings of the brain in the wondrous realms of thought. They are the great lever of humanity. They are the motiv power of the world through all the stages of progress. Through them man is governed; through them he rules. Through them the mighty fabric of civilization was woven; through them kingdoms, empires, and republics arose and fell; through them man was raised to his high estate; through them he livs and thinks and knows; and through them he is supreme.

I hav presumed with my dearth of knowledge to fathom the restless depths of the soul of man; I hav tried to gage the boundless limits of his possibilities; I hav tried to measure the cycles of time, and picture the grandeur of his limitless future. I hav seen, through the vista of unborn ages, the majestic splendor that shall clothe the coming man, and I hav cried in rapture—Man is God!

We are moved by the passions and guided by reason. The portrayal of the passions in mimic life is the lesson of morality. In a well-written, well-constructed play we hav presented to us, in a vivid and entertaining manner, the every-day workings of life, the continuous and varied play of the passions. We see the innocent suffer and the wicked triumph for a while; and then we see avenging justice change the course of events and draw a pretty moral.

We see in Othello the terrible effects of fierce, unbridled love that dotes one moment, then kills the next. We behold love and jealousy fiercely contending for the mastery of the troubled heart of the Moor. We see jealousy triumph—triumph over the confiding, fearful love and purest constancy of the faithful Desdemona. We see the crafty, villainous Iago working out his terrible revenge. We see with mingled pleasure and pain and horror the workings of these sublime and awful passions. With chastening awe we regard the terrible Moor when he tells in remorseful agony of

> One that loved not wisely but too well;
> Of one not easily jealous, but, being wrought,
> Perplexed in the extreme; of one whose hand,
> Like the base Judean, threw a pearl away,
> Richer than all his tribe; of one whose subdued eyes
> Albeit unused to the melting mood
> Drop tears as fast as the Arabian trees
> Their medicinal gum.

Who will dare assert that we do not here learn a moral lesson richer in truth, grander in intellectual scope, and nobler, in its great moral results, than we can ever receive from churches and parables and prophets and Bibles full of goblin tales to frighten little children when they are bad?

If every church were a playhouse we would see an increase of intelligence amongst the masses, and no more, if not less, crime than we hav with a church upon every corner. They cry out, "Abolish the theater, and the saloon and crime will decrease." But let us lay the ax at the root. Let us abolish the church and the Bible. Let us make the masses intelligent, and then we shall make them good. To make them intelligent we must abolish superstitions that are degrading and that teach men that it is not orthodox to "drink deep of the Pierian spring," and that it is a crime to doubt. Let us teach that a "doubt is the bud of an idea; if you giv it the sunlight of thought it will blossom" and bear rich fruit to its maker; it will enrich and adorn him, and bring forth from the endless caverns of the mind eternal and ever resplendent jewels of thought that will liv in the limitless years of the future when time shall be for him no more.

Christianity or Infidelity to control public sentiment—which?

The dread history of the past stands as an awful witness against the manifold crimes of the church and the debasing influence it has ever exerted upon civilization. The archives of outraged justice are replete with the data of bloody deeds that never received retribution because, forsooth, they were committed in the name of that good and merciful God whose name is the synonym of love and mercy, and whose time is so taken up in "feeding the little sparrows" that he cannot find space to care for the poor starving, wretched, suffering images of his godly self.

Christianity control public sentiment!

Let us see what claim she has.

Away back in the ages, ere Christianity was born, there flourished a civilization wrought by the omniscient brain of man, whose brilliant fabric has been the guiding star of following ages to wisdom and enlightenment. All the rudiments of law, of art, of science, of letters, of logic, we learned away back on the banks of the Nile, where rose the wondrous kingdoms of the Ptolemies; where lurks the red Tiber in its placid bed as it did when arose and fell the glorious empire of Romulus; where the blue Ægean shakes its foamy crests against the rock-bound coasts of Hellas, "where burning Sappho loved and sung," and Homer touched his magic lyre and sung to unborn ages his immortal epic. There we heard, for the first time, the enunciation of the rights of man. There grew the eternal principles that hav reared upon the shores of North America the throne of liberty and the seat of reason. All that we know, and all that we hav, we owe to that wondrous civilization that began to decay and fall about the time that a certain man rode into Jerusalem on an ass and told the jeering Jews that he was the son of the eternal God.

Then began the dawn of another era.

Eighteen hundred years ago man broke his mythological idols, destroyed Olympian Jove, and built another roost for another God, who managed to retain many of the tricks of his deposed predecessor. Then arose the church of Rome upon the ruins of old Jupiter's temple. Then began that awful reign of blood and tyranny that lasted for centuries. The arts and sciences were lost to all but scoundrel monks, who sold for dross the mercies of their God. Europe was deluged with blood, and the sword and the fagot intrenched and made firm the despotism of the church. She was supreme. This was the age of crime, ignorance, and intolerance. This was the golden age of the church.

But through the dim vista of years arose the immaculate form of murdered Reason, phenix-like, from the chaos of blood and smoke and crumbling empires. And the church quailed before the resplendent face. Slowly she came until burst the glorious dawn of liberty, when kings and gods and idols were swept aside, and the united lovers of liberty upon two continents arose and established her upon her everlasting throne.

And so the world was enlightened long before Christianity was known. When she came she retarded progress in every age of her existence. She has made the rivers of time run crimson with the blood of her victims. She has sent down through the years of her rule the suffocating smoke of the burning bodies of noble men and women who dared to think. She is a curse that Time and white-robed Reason will surely dispel. No God, no church, no collection of sky-pilots has given us our government. It is the grand bulwark of liberty and equality builded in the age of reason and light, and shall exist in grandeur and power when the church shall lie wrecked upon the shores of time, her idols shattered and her superstitions a dead mythology; when her memory shall be to men but a horrid dream of a dethroned and dismal specter shrouded in all the gloomy horror of her own fabled hell.

Christianity control public sentiment!

On what grounds?

We owe her nothing. W. J. Tobin.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Partner Wanted.

There's a junior partner wanted
By Will Succeed and Co.,
Who do a rushing business
'Way up on Fortune Row.

I've seen their advertisment—
"No capital required;"
But boys with pluck and courage
Are just the kind desired.

They want a boy who has no fear
Of steady, plodding work,
Who does not wait for luck or fate,
Who scorns a task to shirk.

Who slowly, surely digs his way
Through problems hard a score,
And still has grit and courage left
To try as many more.

Who can view a two-foot column
Of figures undismayed,
And through a tough analysis
Or conjugation wade.

Who takes each school-time lesson
And makes it all his own,
Thus laying up his future
On good foundation-stone.

Who does not wait for help to come
From fairy, witch, or elf,
But laying hold on "fortune's wheel,"
Turns it around himself.

And if it grinds and will not move,
With all his care and toil,
He rubs each shaft and gearing well
With "perseverance oil."

Who knows that luck is but a myth,
And fate is but a name,
That plod and push and patience
At last will win the game.

And lads like this are just the kind
For Will Succeed and Co.,
Who are wanting junior partners
'Way up on Fortune Row.

A Persian Fable.

A rat, says a Persian Æsop, seeing a cat approaching, and finding no avenue of escape, went boldly up to her and said: "Madam, I hav just swallowed a large dose of bane, and in accordance with the instructions upon the label hav come out of my hole to die. Will you kindly direct me to a spot where my corpse will prove peculiarly offensiv?" "Since you are so ill," replied the cat, "I will myself transport you to a spot which I think will suit." So saying she struck her teeth through the nape of his neck and trotted away with him. This was more than he had bargained for, and he squeaked shrilly with the pain. "Ah," said the cat, "a rat who knows he has but a few minutes to liv never makes a fuss about a little agony. I don't think, my fine fellow, you hav taken poison enough to hurt either you or me." So she made a meal of him. If this fable does not teach that rats get no profit by lying, I should be pleased to know what in the name of common sense or uncommon sense it does teach.

The Old Hand-Loom.

Nobody can tell where or when it originated. We know only that it was used among the Chibcha Indians of New Granada long before the discovery of this country by the Europeans, and simultaneously in China and northern Europe. And yet, whether seen in China, Sweden, Scotland, South America, or in north Georgia and western North Carolina, it is identically the same as respects design and mechanical appliances. Here is the same system of beams and treadles, the same gearing and stretchers, the same swinging lever or baton, the same sley and shuttles. The finest silk velvets of Souchow or of Canton, like the coarse blankets of the Incas, or the "linsey-woolsey" of our ancestors, were all woven on an instrument of identical design and form. The Chinese scholar will tell you the machine originated with one Foh-he about six thousand years ago. The Indian will tell you it was mercifully revealed to his ancestors long before the white man was created, or at any rate long before he knew anything about him. And the Briton will tell you it was in common use among his half-savage ancestors long before the Norman conquest.—Southern Cultivator.

Science Column.

Cats.

The cat is a useful, domestic animal, a mammal, carnivorous in its nature. Its head is large and round, and it has big round eyes, the pupils of which contract and dilate to a remarkable degree. By daylight the pupil of the eye is contracted, so that it appears simply like a perpendicular line; but at night it dilates, assuming a circular form, shining like a jewel, thus admitting more light and enabling the cat to see by night.

The tongue of the cat is very rough, being well supplied with hard papillæ. It has five toes on its fore feet, and four on its hind feet, each toe armed with a long, sharp, rounded claw, which can make a painful wound, as you can testify who hav been scratched by a cat. Sometimes, owing to some freak of nature, the cat has one, two, or more additional claws, and then it is known as a mitten pawed, or double-clawed, cat. The teeth of the cat are long and sharp, and the jaws are strong and powerful. Domestic cats are supposed to hav originated from Egypt, and there are fifty varieties, of nearly all colors, and some very handsome varieties. The Maltese cat is bluish-gray in color and is very intelligent. The Angora cat has long hair, soft and silky. The Manx cat is born without a tail, and is noted for its oddity. It is found in Cornwall and the Isle of Man. The Spanish or, as some call it, the tortoise-shell cat, from the resemblance of its mixed color to that of a tortoise, is noted for its beauty.

In the island of Java there livs a queer animal, by some supposed to be the connecting link between the cat and the ferret, having the appearance and qualities of both these animals.

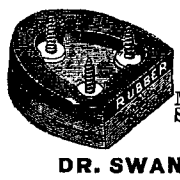
Wild, or wood cats, who liv in the woods, are very large, measuring thirty-three inches in length, the tail being eleven inches long. They are wild and ferocious in the savage state.

Cats do not prowl around to hunt food, but lie in wait for it. Mice, rats, and birds they consider as rightly belonging to them, and they generally bring that which they hav caught home, to show it to the family before devouring it, and it is with great apparent pride that the exhibit is made, except when it has stolen and killed a chicken, when it seems as though it would leave the affair involved in mystery.

Cats are thievish by nature, deceitful and sly. They are not to be trusted alone in the pantry, nor in a room with a canary bird for companionship. But they are usually neat and cleanly in their habits, always washing the face after meals. The superstition that they draw away the breath of young children has no foundation, though formerly such a thing was generally believed. Unlike the dog, who is attached to persons, cats are attached to places, and will liv in a deserted house after the family has gone. They like to wander about the streets nights, and the voice of a cat has a very piercing and unearthly sound, especially when a number of cats are talking or scolding all together upon a neighboring woodshed in the middle of the night. Bootjacks, chairs, billets of wood, and other articles hav been thrown at their heads by people who were unable to sleep on account of their hideous screams and shrieks.

The Egyptians held cats in great veneration, representations of them being found upon tablets and monuments, and their skeletons hav been discovered in Egyptian tombs. In olden times supposed witches were thought to be able to change into cats, and black cats were called "witch cats" and "devil cats," and were shunned as uncanny creatures.

The young of cats, their little kittens, are very cunning, soft, downy, and playful, but as they grow older many of their cute and winning ways seem to depart.



Cats dislike water as a rule, and do not like getting wet, although I once owned a cat named Tip who would put his paw under the faucet to catch drops of water to wash his face. They are not, generally speaking, quick to learn, but, by patience and perseverance with them, they can be taught to sit up, to walk on the hind legs, to jump, and some other tricks. They are fond of perfume, notably that of valerian and catnip, rolling over and upon these herbs and sniffing them with great delight.

By some unaccountable instinct they are able to find their way for long distances through intricate windings for miles to their old homes, even when they hav been carried off in a bag so that they could not see which way they went. They hav great endurance, and it is a common saying that a cat has nine lives—perhaps because it is nine days before their eyes are opened after they are born.

In the tenth century, it is said, the prince of Wales, called Howel the Good, made laws regulating the prices of animals of various kinds. A kitten with eyes unopened was worth one penny; after it had caught a mouse its price went up to twopence; while a good mouser was valued at fourpence. If anybody stole or killed the cat that took care of the prince's granary, he was to forfeit a milch ewe, its fleece and lamb, or as much wheat as when poured on a cat suspended by its tail, with its head touching the floor, would form a heap high enough to cover the cat to the tip of its tail. S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—What can you say of the cat? What is the meaning of mammal and carnivorous? Describe its eye, its tongue, its toes. What is it called when it has additional claws? Where did cats originate? Name some of the varieties of cats. Where is found the supposed connecting link between the ferret and cat? Tell what you can about the wildcat. What is the natural food of cats? What of their nature? Can they be trusted? What of their attachments? What about the cry of the cat? What did the Egyptians think of the cat? What about witchcraft and cats? What of little kittens? Do cats like water? Can they be taught? What special perfumes are they fond of? What special instinct do they possess? Relate the story of Howel the Good?

THE STRUGGLE
FOR Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.
The Present and the Future Republic of North America.
BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

UNIVERSE ANALYZED

BY JOHN R. KELSO, A.M.,

Author of "Deity Analyzed," "The Bible Analyzed," "The Real Blasphemers," "Spiritualism Sustained," etc., etc.

The latest and best work of an analytic thinker, who is gifted with those rare powers that render the subtlest conceptions the easy property of the ordinary mind. The book contains many ideas that will be new to the world and productiv of good in furnishing food for thought. We trust it will hav the immense distribution it so richly merits.—[The American Idea.

Book Notices.

Charles Watts has just written and published a crushing Reply to Father Lambert's "Tactics of Infidels." Its price is 20 cents.

H. L. Green, Buffalo, N. Y., publishes Colonel Ingersoll's memorable oration on Conkling in handsome pamphlet form; price 4 cents, ten for 25 cents.

"The Servant Question" is No. 5 of the Human Nature Library, published by Fowler & Wells. It contains plainly written, sensible suggestions. 10 cents.

"Evolution and the Light of Reason," by H. P. Marsh, Palmyra, N. Y., sets forth in simple words some of those practical precepts for wise and beneficent conduct of life that are developed from scientific truths. Price not stated—perhaps 10 cents.

"The Abiding Sabbath and the Lord's Day," by Alonzo T. Jones, is an excellent presentation of the evidence showing Sunday not to be the day commanded for Sabbath observance. Published by the Pacific Press Publishing Co., Oakland, Cal.; 20 cents.

"Christianity and Progress," a Reply to W. E. Gladstone, is an excellent pamphlet in which the able English Freethinker G. W. Foote completely dissects the premier's late orthodox arguments, taking each statement detail by detail and abundantly refuting it. Price, 10 cents.

"I, Buddha, possess a law, which, if you are able perfectly to accomplish, then all your sorrows must terminate, and you possess unalloyed happiness. What is this law? It is called the practice of great love." This quotation heads a paper called the Bijou of Asia, a paper started at Kioto, Japan. It points out that Christianity is declining in Europe and America, and advocates the substitution of Buddhism.

"Social Purity," a Lecture to Men only, by Rev. H. I. Bryant, Blue Springs, Mo., price 25 cents, is a book about "God-given institutions," "God-given ethics," "Christ's commands," etc. If the author has found a good end and wishes to lead others toward it, we advise him to abandon the guesses and dogmas of barbarians and try to learn something about, and proceed in accordance with, the teachings of sociology and science.

"The Life of Jehoshua," an Occult Study and a Key to the Bible, by Franz Hartmann, M.D., is published by the Occult Publishing Co, Boston. It is another of the numerous attempts to attach new meanings to the fragmentary words of ancient mythical or dimly known characters. The work endeavors to show that Christ intended by his teachings to inculcate merely an obedience to the "divine light" or spirit of love and truth within one.

Herbert Spencer is working again, though with difficulty, for he says it took him from the middle of March to the first of June to write the article on "The Ethics of Kant," which he contributes to the August Popular Science Monthly. Mr. Spencer combats Kant's idea that only right things done in obedience to duty hav moral worth, while the same things done from love of the right in and for itself are morally valueless. This, we feel compelled to remark, seems to us a profitless study of words and definitions, instead of a useful study of things.

An excellent new magazine is the Historical American. Its purpose is, as its name indicates, to deal with the persons and affairs prominent in America's history. The first number, that for July, contains among other articles: "Thomas Paine," with portrait, by our friend Wm. Henry Burr; "Thomas Paine and the American Revolution," by George Lippard, and essays on Lincoln, Civil-Service Reform, and Scientific and Pseudo Legislation. The August number contains an article on Darwinism, by Prof. Lester Ward, and "Thomas Paine—Was He Junius?" by W. H. Burr. Per year, $3; M. H. Meagher, 90 Euclid ave., Cleveland, O.

We hav received the third annual report of the national commissioner of labor, 1887. This volume is devoted to Strikes and Lockouts. This is a useful book for students of the labor question, and can probably be obtained of the government printing office. Its 1,200 pages contain tables of strikes by years, states, industries, and causes; of lockouts classified as preceding; decisions of courts concerning strikes, combinations, conspiracies, boycotts, etc.; general analysis. "The industrial disturbances," says the commissioner, "which hav been so frequent in this country since 1877 really establish the period as one of strikes and lockouts."

A few who disbelieve in the anthropomorphic Jehovah yet feel a spirit of devotion toward the Force, the Unknowable, which some skeptics continue to predicate behind all phenomena. Edward Reynolds Roe, M.D, in "God Reigns," advocates the veneration of some such being, and even wishes the employment of the term God. His book is written in a style of eminent clearness, is very interesting, and will be welcome to all of similar thought. Copious quotations are made from Darwin, Haeckel, Huxley, Tyndall, and other scientists. Boston: Laird & Lee.

We hav received "Sacred Chronology," a Christian defense of biblical records, Pacific Press Publishing Co., Oakland, Cal.; "An Essay on Immortality," Spiritualist, by Mary and James Vincent, Tabor, Iowa; an absurd work called "The Inspiration of the Bible," No. 1 of the Anti-Infidel Library, Scriptural Tract Repository, 47 Cornhill, Boston, Mass.; "The Higher Education a Public Duty," advocating collegiate education for all, by J. Edward Simmons, LL.D.; a book requesting "International Copyright in Works of Art," by Thomas Humphry Ward; "The Human Soul," by W. Parker, M.D., Nashville, Tenn., a work strangely citing as authorities Huxley and Job, Tyndall and Nehemiah; Dictionary of Volapük, L. Schick, Chicago, 50 cents; "The Great Pyramid," holding that "the Great Pyramid was built by men inspired by God," written by Chas. Latimer and published by C. H. Jones, Chicago; an immoral book called "The Song of Songs," translated from the Hebrew by Rev. W. C. Deland, Leonardsville, N. Y.; and a faith cure work, "A Modern Pentecost: An Account of the Marvelous Ministry and Mediumship of the Rev. John Crapsey."

"Mildred Eagleton and other Good and Bad Ballads," by A. N. Nichols, published at Chicago by Dodder, Nichols & Fagg, at 25 cents, contains wicked but amusing and witty poetry and prose, of which we present as samples:

RELIGIOUS EVOLUTION.

The church, in this progressiv age,
Is changed in names, if not in nature;
Its shrewd, time-serving managers
Hav softened down its nomenclature.

No more they preach eternal "hell,"
To shock the ears of youths and ladies;
But sometimes, in an undertone,
Politely speak of hades.

Sinners of old were "damned," by God,
Who poured his wrath in stintless measure;
But now the worst that can befall
Is to incur "divine displeasure."

If this goes on, in course of time,
When things shall reach their final level,
They'll make the "pit" a pious place,
And canonize the devil.

MIRACLES MADE EASY.

To turn water into wine—dilute your claret.

To raise the dead—join a resurrectionist party of medical students.

To make the deaf hear—make a disparaging remark about him in his presence.

To make the lame walk—take him to the theater and get some fool in the gallery to yell "fire!"

To make the blind see—let him fall on the ice with full force on the back of his head. He will immediately see stars.

Those interested in metaphysics will find it profitable to read "Hylo-Idealism, or Auto-Centricism: A Unification of Natural and Transcendental Philosophies," published by Watts & Co., London. The book aims at a reconciliation of Materialism and idealism or transcendentalism, on the lines of thought laid down by Robert Lewins, M.D., a noted liberal Materialist. Perhaps a more useful book is "The Future of Morality," by M. S. Gilliland, published by the same firm. The writer shows that morality is not dependent upon religion. We extract:

"One may not believe in religion, but one must support it for the sake of morality," is the expression of a prevalent state of mind. . . . Let us examin our consciousness a little on this point. If there were no code of morals backed by supernatural authority, and telling us "Thou shalt not steal," "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not commit adultery," would it be a matter of perfect indifference to us whether our property were stolen, our lives in hourly danger, husbands and wives habitually unfaithful, society generally impure? Obviously not. But, if not, what need of a supernatural revelation to inform us on these points? It is surely inconceivable that, if religion were universally destroyed to-morrow (wholly impossible as an occurrence, but intelligible as a supposition), the order of things should be so changed that a liability to be murdered would be thought desirable, a thief eagerly welcomed in every community, a cheating tradesman patronized and an honest one slighted, kindness and faithfulness in the married relations regarded with contempt, licentiousness and cruelty admired. If rightness or wrongness in conduct, then, is to be decided by an estimation of results, and if the results are clearly discernible by unaided human reason, what possible grounds can we hav for fearing that, if deprived of the guidance of a supernatural authority, we shall be without adequate means of knowing good from evil?

Freethinkers wishing arguments and testimony to combat the gross and baseless mendacity that Christianity elevated woman should procure Vol. II, just published, of Saladin's "Woman: Her Glory, Her Shame, and Her God." The writer has ransacked ancient history and modern records, and compiled evidence of countless cases bearing on the subject of his book. The work is racy in anecdote, bitter in denunciation of Christian hypocrisy and wrong-doing, and merciless in exposing the depravity of phases of Christian civilization and in stripping the veil from Christian professions. Saladin's indignation reaches a white heat when he considers the abuse the women are subjected to by brutal husbands, good Christians all, and he also uses scorching language in writing of the pestilential institutions known as monasteries and nunneries of the Romish church. We may present a few of the confirmatory citations he has collected so exhaustivly and overwhelmingly, with one or two of his own numerous charges against Christianity generally:

Beyond a few hackneyed texts that are repeated as cabalistic charms rather than as aphorisms with any rational and specific meaning, the ordinary Presbyterian or Episcopalian Christian knows next to nothing of Christianity. He is utterly ignorant of its career through history, and he is not possessed of the power of generalization necessary to recognize its aggregate effect upon the tone and the polity of modern life. The one thing the ordinary Christian is ignorant of is Christianity. . . . What has the ordinary Christian to do with thought and study? They require more self-abnegation and toil than he cares to command. Besides, in his fullness of the holy spirit he can dispense with thought and study. He can carry on a big debate with the saber and conduct a domestic discussion with a poker; why should he trouble to be thoughtful and studious? . . . Woman is now the last and only pillar of Christianity on the globe. . . . He who takes to gospel-mongering as a business lies instinctivly. . . . "No society which preserves any tincture of Christian institutions is ever likely to restore to women the personal liberty conferred on them by the middle Roman law," writes Maine. . . . "We are continually told," remarks John Stuart Mill, "that civilization and Christianity hav restored to woman her just rights. Meanwhile the wife is the actual bond-servant of her husband; no less so, as far as legal obligation goes, than slaves commonly so called." . . . "Women," says Gage, "were taught by the church and state alike that the feudal lord or seigneur had a right to them, not only against themselvs, but as against any claim of husband or father. The law known as Marchetta, or Marquette, compelled newly-married women to a most dishonorable servitude. They were regarded as the rightful prey of the feudal lord from one to three days after their marriage, and from this custom the eldest son of the serf was held as the son of the lord, 'as perchance it was he who begat him.'" . . . And it is God's strongest evidence of his mercy to the human race that the faith of the Nazarene carpenter has ceased to succeed. Where "Christ and 'im crucerfied" goes bayonet goes, brandy goes, syphilis goes, and all the black items in the calendar of crime. We hav the testimony of contemporary chroniclers that, in the church's infancy, Christ and crime were nearly synonyms. And now, in the dotage and decrepitude of the same church, Christianity and criminality go hand in hand. That the European and Christian quarters of such cities as Calcutta, Canton, and Constantinople are far more immoral than the nativ quarters of these cities is a mere truism. As far as India is concerned, according to figures recently published under Christian auspices, thus stand the statistics of crime:

Among Europeans in India.....	1 in 274
Among nativ Christians.....	1 in 699
Among Hindoos.....	1 in 1 361
Among Buddhists.....	1 in 3 784

Christians hav such a convenient subterfuge of casting all their sins on Jesus that they seem to commit sins at such a tremendous rate as if it were their intention to try how many sins Jesus can bear without breaking his back. . . . Well may Buckle remark: "The increase of the power of the clergy is incompatible with the interests of civilization. If, therefore, any religion adopt as its creed the necessity of such an increase, it becomes the bounden duty of every friend of humanity to do his utmost to destroy the creed, or, failing that, to overturn the religion."

The price of "Woman," Vol. II, is $1.25.

ELMINA ON AN ANTI-SPIRITUALIST BOOK.

"Two Years Among the Spirits, in the Godless Town of Liberal." This is the title of a pamphlet published at 25 cents by Dr. J. B. Bouton, Liberal, Mo., giving the history of his experiment at playing the medium. While I cannot approve of the deception practiced by the doctor and his confederates, yet in accordance with the theory of making the most and the best of what is, I believe in utilizing to the utmost the information and record of experience thus given to the world. The result of Dr. Bouton's work has been precisely the same as was that of Mr. Truesdell's, though in a less degree, as his experience was only for two years, while Truesdell's went on for fifteen or twenty years. But the great importance of Dr. Bouton's scheme rests in the fact that it occurred in the only Infidel town in the world, and among supposably the most radical of unbelievers, and yet it proved a perfect success, even taking in and blinding G. H. Walser, the founder of the town, himself, and I must confess that so firmly was my faith established in the honesty and practical integrity of the Liberals at Liberal, that I was staggered at the published accounts and private letters I received from them, and though still believing that death ended all, I thought it possible that there might be real phenomena there worth going to see. But the slate-writing I had no belief in. The two slatefuls sent me, purporting to come from my dear old friend D. M. Bennett, had not a single line in them that one such as Bennett would naturally hav written me. I cannot begin to giv you an idea of the book, more than that it is such an exposé as probably nine out of ten of all the public mediums might make if they only would honestly do so. But few people hav courage, even if they hav the desire, to own up to a systematic effort at deceiving their fellow-creatures, even though the deception were done for their own good. The role of the detectiv is never a pleasant one, or an exactly honorable one, though the end may justify the means. Even when a medium does confess it was all deception, the believers in the ism will insist they were real mediums, but in a few cases simulated phenomena for purposes of greed and gain. There is a record in this book of "five good men and true" who swore before a notary that it was "utterly impossible" that the slate-writing could occur through visible and tangible human agency, yet the fire upon the premises exposed the means by which it was done. And right here let me say that I believe that if Keeler would honestly confess the bed-rock facts we should learn just how the "impossible" in the experience of the Burrs could be removed, and most, if not all, of the phenomena in the case be simply and naturally explained. I hope hundreds of thousands of these books of Bouton's will be sold, read, and pondered upon. I think that my own special friends will be interested in reading the letters from me that are a part of the history also, and those of my opponents, who were so "sure." We may see from it all how easily people may be mistaken, and how supremely easy it is to deceive and dupe even wise and intelligent thinkers. I hav some of the very warmest and best of friends among the believers in Spiritualism, and many of them far more wise, learned, and intelligent than I ever claimed to be, but I cannot take their dictum or judgment when it antagonizes the whole body of my present philosophy, experience, and information. I believe that the book of Dr. Bouton, like the "Bottom Facts of Spiritualism," will be a means of unveiling the naked truth to thousands of anxious inquirers all over the land. Yours for real facts, though they shake the foundations of every beloved and cherished theory of a lifetime.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

OUR UNCLE AND AUNT. By Amarala Martin. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. Cloth, 223 pp., $1.00. Can be ordered, like every other book mentioned in these columns, of the Truth Seeker Company.

Many wish occasionally to relax brains strained over polemical essays, in some work of fiction, and to such we commend this work. It is written in a thoroughgoing Liberal and reform spirit, is pleasing and highly interesting in character and incident, and will be an excellent instrument, lent to a Christian friend, of smuggling truth into the brains of those averse from studying heavier works. While woman suffrage is championed, the objects of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and allied organizations are unremittingly combated with vigor and success.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

SNAKES!

And the Lord sent fiery serpents among the people, and they bit the people; and much people of Israel died.—Num. xxi, 6.

Odds and Ends.

"Now, Waldo," said a Boston lady, "the minister is to dine with us to-day, and I want you to be a good little boy." "Yes, mamma." "And if the subject of prize-fighting is introduced at the table, you must be sure and say slogger, not slugger."

WIFE (to country editor): "Aren't you feeling well to-night, John?" Country editor: "Not very, my dear. An indignant subscriber came into the office this afternoon and mopped up the floor with me." Wife (anxiously): "Heavens, John, I hope he didn't stop his paper, too!"

FIRST speculator: "I see by the paper that dueling is being revived in France." Second speculator: "I go to France on the first boat." "Not to fight a duel?" "No; going over on business." "Business?" "Yes, I'm going to take over a cargo of blank cartridges."

SHE: "Were you at Saratoga last season, Mr. Van Couver?" Mr. Van Couver (a nine-dollar-a-week clerk): "Aw—no; I spent last summer—er—abroad." She: "Why, so did I, Mr. Van Couver, and the musketoes were something terrible, particularly about Bergen Point."

"AND so that is the 'Adams House?'" he said inquiringly to his companion, as they stopped on the opposit side of the way, and watched the crowd of elegantly dressed ladies at the marble portals. "Why, I don't see any name on it." "No," said his informant, "I only judge by the eaves."

"PAPA, what do they hav that crowbar strapped up there for?" said the small boy in the railway car. "That, my boy," replied pater familias, sinking hot and frantic into his seat with a sprained wrist and half his thumb-nail gone after a three-minute wrestle with the car window; "that, I suppose, is for the brakeman to open these blanked windows with."

"I AM in terror," sighed poor Mrs. Goodmother, "every time I hear the bell ring. I know I'll hear something dreadful about Jack. I'm sure he's been into some awful mischief." "What makes you think so?" asked her husband. "Oh, he came directly home from school this afternoon, sat down and studied his lesson for to-morrow for nearly two hours, and has been as good as an angel ever since. Dear, dear, what has that boy been up to, I would like to know."

JACK HOPKINS had been in the workhouse as a vagrant, in jail for stealing, kicked out of all the free-lunch rooms, and finally smuggled himself into a gambling-room to beg for a quarter to get something to eat, but all refused him. He stood for a time looking very sad and forlorn, when a gambler slapped him on the shoulder and said: "What lay will you try next, Jack?" "I'm going to join the church." "When?" "To-morrow night at the prayer-meeting." "All right, some of us will be up and see how you do it." Next night found Jack well forward at the prayer-meeting, at the south end of the room, and a gambler in the northeast corner, with another in the southeast corner, so disguised that Jack did not know them. When opportunity came Jack rose, looking extremely sorrowful, and began: "My Christian friends, I hav experienced a change of heart, and——" "Louder!" shouted the gambler in the northeast corner. Jack knew him and was very angry, but he began again, in a louder tone: "My Christian friends, I hav experienced a change of heart, and——" "Louder!" yelled the other gambler. By this time Jack was mad all through, and he fairly shrieked: "My Christian friends, I hav experienced a change of heart!" With a demoniacal expression on his face he stared at the second gambler for a moment, and then added: "Did you hear that, you damned cuss?"

ON THE BEACH.

HE:
Bel'e, I've sought you all the morning,
I return to town to-day;
Pardon if I gave no warning,
There is something I must say.

SHE:
Sought so long! you must be weary!
Are you ill? You look quite pale;
When you go life will be dreary!
Well, I'm ready for your tale.

HE:
I can keep it back no longer—
Belle, I need you in my life;
Will is strong, but love far stronger—
Dear one, will you be my wife?

SHE:
Be your wife? Your words seem braver
Than they seemed in days of yore;
But your love would surely waver,
Now as then—please say no more.

HE:
Ah, you jest! Though once I faltered,
Failed your heart to comprehend,
Never once my feelings altered,
Not alone did I offend.

SHE:
Was I fickle in those hours?
Ah, perhaps 'twas better so;
'Mid the score that owned your powers,
My poor heart was quite de trop!

HE:
So it ends, then? I hav spoken
Words that liv until I die;
And you smile while hearts are broken!
Belle, God bless you, dear! Good-bye!

SHE:
Good-bye? I could always tease you!
Take my hand before you go,
And, if it would really please you,
Keep it, Jack, for weal or woe.

EACH of two conflicting nations consecrates its flags; and whichever conquers sings a Te Deum.—Spencer.

As to those other moralists who are called preachers, none of them hav ever dared to preach against war. They declaim against the sensual appetites after taking their coffee. They anathematize love. They labor to prove mysteries of which they hav not the least idea. But they are careful not to decry war, which unites in its manifestoes everything which the vilest perfidy can suggest, which exhibits the basest knavery in the fitting out our armies, and which in its plunder, violation, theft, homicide, destruction, and devastation, affords everything that is shocking in the most abandoned robberies. On the contrary, these good priests bless and consecrate the standards of murder; and their brethren, for the sake of money, chant Jewish songs when the earth has been covered with blood.—Voltaire.

VOLTAIRE died immortal. He departed laden with years, laden with works, laden with the most illustrious and the most fearful of responsibilities, the responsibility of the human conscience informed and rectified. He went cursed and blessed, cursed by the past, blessed by the future; and these, gentlemen, are the two superb forms of glory. On his deathbed he had, on the one hand, the acclaim of contemporaries and of posterity; on the other, that triumph of hooting and of hate which the implacable past bestows upon those who hav combated it.—Hugo.

Nature's pluck means extermination.—Huxley.

CAIN. And this is Life!—toil! and wherefore should I toil?—because
My father could not keep his place in Eden.
What had I done in this?—I was unborn:
I sought not to be born; nor love the state
To which that birth has brought me. Why did he Yield to the serpent and the woman? or,
Yielding, why suffer? What was there in this?
The tree was planted, and why not for him?
If not, why place him near it, where it grew,
The fairest in the center? They hav but
One answer to all questions, "'Twas his will,
And he is good." How know I that? Because
He is all-powerful, must all-good, too, follow?

[IT may be amusing to read the lord chancellor's decision on an application by Byron's publisher, Feb. 9, 1822, for an injunction against publishers who were pirating "Cain:" "This court, like the other courts of justice in this country, acknowledges Christianity as part of the law of the land. . . . Now, this publication, if it is one intended to vilify and bring into discredit that portion of scripture history to which it relates, is a publication with reference to which . . . the party could not recover any damages in respect of a piracy of it. . . . AN old gypsy named Rafael has asked the emperor of Austria to invest him with the dignity of king of the gypsies, because he can prove his direct descent from King Pharaoh.

IN case of Harrison's election, says the World, his $10,000 subscription ought to entitle Elliott F. Shepard to a consulship. The Sunday Islands would be just the place for him.

A WOMAN has been elected superintendent of schools at St. Johnsbury, Vt. Her name is Miss Belle P. Small, and she is a graduate of the New Hampshire normal school of Amherst.

JUDGE DAVENPORT, of Kansas City, refused to fine three girls brought into his court on charge of wearing male apparel, holding the law to be unconstitutional, and remarking that he presumed there were twenty-five thousand women in the United States wearing male clothing.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN says that the only way to stay the ravages of the yellow fever in Florida is to re-establish pub ic confidence. The Galveston News thinks that though this is a new treatment, it may possibly be better than firing a cannon at invisible germs, which resulted in actual harm by breaking windows and annoying the sick.

THE late Prof. Richard A. Proctor will be greatly mourned in England. Of him Edmund Yates says that he was perhaps more widely known than any other scientific man of the day. "As a lecturer he was unsurpassed. His fugitiv articles, conversations, and letters hav familiarized outsiders with the deepest thoughts of experts. A very potent force and a stimulating factor is extinguished."

CHILI has seized Easter Island, in the eastern part of the Pacific, distant about 2,300 miles from the coast of South America. It is inhabited by Polynesians. This is the island upon which are to be found gigantic stone statues fairly well chiseled into likenesses of the human form. Who the sculptors were who cut these stones has never been learned. Chili wants to make a penal colony of the island and put her prisoners to work in the quarries.

THE Prohibitionists of Leavenworth, Kan., are crusading against the saloon-keepers and fining them from $100 to $200 each, and putting them in jail for thirty or sixty days. Sheriff Churchill, however, seems to sympathize with his prisoners, for he is accused of making "trusties" of them and giving them the freedom of the city during the day and once going off on a fishing excursion with some of them to Missouri, and a suit has been brought to oust him from office.

THE Christian Advocate says: "It is obvious that the Romanists mean an aggressiv war upon the public schools. The supporters of the public-school system need to exercise the best judgment, avoid extravagance, and take only positions which they can maintain, and which can be defended upon the principles of our government; and then make a defense so vigorous as to show that the American people will not close their public schools and remand education to the sects, nor pay one dollar of taxation to support sectarian schools." But the Advocate desires that Protestantism should be taught in all public schools.

THERE is an inclination at present, says the World, to omit the word "obey" in the marriage service. Under the new order of things a woman promises "to love, honor, and cherish" her husband, but does not contract to submit to his commands. There is good reason for the change. A man who takes to himself a wife acquires a helpmeet, not a slave. But, for all that, in a well-regulated household the man should be chairman ex officio when matters of importance are under consideration. When a wife seizes the scepter peace is apt to fly out at the window.

WHEN Mrs. Mary E. H. G. Dow was made president of the Dover (N. H.) Horse Railroad Co., in January, 1888, the stock of the concern was worth only $5 or $7 a share, and the road was heavily in debt. The directors hav just declared a twenty per cent dividend, and shares are now worth more than $100 apiece. The dividend is paid from the earnings of the road, and there is a surplus in the treasury. All this has been accomplished by the energy and executiv ability of Mrs. Dow. When she was elected president many people thought that a mistake had been made. They were greatly at fault.

FREDERICK W. CLOUGH, an engineer of the Comstock mines, has returned from a trip among the Sierras, in Tulare county, Cal., and reports finding a tree of the sequoia species which he thinks is bigger than the biggest big tree of Mariposa or of Calaveras. He and his companions had no measure except a rifle which they knew was four feet long. They measured the tree as high above the ground as they could reach, and it was forty-four lengths of the gun in circumference. This monster stands in a small basin near the Kaweah river, and is surrounded on all sides by walls of rugged and steep rocks.

OVER 200 deaths hav occurred at Jacksonville since the yellow fever appeared there. Last week 118 new cases were reported in one day. The fever seems to be spreading, and a state of panic exists in many parts of the South. Jackson, Miss., reports severa cases of fever which hav the characteristics of Yellow Jack, and Memphis and Vicksburg hav established vigorous quarantines. Decatur, Ala., claims to hav some cases of genuin yellow fever. Six weeks, at least, will elapse before the South can hope for sufficient frost to destroy the fever germs, and the outlook is anything but pleasant for that section.

THE directors of various public libraries in England hav declared that "Robert Elsmere" is a pernicious novel and should not be permitted to poison the public mind. There is something ludicrous about this. In those same libraries can be found Ouida's works, "As In a Looking-Glass," translations of Zola's novels, and other books equally objectionable on high moral grounds. But none of these works suggest revolt against any of England's cherished institutions. They put forward, for instance, no doubt regarding the vigor and grandeur of the Established church of England. They are evil, in their way, but they do not shock British conservatism. But "Elsmere," an elevating book morally, attacks certain theories dear to England, and so it is boycotted!

Babylon.

It is said in the Bible that to stop the tower of Babel from reaching heaven God confounded the language of the workmen. Now, there is scarcely a sane person on earth to-day, nor do I suppose there was in that day, not knowing that if heaven was more than one thousand five hundred feet above the earth, no human hands could rear a tower to it. Surely the God of the Bible knew that. And, besides, it is a conceded fact that this tower was erected for an astronomical observatory, and was used for that purpose as long as it stood, which was about one thousand three hundred years. Says the Christian's adopted God: "Go to, let us." Now, it seems that the words, "Go to," are of the same nature as "catch on," "tumble to the racket," and the like, and are, therefore, not as dignified and majestic as we would expect to hear from an infinit and supreme being. "Go to, let us." Now, I most respectfully ask who is "us?" "Confound their tongues." I quote from Rollin's history of the Assyrians. Rollin was a religious enthusiast, and whenever he could insert in his writings a word favorable to religion and the Bible he would do so. And whenever profane history conflicted with the Bible he would invariably discard the writings of ancient historians and substitute those of the Bible instead. But occasionally in his writings, and quotations from ancient authors, who wrote long before we hav any evidence of the existence of the Bible, he was honest enough to write some things that did conflict with the Bible. For this the church placed his writings under a sort of a religious ban, and tried to make it appear they were not authentic. The church has done the same thing with almost every author that ever wrote a word conflicting with the Bible, no matter how truthful his works might be.

Rollin says, then: "That it is generally conceded that Semiramis, the widow of King Ninus, who was a son of Nimrod, and consequently a great-grandson of Noah, founded Babylon about the year 2204 B.C." The Bible says Nimrod built Babylon, and the author I am quoting from says Nimrod and Belus were the same, and were afterward worshiped as a god.

From what can be gathered from ancient writers on this subject, this great city was partly built by Ninus, who died before it was finished, and his widow Semiramis completed it in the year 2204 B.C., making it one hundred and fifteen years after the deluge, according to the chronology of the Bible, and according to the Chronologica Index fifty years before the flood. Now, the reader will bear in mind that according to the writings of Diodorus, Herodotus, and other ancient historians, this great city of wonderful temples, palaces, bridges, aqueducts, hanging gardens, and other great structures, was built by the descendants of one man—Ham—of the four that survived the flood one hundred and fifteen years previous. Rollin says—and for the truth of it he refers us, giving book and page, to the ncient authors he quotes from—"that Ninus, after aving received powerful succor from his neighbors, he Arabians, took the field, and in the space of seventeen years conquered a vast extent of country from the Egyptians. Upon his return he built Nineveh, a city of sixty miles in circumference, with walls one hundred feet high. After he had finished this prodigious work, he resumed his expedition against the Bactrians. His army consisted of one million seven hundred thousand foot, two hundred thousand horse, and one thousand six hundred chariots armed with scythes."

This, of course, was a very small portion of the descendants of one of the sons of Noah in one hundred and fifteen years. Soon after this Ninus died, leaving his widow, Semiramis, queen. She proposed to herself to surpass all her predecessors in magnificence, and to that end she determined to complete Babylon. She had two million men in her employ, and when done the walls that surrounded it were three hundred and fifty feet high and eighty-seven feet thick, with one hundred brass gates. A branch of the river Euphrates ran through it, and it was spanned by magnificent bridges. Then there were the sculpture, palaces, hanging gardens, and other wonders, that almost everyone is familiar with.

Another of the great works of Babylon was the temple erected to the worship of Beles, or Baoul—strange that the third or fourth generation from Noah should be worshiping strange gods. The most wonderful thing about this temple was a finished tower higher than the pyramids, upon the top of which was an astronomical observatory. Students of ancient history, as well as authors that hav written upon this subject, almost universally agree that this is the tower that the God of the Hebrews is said to hav stopped the work upon by the confusion of tongues. Instead of the work being stopped, it was finished, and the tower stood for over thirteen hundred years. It was finally destroyed by Xerxes after he conquered Babylon, about 500 B.C., so that the "Go to, let us go down [it seems he must hav been up] and confound their tongues" story won't stand the test.

We hav, then, the fact of the existence of two wonderful cities. In the building of one of them there were engaged two million men; and as an additional example of their wealth may be mentioned the temple of Belus, containing a statue of gold forty feet high, and total treasures amounting in value to the enormous sum of £21,000,000 sterling. These statements are generally conceded to be true, and we see it simply impossible for this immense number of people and these enormous treasures to be the increase and accumulations of the descendants of one man of the four that survived the flood one hundred and fifteen years previous. Is it any wonder, then, that Rollin should say: "I must own I am somewhat puzzled with a difficulty that may be raised against the extraordinary things related of Ninus and Semiramis, as they do not seem to agree with the time so near the deluge. I mean such vast armies, such numerous cavalry, so many chariots armed with scythes, and such immense treasures of gold and silver, all of which seem to be of a later day." Such an increase could not be even if we could extend the time back to Adam without a universal deluge intervening. The time from the creation to this period is some less than the time from the Christian era up to the present. Now, if there was but one man and woman in the world eighteen hundred and eighty-eight years ago, no one nation could to-day raise such vast armies, such immense treasures, and no nation could put two million men to work to build a city. It could hardly hav been done even if we include the populous nations that existed before Christianity began. Then, the only way out of this puzzle is to admit that Adam and Eve were not the first people that existed, but that the world was thickly populated before the so-called creation, and that the flood only covered a very small portion of Asia instead of the entire earth.

How much better it is to assign to extraordinary occurrences, or stories, a natural meaning or explanation, than an unnatural one? In reference, then, to the story of the flood. The author—whoever he was—was narrating the history of one man and one woman, whom he called Adam and Eve, who, he says, came into existence in a miraculous way. The Bible itself is evidence that the author of the five books of Moses intended to serve up in these books a dish of horrors, miracles, mysteries, and exaggerations. This he succeeded in doing. He conjures up in his brain a supernatural and miraculous being, and, of course, such a being must do supernatural and miraculous things. Hence this being, according to this unknown author, made Adam out of dirt somewhere in the Eastern countries—he does not say where—and also did many other strange and wonderful things. Then the author says nothing about the immense number of people and nations that must hav existed at that time in other parts of the earth, but givs us a brief history and fabulous account of these two and their descendants. In the interval of time between the creation—as he calls it—and the flood, the descendants of these two people had increased to probably a million or more, and settled in some of the great valleys of that country, probably contiguous to some large river; then, as the book—in its exaggerated way—says, "The windows of heaven were opened, and the rain descended," causing this river to overflow its banks and arise to a greater hight than was ever known before, thereby causing a great flood in that part of the country and drowning many of the inhabitants of these valleys. Among the saved was one old fellow called Noah, who was the owner of a large boat in which he and his family, and all the animals he could get in it, embarked, landing safely on Mount Ararat. He, immediately upon landing, planted a vineyard, and as soon as it bore grapes, made wine and got gloriously inebriated in commemoration of this event. If there is any truth at all in the story, is not this version more reasonable and more natural than the wild and unnatural story of the Bible—especially that part of it that says that all the different animals, fowls, reptils, and insects went in two by two, male and female, after their kind? Now, there were at that day upon the face of the earth beasts, fowls, and creeping things of different species, that inhabited different portions of the globe, that would hav to swim or fly at least three thousand miles to get into the ark to keep from drowning, many of which could swim but a short distance, others could fly no further, while many others could neither fly nor swim, and no doubt would prefer to remain in their nativ jungles, even if they perished, to taking the risk of making such a long voyage by water to get into the ark. But let us stop here, and retrace our steps back to Babylon.

In the prophecies of Jeremiah, Isaiah, and other Bible fortune-tellers, there were dire calamities to befall Babylon, not one of which was ever fulfilled as prophesied. Isaiah xiii, 15–18, we read: "Everyone that is found shall be thrust through, and everyone that is joined to them shall fall by the sword. Children shall be dashed to pieces, wives ravished, young men dashed to pieces, and women ripped up." For the sake of mercy and humanity, every good-hearted person and Christian should be thankful that not one of these barbarous, savage, and inhuman threats and prophecies ever was fulfilled, for King Cyrus, the heathen that these self-made prophets said their God had selected to do these horrible deeds, was a good, humane, and merciful ruler, therefore he was the wrong man to select to do such bloody deeds.

From the writings of Diodorus, Arias, and other ancient authors can be gathered the facts that Cyrus, after besieging the city for some time without success, gave all necessary orders and exhorted his officers to follow him by representing to them that he marched under the order of the gods (not God). He caused the receptacles or ditches on both sides of the city to be opened, thereby draining the river Euphrates. Then by the river bed the troops entered the city. Instead of Isaiah's God drying up the river, as Isaiah said he would, Cyrus simply opened up the sluices, and the water ran out. To help Cyrus capture Babylon Isaiah said his Lord would make Belshazzar and his officers drunk. In these words: "I will make them drunken, saith the Lord." Does any Christian believe that their God ever made men drunk, or threatened to do so, especially in a case like this, so that they could be captured and their city destroyed? If the church claims that the prophecy of making Belshazzar and his fellow-revelers drunk was fulfilled, I shall not dispute the claim.

Cyrus having got possession of Babylon almost peaceably, only two or three thousand being killed, the garrison was pardoned, and all the inhabitants yielded. Not a woman ravished or ripped up, not a child dashed to pieces, not a stone of a house thrown down; on the contrary, for the size of the city, fewer lives lost, less destruction of property, than at any other conquest on record, considering the resistance that was made. Isaiah again said: "The Lord has raised up the spirit of the king of the Medes whose device is against Babylon to destroy it, because it is the vengeance of the Lord. And Babylon, the glory of the Chaldees, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah." The Lord of hosts then swore to all this, as though we would not take the word of the Lord of hosts unless he would swear to it. The Lord said to his anointed king, Cyrus (Cyrus was a heathen and a worshiper all his life of the gods of the pagan religion; for all that, according to this old Bible prophet, he was God's anointed), whom he had selected to destroy Babylon: "I will go before thee and make crooked things straight. I will break in pieces the gates of brass and cut asunder the bars of iron." Now, this was all to be done at the time Cyrus took Babylon, as already stated (see Isaiah). There was not a brass gate broken, no bar of iron cut asunder, not a house demolished, nor was the city destroyed to satisfy the vengeance of the Lord.

If the Lord said anything to his anointed king, Cyrus, this heathen king never said anything to the Lord; for he never in his entire life worshiped him, acknowledged him, or even knew of his existence, if we are to believe ancient history. Even that prognosticator of evil, Isaiah, says in chap. xlv, 4, 5, in speaking of Cyrus: "The Lord surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me. I girded thee, though thou hast not known me." A Reminiscence.

From Zion's Watchtower.

A large number of copies of the Bible were recently burnt in Barcelona, Spain, by order of the government—of course at the instigation of the church at Rome. The following, translated from the Catholic Banner, the organ of papacy there, shows that they approved and appreciated the action. It said:

"Thank God, we at last hav turned toward the times when those who propagated heretical doctrins were punished with exemplary punishment. The reëstablishment of the holy tribunal of the Inquisition must soon take place. Its reign will be more glorious and fruitful in results than in the past. Our Catholic heart overflows with faith and enthusiasm; and the immense joy we experience as we begin to reap the fruit of our present campaign exceeds all imagination. What a day of pleasure will that be for us when we see anticlericals writhing in the flames of Inquisition!"

To encourage another crusade, the same paper says:

"We believe it right to publish the names of those holy men under whose hands so many sinners suffered, that good Catholics may venerate their memory.

Man in Relation to the Lower Animals.

Prof. Edwin Emerson in Popular Science Monthly.

On the published bills and circulars of the Fidelity Trust Co., Philadelphia, is a representation of a strong-box guarded by a watchful dog. The faithful protection of the dog is a striking emblem of the mission of the Fidelity Trust Co. Fidelity to a trust is certainly a moral quality of a high order. This is such a well-known characteristic of the family of dogs as to hav become proverbial. It is a matter of common observation that members of the better class of dogs, such as Newfoundlands and St. Bernards, show also other moral qualities. They hav a high sense of honor, cannot be bribed, will not steal, etc., and are true to the death as to matters committed to their trust. To deny to such animals the possession of moral qualities seems to be absurd. But moral qualities and reasoning faculties are not confined, in the animal world, to dogs alone; far from it. Many tribes of animals hav the habit, when necessity seems to require, of posting sentinels to guard from surprise. This practice is in use by the chamois, the deer, the wolf, the goat, the wild horse, the elephant, the beaver, the monkey; the raven, the crow, and many other birds. To consider in advance as to the necessity of placing sentinels, and then to resort to that form of strategic device, is a decided proof of the possession of no small perceptiv and reasoning power; and the fact that the sentinels faithfully fulfill the onerous duties of their trust is a striking proof of advanced moral qualities.

Any theory in regard to man's place in nature which denies some degree of reason and moral perception to the lower animals is so wide of the facts that it must be a mistaken theory. It places man too high, and assigns to the various tribes of lower animals too low a position in the moral and intellectual scale to agree with observation. A wide and unnecessary chasm is thus placed between man and the inferior animals, when, in fact, the lower tribes of men and the higher tribes of animals, such as elephants, foxes, dogs, and monkeys, are not so greatly apart in the line of intelligence and moral perception. Savages recognize this affinity. Thus we are assured that certain tribes of negroes regard monkeys as their near relativs, who hav been deprived of the power of speech on account of their mischievousness and badness.

The wonderful manifestations of instinct are so remarkable that the old theory ascribed it to God himself having directly implanted it, "from without and from above;" but that theory has been set aside by modern investigation, and it is now very generally recognized that instinct is the hereditary result of long experience. This being the case, all the manifold exhibitions of reflection and reason, and careful, self-denying affection, shown by the various tribes of animals, must be ascribed to the workings of their intellectual and moral faculties through long periods of time.

Dr. Mark Hopkins, in his "Scriptural Idea of Man," teaches that man alone, among the animals upon the earth, is dignified by the possession of what constitutes him "a person." Personality, according to Dr. Hopkins, arises from consciousness, reason, and a moral nature. Consciousness is defined (p. 48) as "the knowledge of his own existence by a being who knows himself to be. . . . Thus arises a knowledge of rights and obligations. . . . Thus man is formed to rule over the lower creation. . . . From all that is below him man is most widely separated" (p. 106). "Of dominion over itself, over nature, or over its fellows, no brute can know anything; nor can it know anything of an intelligent mediation between nature and God. Being destitute of rational and moral elements, the brute cannot hav the first dawning of either of these ideas" (p. 103).

In reply to these statements we observe—that brutes do rule over themselvs, oftentimes exhibiting remarkable self-control. Nothing is more common than for the parent animal to abstain from food until the young ones are provided for. Brutes do rule over each other—scarcely any of the gregarious animals fail to show this power; it is true of monkeys, stags, elephants, bulls, and birds in their migrations. The shepherd's dog rules over the flock committed to his care almost as well as his master. As for dominion over nature, the brutes exercise just as much of it as is necessary for their well-being and preservation. A bird that builds its nest in a sheltered place exercises control over nature, in its degree, quite analogous to the work of a human architect. "The foxes hav holes, and the birds of the air hav nests." How does the fox get its hole, or the bird its nest? They make them for their purposes, and this is certainly control over nature to that extent. How does the fox support his family if he has no control over nature? Do hens and chickens run into his hole and ask to be eaten? Dr. Hopkins does not seem ever to hav heard of the way in which a tribe of monkeys prepare to rob a corn-field. Let us describe it. When they get ready to start on their expedition, an old monkey, the leader of the tribe, with a staff in his hand, so as to stand upright more easily, marches ahead on two legs, thus being more elevated than the others, so as to see signs of danger more readily. The rest follow him on all-fours. The leader advances slowly and cautiously, carefully reconnoitering in all directions, till the party arrives at the corn-field. He then assigns the sentinels to their respectiv posts. All being now in readiness, the rest of the tribe ravage and eat to their hearts' content. When they retire, each one carries two or three ears of corn along, and from this provision the sentinels are regaled on arrival at their lair. Here we see ability to rule and a willingness to submit to rule; a thoughtful preparation of means to the end in view, and a recognition of the rights of the sentinels to be suitably rewarded at the close of the expedition. Wherein does all this differ from a similar foray of a tribe of savage men? The only difference is in degree; otherwise, it is much the same. Dr. Hopkins's proposition that animals are not possessed of consciousness is mere assertion. He offers no proof whatever. A dog appears to be perfectly conscious of his existence. All his actions are in entire accordance with that view of his activity. Giv him a bone, and he seems to be conscious of his rights, too, and is ready to defend them. Observe a dog of one or two years of age and a child of four or five years playing together; they understand each other perfectly well, and seem to get equal pleasure out of the sport. Their consciousness of existence is about the same. When the dog gets older, and accompanies his master to hunt, he understands his duties, and performs them about as well as the man performs his share. The dog hunts as truly as the man; takes a lively interest in all the proceedings; is joyous over success, and cast down in case of failure. To deny consciousness to such a being is absnrd. It is quite true that the dog has not studied the Cartesian system of philosophy, and cannot say to himself, cogito, ergo sum; but neither can the boy who plays with him, nor, probably, the man who hunts with him. A power of analysis and metaphysical introspection is not possessed by young persons; nor, generally, by uncultivated men. They liv in the present. They are satisfied with a consciousness of existence, without prying curiously into its constituents. The power to dwell on the varying phases of the inner life, to analyze them, and to base the outlines of a system of intellectual and moral philosophy upon them, is the result of a high degree of culture and a habit of observing the operations and power of the mind.

It thus seems that what Dr. Hopkins demands as prerequisits of personality, viz., consciousness, reason, and a moral sense, are all to be found, in some degree, entering into the constitution of the lower animals. If man is a person, with the accompanying rights growing out of his personality, so is an elephant a person, in his degree, and has his rights accordingly; so is a dog, or a fox, etc., each in his degree. In this manner the immense chasm which Dr. Hopkins has invented as existing between man and the lower animals disappears, and the whole realm of animated nature is restored to unity, as the product of the divine mind. This view, as Dr. Hopkins acknowledges (p. 100), is entirely in accordance with the opinions of the great majority of naturalists now living.

A few words, in conclusion, as to Dr. Hopkins's idea of man being formed for dominion over the whole lower world of sentient being. While we admit that his higher powers giv him a certain amount of control over some of the lower and humbler creatures, it is to be borne in mind that innumerable millions of animals lived and roamed over the earth, through many geologic ages, before man appeared on the scene. Were they waiting all this time for their ruler? Man is a very recent animal, and does not go back, probably, further than the Tertiary period at the utmost. But, even since man appeared, his rule over the lower creation has been extremely limited. He has not exercised control over one in a million of the other orders of animals. Beyond a few animals he has been able to domesticate, his rule and kingship hav been practically null. Dr. Hopkins feels this difficulty as to his theory when he says (p. 105), "In this sphere his dominion is evidently most limited and imperfect compared with what it would hav been if he had not lost dominion over himself." If this is correct, it may be said in reply, that, since man has lost his dominion, it is needless to build up a theory upon the basis of his still retaining it.

Our London Letter.

The concessions made in the Oaths bill do not appear to hav given general satisfaction, and it is an open question whether it would hav been better to let the Bill be defeated on its merits as originally constructed, or to accept it in its mutilated form as an installment of a complete act of justice. It will be considered by the conservativ party as a final measure, and consequently prevent for some long time the matter being raised again, while on the other hand, had the bill been thrown out, it would hav been brought forward year by year until it was passed in its entirety, and with a radical government in power, there would scarcely be a difficulty in getting it through. As it originally stood it was a stumbling-block and a rock of offense to the orthodox party, who firmly believe in the virtue of an oath, probably because they are enjoined to "swear not at all," and it appears to many Freethinkers an act of weakness to study their prejudices, as they are so little inclined to giv way in the slightest respect to any wish expressed by their opponents.

Mr. Ross's action against the authors of the "Life of Bradlaugh," a scurrilous work that has missed its mark, has not resulted in any profit to himself, as he has lost his case and will hav to pay the costs of the proceedings. It is a pity he ever mixed himself up with such a crew. So able a writer should find himself well enough employed in attacking the Christian party, and compiling and editing his educational works, and not fall foul of one who is working in the same cause, though perhaps not exactly on the same lines as himself.

The godly-minded who regularly attend some particular "house of prayer," would be slightly astonished if they occasionally broke their rule and listened to a few of the peripatetic preachers in various parts of the metropolis. Any Sunday one may find at certain open spaces four or five different exponents of "gospel truths" stationed only a few yards from each other, and holding forth with much gusto upon their own particular interpretation of the "sacred scriptures." One of them will be denouncing all unbelievers, and consigning them to a place "where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched," and his next neighbor will clearly show that there is no such thing as eternal torment, as all who disbelieve in Christ hav no hereafter. A little further on, another will prove that those outside the pale will go to a modified kind of hell for purposes of disciplin, and will eventually drift into the realms of bliss, only they must not expect reserved seats. As all these different tenets are found to be in the "word," it is scarcely surprising that the humble doubter should be somewhat bewildered, and conclude to continue doubting and take his chances, as he can not very well believe in all the sects, and it is not to be expected that those who hav only one day in seven to themselvs can find time to discover which of them is correct.

Christianity in India.

From the Calcutta National Guardian.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF HIS WIDOW.

Hitherto the Christian missionary in India has been chiefly, if not solely, indebted to the periodical advent of famin for what success his proselytising mission has achieved in this land of the so-called "heathen." But the times are now sadly out of joint, and a case has recently occurred in the vicinity of Calcutta in which an old father, married, for the second time, to a necessarily young wife, embraced Christianity, not to attain his spiritual salvation, but to attain that very mundane consolation which is begotten of the assurance that his young widow will not be molested after his death—which in the nature of things cannot be too far off in his case—by her stepson. This son, the father apprehends, will neglect his stepmother when she becomes a widow, and will also deprive her of her property. So, to prevent the possibility of a consummation which he so devoutly dreads, the astute father has stolen a march upon his unsuspecting son by turning a Christian and indirectly cut him off with a shilling, while thus securing for his prospectiv widow every penny he may leave her. Such is the popular version of the secret cause of the conversion of Babu Russick Lall Sircar to Christianity at the age of sixty. The Babu is well known as the manufacturer of a series of keys to university textbooks, and has the reputation of being fairly well read in English literature.

ALL TO LEAVE AND FOLLOW THEE.

From the same paper.

The Rev. Mr. Phillips, of Moorshedabad, has, we presume, come out to India to glorify his Lord Jesus. But the way he does it can only serve to bring Christianity into disrepute and contempt. He is very proud of his success in having baptized a Hindoo woman named Brojeswari who has cheerfully left her husband and home for the sake of the Lord. He triumphantly seeks to demonstrate the potency of Christianity by referring to the fact that although the woman was kept in confinement, although her relativs left no stone unturned to prevent her from deserting her home, still such is the power of the Lord, such is the magical influence of his attraction, that no power on earth could stand between Brojeswari and her new-found Lord. We need not pause here to inquire into the antecedents of this woman, but the fact that she deserted her husband and decamped from her home is sufficient to indicate her character. The Rev. Mr. Phillips may be congratulated on this feminin acquisition to his fold, but we hold that man to be a greater sinner than the most sinful of "heathens," who allures a woman from her peaceful home and brings desolation upon her family and then takes glory on himself for his share in the business. As for Brojeswari, time alone will show whether in deserting her husband she obeyed the call of her heavenly Lord or that of a terrestrial substitute, and meanwhile we congratulate the Hindoo community of Moorshedabad on having got rid of her.

Sonnet to Shepard.

O Shepard of the blooming, star-eyed text,
Deep delver in the most bizarre of books
For that which cheers and oft inebriates;
O mortal who, if not a god then next,
A demigod—so help me all the spooks—
Of holiness that never abdicates!
O mortal banging on the edge of time,
With no particular desire to climb;
O man of full belief in Jonah's whale,
Of nickel-plated, jeweled righteousness,
Who takes the devil by the horns and tail,
And rattles him with strident printing-press!
O man of thews of gold and cheeks of brass,
Thou art almost the peer of Balaam's ass!

MRS. M. A. FREEMAN, Chair. Fin. Com., 241 Washington Boulevard, Chicago.

Official Call for Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Local Secular Unions, Life, Charter, and Annual Members, and all Liberal citizens who support the Nine Demands of Secularism, Greeting:

You are hereby invited to attend the Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, which will convene at Lafayette Hall, Wood street, near 4th, Pittsburgh, Pa., Friday, October 5, 1888, at 10 A.M, for a four days' session—5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th inclusiv.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State or Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Unions are entitled to seats and votes in this Annual Congress. Each Local Secular Union is entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates. Annual Members who pay or hav paid $1 in the national treasury are entitled to seats, but not to votes, except by unanimous consent of the Congress.

This Congress will specially consider practical questions tending to further agitation for taxation of church property; the abrogation of state aid to sectarian institutions; abolition of state, national, military, and prison chaplaincies; repeal of judicial oaths, Sunday and other oppressiv and unjust ecclesiastical laws; nullification of attempts to subvert our Constitution by a legal recognition of Theism in the American Magna Charta, and such other measures as will not merely thwart intended theological encroachments, but will absolutely expunge from our laws, state and federal, such insidious acts as hav already crept in to blot out mental freedom from our republic.

It is to be hoped that the addresses delivered will deal with the practical issues of the organization, so that there will be such an awakening of the people to these vital questions of the hour that a revival of the instinct of liberty and justice for all will necessarily result; that again from the Keystone state—the birthplace of our association—the clarion voice of freedom shall vibrate throughout the land.

Pittsburgh being situated almost in the center of a district containing many of our most distinguished workers, thinkers, and writers, besides the activ host within its limits, there is little doubt but that this Congress will be a glorious gathering of the forces who stand for mental liberty, as expressed in the desire for complete Secularization of the government.

Knocking the Bottom out of the Yellow Fever Scare.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I presume it is proper for me at this time to write you a few lines regarding the yellow fever, or the prevailing disease at Jacksonville. My health never was better than it is at present. I am not scared and I do not use any preventiv of the fever. If I die I want to die of the genuin yellow fever and not of its remedies. My family and my many clerks all enjoy good health and happiness. Was I the head ruler of the city the citizens should enjoy the same good health that I and my family do. I trust in purity, in an unadulterated atmosphere, pure as our god that a Freethinker loves to worship. Our church-going people seek protection, not of a wise god, no, but of a tar-and-sulphur fire and of other fumes emanating from poisons destructiv to pure air and human life. None of their remedies are good to ease the fever scare or cheer up the people and make them laugh, nor do they cool the hot fever of a suffering patient. All the remedies these God-forsaken people use as preventivs of yellow fever look to me precisely like a man's throwing heaps of dry wood onto a fire, hoping to extinguish the fire by that process. It is the scare and the remedies, not the yellow fever, our citizens suffer of. It is the fever scare, and the use of the poisonous disinfectants for fumigating the house, the clothes, the patient, and his companions, that increases the spread of the disea e It is the remedy, not the disease, that is contagious. I say it is exceedingly unwise and wicked of persons to expose timid, scared, and sickly persons to fumes emanating from the most powerful poisons destructiv to pure air and human life, under a pretext of protecting from a contagious disease and preserving their health and life. Is there anything more inhuman than this? It is an insult to the intelligence of the people of the United States to allow persons to remain in office who imagin that tar-and-sulphur fires, concussion, and the free use of powerful poisonous disinfectants and quarantine, could protect us or even cure us from ills caused from excessiv scare, fright, work, idleness, cold, heat, worry, drinking, eating, or inhaling adulterated atmosphere full of poison, to obviate the effect of the cause? Even if I admit, if it make their case on the other side any better, the existence of an invisible germ floating up in the atmosphere, even then it is an insult to the intelligence of the people of this whole country to teach that a picked guard, armed to the teeth, and quarantine officers stationed at the city lines, under a pretext of preventing the invisible germs and atmosphere from leaving the city line, can protect.

Jacksonville, Fla. AUGUST BUESING.

STATE OF FLORIDA, DUVAL COUNTY.

Before me, a notary public in and for the state of Florida at large, personally appeared A. H. Joplin, who being duly sworn, says that on or about Dec. 12, 1887, he was stricken down with what is now popularly termed yellow fever, which prevailed in the city of Tampa, Fla., at that time. He (the said A. H. J.) is of the opinion that it was the fumes and gases from the too free use of such powerful disinfectants as bi-chloride of mercury, sulphate of iron, and sulphur smoke, etc., that caused his sickness, and not the microbe.

To substantiate this view he states that at the time the supposed yellow fever broke out in Tampa he was engaged in teaching school, and was constantly exposed to the fever, on account of which some of the above-mentioned disinfectants were used every night in his room under a pretext of protecting him from the fever. On the night that the fever was contracted he states that sulphur was burnt and other disinfectants used in abundance, and that he was not sick at any time previous to the use of said disinfectant; but on the following morning, after having inhaled all night sulphur smoke, he was declared sick of yellow fever.

Sworn to and subscribed this 15th day of September, 1888.
[Seal.] A. H. JOPLIN.
A. R. JONES, Notary Public State of Florida at Large.

STATE OF FLORIDA, DUVAL COUNTY.

Before me, August Buesing, a notary public in and for said county, personally appeared R , who being duly sworn says: I was living at Jacksonville, at the Grand Union Hotel, in July last, and at the time when Mr. McC. was declared sick of yellow fever. He had just arrived from Tampa. He was taken at once to the pest-house with his whole family. His family never took sick at all, showing that the disease McC. suffered of was not a contagious disease. The announcement of the yellow fever being in the house frightened me and the rest of the boarders of the house. The whole house then was fumigated, under a pretext to stamp the yellow fever out of existence, and under a pretext to protect us from taking sick and to preserve our health and lives from ruthless destruction. No one of us was sick previous to the scare and the use of poisonous disinfectant. I and others soon took sick; some recovered, and some hav died.

Sworn to and subscribed this 15th day of September, 1888.
[Seal.] R.
AUGUST BUESING, Notary Public.

IS YELLOW FEVER A PRETEXT?

All persons who hav been inhumanly subjected and exposed to poisonous fumes of fumigation, and since hav suffered a disease from the effect of inhaling that poisonous air, and then hav been declared sick of yellow fever, or hav suffered other cruel treatment, are kindly requested to complain of it to August Buesing free of charge. Contributions to aid this investigation and the cure of the prevailing disease will be thankfully received. Call on, or address, AUGUST BUESING, Jacksonville, Fla.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., Aug. 15, 1888.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES-UNION: Allow me to ask, What seems to constitute at Jacksonville a yellow fever patient?

I regret to say, but I consider it a duty of mine to say it, that when a person in the months of August and September is found vomiting in consequence of a foul stomach that originates from excessiv drinking of intoxicating beverages, or gets bilious from an excessiv eating or of excessiv heat, scare and fright constitutes in Jacksonville the yellow fever as soon as one patient of this kind is found within the city. Yellow fever is, I presume, either ignorantly or foolishly officially declared epidemic.

How is the invisible yellow fever germ created?

You may not believe it, but let me tell you, it is created the moment the officer makes the declaration public that the yellow fever now is epidemic; it is the declaration that creates the invisible yellow fever germ from this moment on—every person gets crazy, frightened to death. This panic, this fright, the imagination of yellow fever on the brains and minds of the persons, is the real invisible yellow fever germ that all now hav in their systems; this scare, this fright, causes sickness and death. There is no poison in existence stronger to produce diseases, and that can kill human beings faster, than fright. I pronounce such declaration that frightens persons to death wicked. Concussion, the burning of houses, tar, sulphur, and other crazy suggestions that I hav read, must be considered wicked and foolish.

Well, what is the remedy?

PREVENTION.—REMEDY AND CURE OF YELLOW FEVER.

The following is respectfully suggested:

"Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Florida:

"Any person who shall hereafter declare a person or persons as having the yellow fever, shall, on conviction, be punished by imprisonment in the state penitentiary, not exceeding nor less than ten years, or by a fine not more than $10.000."

Such a law will stamp the yellow fever forever out.
Jacksonville, Fla. A. BUESING.

High Old Times Ahead in Chicago.

From the Ameri an Magazine.

Just at this time, I met an old army friend, whose work of a detectiv had led him to disguise himself and frequent the haunts of the Anarchists in quest of a criminal supposed to be in hiding among them. He told me of the plans they were hatching for a bloody and terrible avengement of their Chicago comrades, and for overturning society, and seizing and dividing among themselvs and the workingmen whom they expect to join them, all the money in bank vaults, the sub-treasury, and the portable valuables in stores and private houses throughout the city. I laughed at his pretty fable, and advised him to dramatize it, promising him at least a run of a hundred nights in all the principal cities. But the captain was not to be laughed down; he was terribly in earnest, and finally, his earnestness impressed me to the point of consenting to disguise myself and investigate in his company, to be vouched for by him as an English convert to Anarchistic principles. My friend's influence brought me at once into contact with the leaders; and, under the pretext of a burning desire to be of assistance in the grand coup d'etat, the captain's story was quickly confirmed.

Notice!

L K. Washburn is prepared to lecture in New England and New York. For subjects and terms address him at Revere, Mass.

THE Kent Secular Society will hold two mass-meetings in Kent, O., Monday and Tuesday evenings, Oct. 1, 2, 1888. A cordial invitation is extended to all, that the truths of Secularism may be better known. By order of the Kent Secular Union executiv committee. Charles Watts will be the chief speaker.

Thoughts on Agnosticism.

Prophetic eyes that hav been gazing with hopes so long deferred cannot fail to see faint but glorious gleams of a dawning age of progress and enlightenment; an age in which the dogmas and dicta of established beliefs are closely scanned and weighed before accepted, in which credulity ceases to be regarded as a virtue and investigation takes the place of blind faith; an age in which the practice of humanitarianism drives out the dogmas of a heartless and theoretical theology.

The best elements of Infidelity are not endeavoring to tear down obsolete idols and place new ones on their pedestals, but to build up and ennoble the human mind; to teach men not to investigate the intellectual and ethical world on crutches, but to rely on their god-given reason and the intuitions which our Mother Nature has given us.

Observant minds of the nobler cast look on man, the consummation of nature's grandest work, and where there would hav been under rational culture souls of god-like attributes, see souls dwarfed and deformed by religion; souls which if metempsychosized would seek the garb of the serpent, whose colors charm to look at while its kiss is death; or of the horrible jackal, who feeds on the human flesh of death, and with a malicious snarl fearfully flees at the approach of dawn to some catacomb which it has already desecrated and rifled; souls that would hide themselvs in the shaggy coat of the lion, "king of beasts," and exponent of physical bravado; souls that would clothe themselvs in the varying colors of the chameleon —nature's sycophant and hypocrit; souls that would masquerade as the vampire that steals on its victim in the night, soothing by the fanning of its wings while it sucks up the life-blood.

The church seems to hav retrograded till there is no ethical distinction between its adherents and those indifferent. It is true that it has its professed creeds and codes of morals, but these, in every-day life, are disregarded as being unpractical and unbusiness-like. The church has, in fact, lowered itself to the level of the ordinary society organization for mutual aid and social development. The virtues are eulogized and evils denounced in church, but evil in broadcloth in the bustling marts of commerce is greeted as deferentially as one of the canonical saints. Honest poverty is ignored. Charity is considered encouragement to idleness. Social intercourse is desired only from those of a superior or equal social and financial standing, without regard whether the man be a villain or an honest man.

The influence of the church is felt in all circles, not for the amelioration of the condition of man, but for means political, social, and commercial. Men who are in business adhere to the church, or keep up a strict neutrality, on motivs of policy. Women embrace the church for its undoubted social advantages. The church stands in relation to its members as a policeman to the citizen. Superficial obedience to the rules of the church are strictly enforced, but then the arm of authority reaches no farther. The church can insist on the observance of the Sabbath by an attendance to church formalities and a cessation of business, but they cannot drive out the selfishness of worldliness.

It may prohibit one from indulging in the orgies of the gambling-hell, but not from driving out all the joy and sunshine of his neighbor's home. The church is, in fact, a refuge to those whose lives and actions would not bear the scrutiny of an unprejudiced world; since from a feeling of fraternity, and, perhaps, mutual feeling of dependence, suspicion is not confirmed. It holds a sort of surveillance over public institutions and offices. An aspirant must certainly acquiesce to its dicta, or maintain a discreet neutrality, to attain to any degree of public patronage.

How many great minds there hav been who, having the courage to differ with its mythical and heartless creeds, hav blasted lives otherwise of success and honor—although, perhaps, to gather laurels for themselvs in posthumous ages! Yet brave souls unawed hav defied the most cruel fanaticism that ever existed, and advocated man's individuality, and liberty to think and to investigate the laws of nature and of morals. We owe a boundless gratitude to these intrepid men. Men who, without the mercenary fears of hell or hopes of heaven, hav heroically died for principles. Men who with the horror of the Inquisition staring them in the face hav declared the cosmogony of the scriptures to be only the crude and erroneous conception of man, instead of the inspiration of the Unknown. Men who hav braved all the monsters of the church, denounced the miracles as contrary to nature, and asserted they were only an effect of legerdemain or a natural exaggeration resulting from the repetition of facts from one to another and a tendency to impute a supernatural agency to any phenomenon they could not understand. Men who hav declared the plan of "atonement" to be a license to the hypocrit and scoundrel; an escape for the seducer, the murderer, and the criminal from a just punishment; an eternal inquisition to the investigator and honest doubter; a monster that severs prospectiv ties of family and friendship in the next world, and a bottomless gulf that swallows up the grand souls who hav parted the gloomy clouds of superstition, who hav vanquished the monsters of an infinit vengeance, and who hav made possible all the benefits of our modern civilization and enlightenment.

Men of this character liv to-day—men whose brains are too large and whose hearts are too full of the "milk of human kindness" to believe that an infinit father could institute and maintain an eternal inquisition that would make the hair of horror stand, for finite creatures of his own creation—men who will not believe that the largest part of all creatures made in God's own image are to be allowed to walk blindly into traps and snares set for them, the only exit from which is hell.

The church says that if we were to disperse these threatening clouds from the horizon of human joy—remove all the fears of hell and of a difficult path to heaven—there would be no restraints for the bad or incentivs to the good, the fears of natural and civic laws not being a sufficient restraint. Can they be justified in keeping this horrible menace in the mind's eye of ignorance and credulity solely for the supposed good it may produce as a restraint?

Do you think childhood will hav more mercy in its little heart for its dumb playfellow if it is taught these myths of an implacable vengeance? Do you think you produce better results in making man a moral creature through fear than through the medium of principles? Of what value is the obedience of quaking hypocritical cowardice? Is homage from the pale reluctant lips of cringing fear more sweet than the honest involuntary admiration of a healthy independence?

Do not add to the burdens of the bereaved mother "by preaching a creed that should only be shrieked in a mad-house." Do not giv her the consolation that she will so appreciate the justice of Divine Vengeance "that she will join him in the damnation of her own son." Do not thus brutalize the soul of childhood. Tear from every soul the chains of fear.

Let every soul fly out into the pure air of an honest morality. Let every man feel as if he were a king with unbounded dominions; as if every faculty and passion were a subject and not a master; as if he were a distinct individuality and not a fac-simile of any other; as if it were better to rescue misery from the slough than point the finger of scorn at him; as if the rule of love were better than the club of fear; as if it were better to be with the one we love in hell, than in heaven without her; as if it were better to love and protect the home, than leave all and follow one who never said a word to ennoble the domestic ties, but on the contrary taught their abandonment; as if it were better to believe that we would be punished according to our deeds, than that we held an unlimited letter of credit for all our misdeeds; as if it were better to believe that the greatest sum of human joy is made up by the purity of our life, than that the ægis of hypocrisy would shield us from the eye of a divine justice; as if it were better to send one ray of happiness into some poor outcast soul, than build a cathedral; as if one little deed of kindness were worth more than a thousand ostentatious prayers declaimed within the grandest specimens of church architecture.

Lincoln, Neb. E. K. PACKARD.

The Clergy and the Ballet.

A practical joke has been played on the clergymen of New York and Brooklyn by a theatrical manager. The spectacular drama of "Nero," at Staten Island, was the trap into which they were led by a circular sent to all the clergy of the two great cities and vicinity, reading as follows:

> The closing scenes in the life of Nero hav always had a special interest for the Christian world. The final triumph of the cross is a sermon in itself, rising, as it does, amid the strains from the "Stabat Mater" above the ruins of the great city whose terrible destruction is so vividly set forth. If you will do me the favor to accept an invitation to visit this spectacle and notify me on the within postal card, I will gladly send tickets for yourself and family. Transportation over the Staten Island ferry will be included.

On the back of the inclosed card the clergyman was requested to write the number of tickets he wanted, and sign his name. In less than a week 313 ministers responded from the two cities and vicinity, asking for 1791 tickets in the aggregate. A very few were modest enough to ask for only 2 tickets, but one wanted 34, another 30, and so on down, the average being nearly five and a half to each preacher.

The Rev. George H. Mayer, of Brooklyn, having a large family, asked for 10 tickets, and he promised to "invite others to pay their way in," believing "it is our duty to send our Christian people to receive two hours' impressiv illustrativ instruction upon the truths of Christianity."

The Rev. William Walton, of New York, wanted 10 tickets for himself and 20 at a reduced price for his Young People's Literary Association. He, too, regarded such an exhibition as "an incentiv to the study of early Christian history," and calculated to impress upon the mind the fact that:

> Others fought to win the prize,
> And sailed through bloody seas.

The names of all these 313 ministers are given to the public in the New York Sun of Sunday, September 9th. And the Sun, you know, is a religious paper. So, at least, its learned editor has repeatedly asserted; but if the question were now left to the 313 ministers their verdict would doubtless be unanimous and emphatic that the Sun is not a religious paper.

The principal feature of the performance of "Nero" is the evolution of four hundred bare-armed and short-skirted sylphs who dance in a grand ballet. In this exhibition the 313 clergymen and their families hav learned as much of "the truths of Christianity" and of "early Christian history" as in anything else they saw or heard. The fact is that the whole history of Nero—that is to say, all we know about him except what little the Jewish historian Josephus tells us, with possibly a few fragments of uncertain pagan history—is a fabrication, written by Poggio Bracciolini, a papal secretary, in the fifteenth century. There never existed such a royal monster in any civilized country as the Nero described by Poggio in the pretended "Annals of Tacitus."

Early Christian history is almost a blank outside of the four gospels and the book of Acts, which are themselvs substantial fictions. There was no Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate in the reign of Tiberius. The first three gospels describe the crucifixion as occurring on a Passover Friday. There could hav been but one Passover Friday between the years 28 and 35 inclusiv, and that was the year 30. But again, the Jews never allowed a trial or execution on the holy Passover day any more than we Americans allow the same on the Fourth of July. But still further, the Jews never allowed the Passover to be celebrated on Friday.

So, then, the three hearsay witnesses are self-convicted liars. They were probably ignorant priests who knew little or nothing of Judaism, and had no scruples about telling lies for the promotion of Christianity.

The fourth gospel correctly puts the crucifixion on the day before the Passover, but falsely in the time of Pontius Pilate. The author of that gospel pretends to be the disciple John, but he is evidently a gentile priest and a hater of the Jews. He reports a prayer of the pretended son of God in which he absurdly calls himself Jesus Christ. He reports an insolent speech addressed to the Jews, in which Jesus, a fellow-Jew, says to them: "Ye are from beneath; I am from above. . . . Ye are of your father the devil. . . . Before Abraham was I am." No wonder they believed him insane and drove him away with stones.

There are a few scraps concerning the martyred Jesus in the Jewish Talmud. He is there described as a sorcerer who was stoned and hanged on the day before the Passover, about the year 75 B.C. This was the Jesus of Paul, who, after preaching him in Arabia, returned and attempted to do the same in Damascus; but the military commander of that city, under the rule of King Aretas of Arabia Petrea, sought to arrest Paul, and he escaped by being let down from the wall through a window in a basket.

This was a little prior to the year 62 B.C., for from and after that date Damascus was governed by the Romans, and no petty king of Arabia ever again ruled that city. ANTICHRIST.

Santa Claus and God.

As the child believes in Santa Claus, so man believes in the Bible God. I remember when I was a little boy I was deluded into the belief, and for a time was fearful of ghosts and hobgoblins. My good old mother told me that I was a very inquisitiv boy; that I desired to know many things that were not proper for little boys to know. Consequently, they had to tell me Santa Claus came down the chimney, that there was an Uncle Sam at Washington, that little lambs were found in the grass, and that the doctor found little babes in the woods on his way to see the mother. All those things I believed until I outgrew them. I hav often thought it would hav been better to tell me I was too small to know such things, that I could not understand, and just as soon as I could they would tell me all about it. This would hav been honest and truthful.

Now, my TRUTH SEEKER friends, the God of the Bible is the Santa Claus of the grown man. Just as soon as you grow large enough intellectually you will laugh at yourself for having been so stupid as not to hav seen the book as it is sooner. I am fully satisfied the fish story is a very large one. I am fully convinced, from the miraculous birth, the goodness of the heart, the greatness of the strength, the skilful use of the ass's jawbone by Samson, that the writer of his life told a whopper.

Baron Munchausen and Eli Perkins are but very little liars in comparison.

Now, for the love of humanity, the pride I hav in the elevation of men and women, I will never teach such things as being the word of God. I would suggest to any man or woman who reads that book called the Bible, the barbarous history of the Jews, to read it just as they would any other history, and get away from such dogmas and superstitions as are taught from that book. How can any good man or woman read and follow—yea, teach their children to follow—the lives of men who, if living to-day, would not be recognized as decent, surely not as leaders, teachers, and models of honor and goodness? I am greatly surprised that King David has so many warm friends and stanch supporters among the good people, for I hav never read the life of any man that was so wicked and lustful. The late Jesse James was very meek and gentle in his killing compared with the king after God's own heart.

In my travels West and North I hav been associated with nearly all classes and a sample of nearly all nations. I hav sat around the camp-fire of the Sioux Indians a number of times; I hav seen them in their war-paint; I hav seen them dance their war-dance, yet I cannot call to mind anything so monstrous, so cruel, and outrageous as David's treatment of Uriah. And yet we hav good men, educated men, who believe that the selfish lives of such men hav elevated the people to their present standing—men who are, I believe, honest in their statements when they say the Bible has made us and lifted us to our exalted station. How foolish and weak for men and women to allow themselvs to grow up squeezed and cramped like a pickle grown in a flat bottle! Knowing that men are so easily deluded makes me more anxious to hav everybody educated. Our free schools hav been instrumental in starting men, and Freethought has developed the mind and placed them far up on the hill of science—so high that they know they cannot see the whole world from a mountain-top. Some hav been foolish enough to carry that old book up with them, and claim that the book took them up.

As the result of a gradual growth Shakspere and Shelley are allowed a place on the center-table beside the Bible to-day. The time is coming when Shakspere, Shelley, Voltaire, Paine, Ingersoll, and many writers like Helen Gardener, will be considered far above the Bible by all students. The New Testament deserves a shelf above the old Bible, as the teachings of Christ, according to the apostles, were some better than those before Christ. Really Christ's teachings pointed toward Infidelity. The writer of this article has said a thousand times, paraphrasing Colonel Ingersoll, "I wish I was the poorest specimen of humanity living," i.e., I would hav everybody above me physically, morally, financially, and mentally, i.e., I would be just as I am now and everybody else elevated above me. I would then hav something to build to, something to cling to. A great many men and women hav a desire to get on top, no matter what the conditions of the majority are, just so they can occupy a conspicuous place. Each is anxious to be the favored one; to be a chief, a teacher, a ruler, or an office-holder, a representativ of the people, whether they hav the ability or not. It is the same with the Christian element, they want to be the leaders, the deacons; they are desirous of gaining admittance to the golden city, no matter what the cost is.

As one ambitious girl said to me not long since: "I will be satisfied if I can get there, even though all my friends and relativs are left out." How can anyone be so selfish? But those who worship and expect to meet, in fact, desire to meet, a selfish God, will be very selfish themselvs. With me it is different. I could be happy, I believe, with my relativs and friends in and myself out, but with them out and myself in I could never be happy. In fact, I could not be happy as long as there was one soul in the fire.

Now, just think of an individual who could be happy in a nice feather bed in mid-winter, with his wife and child out in a snow-storm. According to the Christian teaching there are but two places in the next world—heaven and hell—so if we don't find our friends in heaven they are evidently in the other place. Now, just imagin a man or woman that could sit in a beautiful conservatory of flowers and music singing and playing on a golden harp, while their child was scorching in hades.

Do you think it possible to find a civilized man or woman that could endure it? It ought to be impossible to find a man or woman that is ignorant and superstitious enough to believe such a horrid doctrin. If I believed such a thing, I would voluntarily go to an insane asylum and insist on being shut up. I am glad some of the educated women are coming to the front. Such women as Mrs. Cady Stanton, and many others, are doing a great work. Women hav been instrumental in inculcating this Santa Claus story into the tender mind of the children. Now it is only just that she aid in teaching light to extinguish the darkness of her former teaching.

When mothers become educated and truly enlightened, and teach their boys to represent their principles, even though they be denied their franchise, their true principles will be represented by the sons. Mothers, teach your boys to read that old book as history, teach them truth and honor, and in a few generations all the inspiration will be shut out. Why, if the good people would spend Sunday hunting up those in distress and administering to their wants, instead of meeting and paying tribute to an ignorant, imaginary being, the day of rest would be well spent, and many people made happy.

Not long since there was a good, old, sanctimonious, or rather, harmonious (when everything went to suit her), woman, who was our guest while the Woman's Christian Temperance Union meeting was in session. As I said, she was a good, harmonious woman. During a conversation one evening, she said, "If my husband was dying I would not giv him a teaspoonful of liquor, if it would save his life." Well, I could not help laughing at an intelligent lady who would talk that way. I said, "My dear woman, do you like whisky better than you do your husband?" "No," said she, "why do you ask?" "Well," said I, "I was thinking you did, as you would save the whisky and let him die."

Now, while I am temperate in its true meaning, and hav been all my life, I would giv a barrel of whisky if it would save a life. I do not believe we hav a right to allow anyone to die when we can save him. I do not believe it is right to take human life except in self-defense.

A word of admonition to the women before I close. Read the book by Helen H. Gardener, "Men, Women, and Gods," and you will wonder how you could be so stupid as not to hav seen the absurdities without having them pointed out to you.

O woman, thou wert made to temper man;
We had been but brutes without you;
Angels were painted fair to look like you.
There is in you all we believe of heaven;
Amazing righteousness, purity, and truth;
Eternal joy and everlasting love.

C. G. RANDOLPH.

Prohibition Delirium Tremens.

I had a dream the other night. I dreamed that I was leading a little platoon of men in an engagement with the outposts of rum and beer.

Soon the friends of the saloon concentrated from all quarters, and I wondered why there was such a multitudinous force gathered against so small an opposition as mine.

Then I heard a whir and a whizz, a clatter and a crash, a hum and a howl, with mingled commands and cries, as another and mightier army of men arrived, escorted by a phantom host from above, led on by Jesus Christ, mounted on a red horse, caparisoned in martial array.

There next advanced to the aid of the liquor legions a company of men in plain clothes, who bore a banner of purple, on which was printed the inscription, "Independent Philosophers." At their head the world's orator, Colonel Ingersoll, waved his sword and shouted: "There is the enemy—the swarm of superstition! In the name of reason, strike for freedom!"

The devil then loomed out of the dust and smoke, flourished his tail, held up his cloven foot, shook his horns, and said, with a leer and a grin: "Them's 'um! There are the philosophers for me. Of such is the empire of hell. Come on, my boys!"

I began, in my dream, to think that the "battle of the great day" was in progress, and thought it amazing strange that an avowed Atheist like me should find himself reinforced by such pious battalions, while the talkativ friends of Freethought were ranged for an onset upon me.

Just then there came over to me Mr. Burnham and Mr. Wakeman, of the Secular Union phalanx, and asked me: "Why are you here helping the Lord? We want you back on our side where you belong. Don't you see, we hav the great Ingersoll with us? We are out to-day to a man—all but you. Come, now is our time or never! We must strike superstition dead to-day or go under!"

"Sorry to be in your way, gentlemen, but so I must," said I, "so long as you choose to go back on sobriety and ally yourselvs with alcohol; for superstition has no folly like the folly of drunkenness, and the church never wielded a tyrany that could compare with the saloon. I am not to be whipped in, and refuse to surrender my individual judgment and personal support, even to so great a genius and philosopher, when I think him wrong, as Robert Ingersoll, who looks beside himself giving cheer to those whom he once so roundly denounced as the world's worst curse."

"Oh! never mind that now," said they; "we can deal with that issue later; down with Christianity first."

"No, sir," said I, "not for Joseph. I am down on drink first, last, and all the time, in spite of hell; and if Christianity, Jesus, and the Holy Ghost, plus Moses, and all his mistakes, hav come thus late to down the fluid devil, I say, Amen!"

Whereat my solicitors marched off to rejoin their own ranks.

Jesus himself then came riding rapidly toward me, and I thought that he intended to cut me out of the contest as one having no right to a part in the play—no business in the battle. He was immediately at my side, and, shaking hands with me most heartily, he said, "You are doing well, Mr. Guild; remarkably well. I hav watched you all the while, and saw that you had grit, and needed no orders. When the victory is ours, I shall want you to sit with me on the right hand of my throne in my kingdom."

"I am not striving for any place whatever in your kingdom, nor in any other, your lordship," answered I, "but just lighting on the liquorites because I can't tolerate their cursed trade in a civilized country. I hav, for a long time, declared against you and your church, and I ask and expect nothing at your hand; I go my own gait."

"Never mind the church," said he; "that is none of mine—at best not much of it, and as for me, why, you would hav thought better of me had you been better informed, instead of imbibing so many orthodox errors when you were younger. I excuse your ignorance of my real character, as your over-pious early training was alone to blame for that. And though you honestly claim nothing from me, I shall simply reward you the more, as my rule of grace is—giv honor to whom honor is due. Who is against my enemies is for me. I will see you when the fight is finished. Go on!"

Saying which Jesus waved me adieu and galloped away to speak to the chief of the army of Christian Prohibitionists. Therewith terminated my night vision. Though but a dream, it is not without significance. It is the interpretation of my sentiment in reference to the prohibition of the liquor traffic, which traffic has my unlimited enmity as an unmitigated evil to humanity, and which, unabolished, leaves every other effort for man's well-being boggled and blocked. To license it is to own it; to countenance it is to court it; to aid it is to wed it, and to profit by it is to share its pollution. Honest men do not want its help, but its hate. Freethought and a free country cannot afford the friendship of the constant curse. The sort of excise to put on it is to excise it out of existence forever. JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

The Greatest Writer of the Revolution.

A. R. Spofford, Congressional Librarian, in the Historical American.

The meed of honor as the most powerful pamphleteer of the Revolution must unhesitatingly be awarded to Thomas Paine. His plain, perspicuous style, homely illustrations, force of reasoning, and nervous strength of utterance, rising sometimes to eloquence, gave to his best writings, which were those on American Independence, great popular acceptance. His "Common Sense," which ante-dated the Declaration about six months, was printed and reprinted in 1776 a dozen times, in eight different places of publication. His "Crisis," a series of pamphlets appearing occasionally from 1776 to 1783, reanimated the sometimes flagging zeal of the army, and his pungent wit and freshness of treatment kept public attention fastened to Paine's masterly productions. While they were far from being the first emphatic utterances for separation, they were the most direct, systematic, and effectiv. Paine's merit as a patriotic and influential writer cannot be impeached by detraction as to his habits, or his opinions. Governor Morris said that he had written "Common Sense," "a quality which Paine wholly lacked;" but the force and spirit of his writings in timely advocacy of a determined resistance to oppression were praised by Washington, Lee, Adams, Rush, and others, as among the foremost influences which contributed to the grand result.

Revivalist Barnes's Latest Opinion.

From the Douglasville, Ky., Democrat.

You hav heard of the North American Review? Four of the champions of the Christian world hav been successfully routed in that magazine. Black, the able lawyer, Field, the editor, Fisher, the professor, all took a hand at defending the monster, and Ingersoll whipped them every one—shamed and disgraced them before two continents. The old defender of the false God took the great premier, Gladstone, to combat him, and he proved the weakest card of them all. Ingersoll is secure, because he and all civilization know that his position is invulnerable. This is the most humiliating, melancholy truth that this century of wonders has to face. But it must be met. If God is not good, then I, to be honest with myself, must abandon the field. With humbleness of humility I say to you that God is good—that he is not a God of cross-purposes. This is my new departure. I am devoting the remnant of my life to the new idea my good God givs me. If you are an Infidel, the theology of evil has made you so. I hav found a place to stand. It may not be big enough for my feet, but I will hang on to it by my eyebrows. I cannot defend the God that afflicted people; that was a murderer; that gave us Ten Commandments to keep, all of which he shattered to pieces. I cannot defend a bad God. I'd rather be an Atheist. I hav the light, and that light is Jesus of Love and nothing else.

A tourist of world-wide experience puts forth the theory that the climate of California fosters mendacity, irreverence, and meretricious morals. He holds that the habit of sin in that state is not so much a matter of diseased conscience as of atmospheric pressure and sinister influences of weather. They hav practically no winter there, and so "miss the best means of keeping alive a realization of the presence of a higher and an ever-ruling power, which people living in a sterner climate can so easily comprehend." The skies are so soft and the temperature so pleasant that men are led to think lightly of serious things, to forget how to cultivate the virtues.

Marriage and the Church.

The conundrum set a-going by Mona Caird in the Westminster Review, "Is Marriage a Failure?" has stirred England and the United States wonderfully. Everybody seems to be answering it one way or the other, according as his or her experience has been pleasant or otherwise. In England the latest phase of the controversy is an attack upon the Established church. One disputant, a woman thirty years married, says:

"The Anglican service lowers the wife, and sets the husband on a pedestal not at all suitable to him, filling him with notions of marital supremacy which are the cause of half the unhappiness of married life."

Another writer, who lays most of the blame for unhappy marriages upon female physical defects, says:

"I am well aware of the storm of indignation that will be raised in many a fair—I had almost said bosom—mind by remarks like these; and I am quite prepared to hear the indignant exclamation, 'Are we not all as God made us?' To which I reply: 'No, my dear young lady, very few of you are as God made you, or would hav you to be. Doubtless you will call this rank blasphemy; but it is the simple truth, for by neglecting your physical development you hav slighted God's laws. The church, I am sorry to say, is responsible or a good deal of the ignorance that prevails. It descants so much about man's soul that it almost forgets he has a body.'"

There can be no doubt that the church deserves this censure and more. From Eden to the present time the church has made woman the dependent creature—the slave, the servant, the toy. Through her transgression Adam sinned, and she has borne the punishment. Every Christian man regards his wife as the cause of his sinful nature. She is to blame that he is not an angel. The writer of Genesis pitched the tune; Christ took it up; Paul increased its discordant volume; and the church fathers stereotyped it. The Jews used woman as a slave. Paul considered her an unclean thing. The church fathers expressed their views in various ways, but all are of the same tenor. According to St. Bernard, "woman is the organ of the devil." According to St. Anthony, she "is the fountain of the arm of the devil; her voice is the hissing of the serpent." St. Bonaventure said that "woman is a scorpion, ever ready to sting. She is the lance of the demon." St. Cyprian thought her to be "the instrument which the devil uses to gain possession of our souls." St. Jerome called her "the gate of the devil, the road of iniquity, the sting of the scorpion." And St. John Damascene gave this estimate of his mother: "Woman is a daughter of falsehood, a sentinel of hell, the enemy of peace; through her Adam lost paradise." St. John Chrysostom agreed with Damascene, holding that "through woman the devil has triumphed, through her paradise has been lost; of all wild beasts the most dangerous is woman." St. Gregory the Great declared that "woman has the poison of an asp, the malice of a dragon." That is the ancient opinion. The opinion of the modern churchman, represented by a doctor of divinity before a Baptist association, is: "Beautiful as woman was when God created her, we cannot deny that in morals and religion she was a failure. From the day she turned her back upon God and God's word (both of which things she did without any influence from Adam), she became a heathen. Heathenism originated in her heart."

Holding these opinions of their wives, how can Christians ever hav happy marriages? The man is domineering, tyrannical, brutal, and careless of the feelings of his inferior partner. The woman becomes fawning, cringing, crafty. The children possess all these qualities, and so the race is perpetuated in brutality, fear, and cunning. The wonder is not that there are so many unhappy marriages, but that all unions of Christians are not unhappy. The Christian religion is responsible. Make the woman an equal, an individual instead of an echo; civilize the men and get the superstition of Christianity out of them, and marital partnerships will be a source of happiness instead of pain to one or both. And, when the world is civilized, if people make mistakes, they will not be chained together for life to fight it out, but will be allowed to rectify the error without a stain upon either father or mother or child.

And the church is as truly responsible for the low physical development of the human race as she is for the degrading estimation of woman which brings so great a train of evils. Antinaturalism is the cornerstone of Christian theology. Every saint in heaven got there by cursing the natural human instincts and subduing them by mortification of the flesh. Simeon Stylites on his tower is a good illustration of what religion pure and undefiled has made its devotees. This will be seen more and more clearly as men learn to study and reflect. The crimes of the church against human nature are complete and all-inclusiv. Professor Oswald, in his "Bible of Nature," has pointed them out as few can do. "Mirth," he says, "is the sunshine of the human mind, the loveliest impulse of life's truest children; yet the apostle of Antinaturalism promised his heaven to the gloomy world-despiser. 'Blessed are they that mourn.' 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily.' 'Be afflicted, and mourn and weep; let your laughter be turned to mourning and your joy to heaviness.' 'Woe unto you that laugh.' 'If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother, his wife and children, his brothers and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple.'

"The love of health is as natural as the dread of pain and decrepitude. The religion of Antinaturalism revoked the health laws of the Mosaic code, and denounced the care even for the preservation of life itself. 'Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on.' 'Bodily exercise profiteth but little.' 'There is nothing from without a man that, entering him, can defile him.'

"The love of knowledge awakens with the dawn of reason; a normal child is naturally inquisitiv; the wonders of the visible creation invite the study of every intelligent observer. The enemies of nature suppressed the manifestations of that instinct, and hoped to enter their paradise by the crawling trail of blind faith. 'Blessed are they that do not see and yet believe.' 'He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned.' 'He that believeth not is condemned already.'

"The love of freedom, the most universal of the protectiv instincts, was suppressed by the constant inculcation of passiv resignation to the yoke of 'the powers that be,' of abject submission to oppression and injustice. 'Resist not evil.' 'Of him that taketh away thy goods ask them not again.' 'Whoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain.' 'Submit yourselvs to the powers that be.'

"The love of industry, the basis of social welfare, that manifests itself even in social insects, was denounced as unworthy of a true believer: 'Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? what shall we drink? or wherewithal shall we be clothed? For after all these things do the gentiles seek.' 'Take no thought for the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself.' 'Ask and it shall be given you,' i.e., stop working and rely on miracles and prayer.

"The hope for the peace of the grave, the last solace of the wretched and weary, was undermined by the dogmas of eternal hell, and the preordained damnation of all earth-loving children of nature: 'He that hateth not his own life cannot be my disciple.' 'The children of the kingdom shall be cast out into utter darkness, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.' 'They shall be cast into a furnace of fire, there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.' 'They shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb.' 'And the smoke of their torment ascendeth forever and ever, and they hav no rest day nor night.'"

This is the foundation of the prevailing Antinaturalism for which the English artist upbraids the church, and it has gone on and on through all the centuries. The conditions for getting to heaven are grief, and disease, and ignorance, and subjection, and torturing fears. Let the body go; look out for the soul. Mortify the flesh and attain eternal bliss. The Lord loves a sick man, because it givs the patient a chance to glorify Him. The body is of no importance if the mind is properly subdued. Such has been the teaching of the church forever and aye, and it is no wonder that at last people are saying with Alice Carey,

> "I am sick of hearing the same old song,
> 'Save your soul! Save your soul!'"

What we want is salvation for the body—good health, strong limbs, sound lungs, and a chance to laugh, not cry. Then men and women may marry, and instead of the marriage being a failure it will be a jolly success.

"Divine Healing."

The Rev. Mr. Simpson, leader of the "Divine Healers" of this city, has risen to explain, through the Sun, his faith and work. Mr. Simpson was formerly a Presbyterian pastor in New York, and he believes himself to hav been miraculously cured seven years ago, "after twenty years of physical prostration and much suffering," so that he is now enjoying "strength and vigor never known before." With this increased health and force he has been engaged since his cure in preaching to those who do not attend ordinary churches, and to carry on the work more independently he "withdrew honorably and in good standing from the presbytery of New York." After he had been preaching for several years in halls and theaters his followers founded a church of their own on "an unsectarian basis, yet thoroughly evangelical in its doctrins and spirit." It calls itself the Gospel Tabernacle church, and is now putting up an edifice for its occupancy at Eighth avenue and Forty-fourth street. At the beginning of his work Mr. Simpson did not proclaim the system of Divine Healing, but soon its propagation became a chief part of his preaching, the fame of his own miraculous cure having spread within his congregation and outside of it, until at last a home for the healing, known as the Barachak Home, was established in two houses at the corner of Sixty-first street and Park avenue. One of Mr. Simpson's patients in this home committed suicide, and others hav left it for various insane asylums. Mr. Simpson forgets to state these last facts, but they are important as bearing upon the "science."

Mr. Simpson's method of treating disease is founded upon the epistle of the apostle James:

"Is any sick among you, let him call for the leaders of the church. Let them pray and anoint him with oil in the name of the Lord, and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up. If he hav committed sins they shall be forgiven him."

Mr. Simpson says, with truth, that the church in the early days took these verses literally, and if true then, he urges, why not now? The words can be interpreted in no other way than as meaning just what they say, and the Lord is the same now as when the apostles traveled about the East. Martin Luther is quoted by Mr. Simpson as having trusted it, and also John Wesley and George Whitefield, the great Methodists. He finds a survival of the apostolic method in the extreme unction of the Roman Catholic church, though, in his opinion, that church perverts and abuses the means as authorized by St. James, they being "not for death, but for life."

The Sun, in considering the faith of Mr. Simpson and his increasing number of followers, finds it to be "only a feature of the Christian system as he receives it. It is a holy ordinance, as much binding on the faithful as the sacraments, and obedience to it must be no less unquestioning than obedience to the other commands of Christ and his apostles."

And then the Sun says: "It is a very serious matter, the spread of this belief, or delusion, and it is one of the most astounding of modern developments. Of course, such practical results as it achieves are mere illustrations of the power of mind over matter, of the imagination over the actual and material, but it is now pushed to an extreme of perilous fanaticism. On the one side science is fighting against supernaturalism as a figment of superstition, and on the other there is a growing tendency to set aside the teachings of science in favor of supernaturalism pushed to its furthest extreme."

This is a remarkable utterance for a religious journal, as the Sun professes to be. First divine healing is found to be a part of the gospel teaching and of Christianity—as much so as any sacrament or teaching of the church—and then it is found to be delusion, supernaturalism, a figment of superstition! If this be so—and we are fully convinced that it is—what becomes of the balance of the religious system of which it is a part? Are the other holy ordinances, the sacraments, the teachings of the apostles, all delusions, supernaturalism, figments of superstition? Verily, they hav that appearance.

France.

Bernard O'Reilly, the pope's biographer and general Catholic advocate, writes to the Sun of this city detailing a number of miraculous cures performed at Lourdes last month. Of course the only miraculous thing connected with the affair is that people should believe and be so easily humbugged. One paragraph, however, in Mr. O'Reilly's communication is worth quoting, as expressing the feeling of Rome over France. He says: "We are advancing fast toward the last decade of this Materialistic, unbelieving, and Agnostic nineteenth century. In the once most Christian land of France, Atheistic doctrins and Antichristian sects are fast leveling all that remains of the social edifice reared by so many generations of believers. Miracles, miracles public, patent, of overwhelming evidence, are more needed to-day than in Egypt in the days of Moses, than in Judea in the days of Christ, than in Rome when Nero's brutal ferocity wielded for destruction the force of an empire."

If France can be saved from Infidelity only by "miracles public, patent, of overwhelming evidence," we fear that France will go to the devil. But it is not a little remarkable, viewed from a Christian standpoint, that the nearer France gets to his satanic majesty, the more prosperous she is, the more comfortable her people are, and the more influence she wields in the world. When France was all Catholic, under priest and noble, it required an ocean of blood with a Revolution so violent as to be a landmark in history for the people to obtain sufficient of the products of their labor to support life. No highway robber was ever more skilful than the French priests in skinning their victims. Going to the devil, France is better off than when she was going to God.

Mr. Davis's Martyrdom.

The Christian press is making a great to-do over the fact that the Rev. Mr. Davis had to serve his term of imprisonment for preaching on Boston Common without permission of the municipal authority. A sample of its ranting is the following by Thomas H. Pearne, a doctor of divinity:

"About a year ago Mr. Davis was tried, convicted, sentenced, and imprisoned in Hampden county, Mass., for preaching the gospel upon Boston Common. All these many months since he has languished in a felon's cell for no crime except as a corrupt municipal board may hav declared it a crime by a statute to offer Jesus in the public streets and places of Boston to sinners who need him. A brass band may toot and drum any day in the week on Boston Common or in Boston streets, and it is not hindered; a quack medicin dealer may auction his wares in the streets and squares of Boston, by day or by night, without let or hindrance; the giant crime of the nineteenth century, the vending of poisonous intoxicants, may go forward in cultured, Christian Boston on every street eighteen hours out of every twenty-four, abetted by a tax or a license, and no one demurs, except as mothers who see their sons ruined in body, soul, and estate, may in secret cry to heaven, 'How long, O Lord, how long?'

"But here comes a man with the spirit of the divine savior, who, like Jesse Lee a hundred years ago, preaches on Boston Common Jesus the savior of men—a gospel that has done so much of blessing for Boston and the whole country—and, forsooth, he is arrested and punished by a year's imprisonment! A century and a half ago Whitefield and the Wesleys shook England by street-preaching in all the larger cities, receiving for it insults and mob violence. To-day English liberty and civilization are purer and better and higher than they could otherwise hav been; and yet in this free republic, in Boston, which boasts a Faneuil Hall, cradle of liberty, Mr. Davis, for preaching Jesus, languishes a year as a felon within prison walls!"

The facts in this case are very different from this statement of them. There is a municipal ordinance in force in Boston that the Common shall not be used by anyone for gatherings without a permit from the city council. It is a good ordinance, for without it every crank in the city would hold meetings there, destroying the improvements, and making the place a nuisance to the neighboring business men and residents. The ordinance is for the protection of society against individuals whose egotism makes them think they are the most important people in the world, with rights peculiarly their own and superior to the rights of others.

Mr. Davis is one of these fellows. He imagined that because he is a Christian and preaches Christianity, his rights are superior to the rights of the community as expressed in the ordinance. He refused to ask for a permit on the ground that no community could stop him from preaching Jesus. He was warned that he was breaking the law; was admonished three times by the court, but he still persisted in declaring that a man who preached Jesus had the right to do so wherever he pleased. Finally he was told that if he again preached on the Common he would be imprisoned. And he was, though if he had promised to obey the law he could hav gotten free any time. He was dealt with very gently and forbearingly, but his egotistic religion determined him to override the rights of every citizen of Boston to please himself and his savior.

The attempt to make him a martyr to the anti-religious spirit of the day is a ridiculous failure, and only self-conceited religious bigots can so view his imprisonment.

Then and Now.

In sixteen hundred and eighty-eight—just two hundred years ago—the good Christians of Boston found that one of their townswomen had cast a spell over a neighbor's children. Cotton Mather, an eminent, a learned, a pious Christian, tells us that these children "would bark like dogs, and then again they would purr like cats. Yes," said he, "they would fly like geese and be carried with incredible swiftness, having but just their toes now and then upon the ground, sometimes not once in twenty feet, and their arms waved like the wings of a bird."

The old woman who had bewitched these children was killed.

The following is from a daily paper of September 18, 1888: "San Francisco, Cal.—Ranchers who came to Los Angeles from the Indian camp in the eastern end of St. Bernardino county tell this story: For the past two months a strange disease has attacked members of the Mojave tribe. Its spread at last became so alarming that the Indians slaughtered dogs and burros to appease the anger of the Great Father. This proving of no avail, a council was held. The medicin men sat around a huge pot which was filled with herbs and water which simmered down to a teacupful of liquid. Then a male pigeon and his mate were taken from a basket and the liquid poured down their throats. The male bird, when released, flew away. The female bird fluttered a few yards and fell dying on the ground. The medicin men declared that there was a witch in the tribe, because the female bird had died, while the male bird had flown away. Then with fierce yells and imprecations the frenzied red men drove their women to the place where the council had been held and where the white pigeon still lay among the herbs and grasses. The medicin men watched the face of each as she passed the bird. Finally a young squaw, the daughter of Craso, a subchief, stepped out of the ranks and was about to pick up the bird, when the medicin men, with loud yells, seized her and pinioned her arms. She pleaded piteously for her life, but her own relativs dragged her to the council-place. They took off her clothes, tied her to a stake, and built a slow fire under her. For two hours she lingered in agony, and while her death-screams filled the air the braves danced about the fire and the medicin men muttered incantations."

The Mojave Indians seem to be about the same kind of folks as our honored Puritan and Christian ancestors. The explanation of the ancient bewitchment is that Cotton Mather lied. The explanation of the plague now afflicting the savages is that the Indians hav typhoid fever.

Christianity is still the same great and consoling religion that it ever has been, but only Mojave Indians now believe in witches.

A Question for the Churches.

The Rev. S. C. Swallow, D.D., of Harrisburg, Pa., says: "There are, perhaps, in the aggregate, millions of our people, representing all political parties, all churches, Protestant and Catholic, and all enlightened nationalities, who hav not and will not bow the knee to the Baal of Sabbath desecration. They hav never bought or sold, traveled by public conveyance, even to camp-meeting, on Sabbath, nor in any other way, by word or deed, consciously encouraged the lawlessness that to-day threatens the very existence of our Christian civilization. If appealed to, will they not eagerly enter into a sacred compact to stand together, to organize, agitate, and educate till at least the outward conformity of the masses to respect for the sanctity of the day shall bear some fitting relation to the inward reverence of those who love it as the day of their father and their Lord?"

That is to say, Mr. Swallow would by law and physical force compel three-fourths of our population, whether Christian or not, to do as one-fourth thinks they ought to do. Now, if one-fourth possess this right, why is it not possessed by one-eighth, one-hundredth, or one-millionth of the people? Why not by every individual?

If a small minority of Mohammedans should settle here, and attempt to force the rest of the people to observe Friday—refusing them permission to buy, sell, travel, even to religious meetings, on that day, or to do anything by word or deed which should desecrate that day which the Mohammedans "inwardly reverence"— the great majority of the folks here would call the Mohammedans insolent, tyrannical, arrogant; and would resist such an attempt with rifle and sword if necessary.

But is there any difference in the principle, which sect or religion plays the tyrant and governs the rest of the world? We respectfully invite the attention of Mr. Swallow, and his aiders and abettors, to this question.

Editorial Notes.

Subscribers having copies of The Truth Seeker of August 25th, September 1st and 8th, which they do not wish to file, will confer a favor upon us by mailing them to this office. The interesting communications which appeared in those issues hav led to an unusual demand for extra copies.

George Chainey climbed our editorial stairs last week, bringing his soul with him. He has got as far as New York on his way to heaven. Mr. Chainey's philosophy last week was that the universe is held together by a spiritual essence, no two particles of matter touching, which essence or spirit of affinity is the real thing, the matter being but the tool or means. These are not Mr. Chainey's exact words, but we giv him full credit for the idea. The matter surrounding the egoic essence composing George Chainey was looking well and hearty, and we were glad to notice that the immense amount of knowledge about unknowable things which he possesses has not impaired his genial smile. Since he adopted the new philosophy—the like of which man never saw before—Mr. Chainey has wandered to California, thence to Australia, back to San Francisco, and now here. The Freethinkers of Australia, he says, liv on a low mental plane; and his erstwhile Agnostic friends here are hardened in philosophy, and deaf to all angel calls. But to him the other world is the only one worth thinking of. The Gnostic Magazine, of which Mr. Chainey is editor, is to be translated from San Francisco to this city. All who would like a sample copy of the same are invited to send name and address to the Gnostic Publishing Co., 22 University place, New York city.

It is painful to explode the Sunday-school stories of our youth, but the iconoclastic hand of Truth is one by one tearing them from the wall of memory. The Hartford, Farragut's ship, is laid up at San Francisco, and was recently visited by a party of old naval officers and scribes. One of the latter writes of the fight before Mobile: "One of the party well remembered the awful crash, the great bow of the misguided Lackawanna as it came tearing into the flagship's waist, the shock to the crew standing to their guns and never flinching, the ripping and tearing of the Lackawanna's cutwater and her head-booms and rigging; but better than all was remembered the little figure of the white-capped admiral, as, with hand high in air, he showered objurgations upon the head of poor old Captain Marchand. Sunday-schools and Christian associations hav recorded in history that, before going into the great Mobile fight, Farragut retired to his cabin and prayed. Perhaps he did, but before that day's work was over the angel that records such things must hav had a hard time striking a trial balance, for very many utterances that came from the old admiral's lips that day the newspapers hav no type to express. But the brass rail over which he leaned and swore is yet there. Another interesting thing in connection with the historic ship is the brass plate which adorns the break of the poop, and which was, of course, put in after the close of the admiral's career. It reads simply: 'Damn the torpedoes! Go ahead!'" William Tell never said of his hidden arrow: "I kept it, tyrant, for thee, had I slain my boy," George Washington never owned a hatchet, and Farragut did not pray, but did swear, when he won the most brilliant naval victory of the late war! Our Sunday-school books will hav to be revised.

Letters from Friends.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed notice of our dearly beloved.

Yours truly, C. K. LEVERING.

THE NOTICE.

HUTCHINSON, KAN., Aug. 17th.—E. H. Fleming, a minister of the gospel, eloped yesterday with one of his congregation, Mrs. Fryreat. The wayward preacher leaves a wife and six children and his mother in destitute circumstances. The woman is young and artful, and had plenty of experience in this line, having eloped twice before.

CLEVELAND, O., Sept. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In a recent conversation with a devoted Christian lady, very activ in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, I took occasion to refer her to Keeler's "Short History of the Bible." She refused to read any such book, stating that she did not wish to read any such stuff; that she believes the Bible as it is; that she believes every word that is in the Bible to be inspired; that she believes that the whale swallowed Jonah, that she would even believe that Jonah swallowed the whale if the Bible said so—showing herself willing, for the sake of her belief or faith, to swallow the Bible, Jonah, and the whale. She is the boss Christian, when it comes to believing all that is in the Bible. She explains the—what Infidels call the bad parts of the Bible, by saying we do not read them in the right spirit—meaning, course, we should giv up all reason, and just swallow them down. Yours truly, W. B. PAGE.

CATHLAMET, W. T., Sept. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: There hav been so many excellent things in our paper that I must send a word to show our appreciation of them.

Brothers Putnam and Reynolds hav visited our little county, and roused some of the lukewarm Liberals and made some converts to our grand army of brave soldiers, not of the cross, but of humanity. How we would like to be with you all at the Congress! But it is impossible this year.

The last illustration of "Our Goliath" is worth the subscription of the entire year.

Courtlandt Palmer's death caused sorrow in our ranks here. We cannot easily spare such earnest workers.

We are thinking of having a Liberal hall erected in Skamokawa by this time next year.

Good-speed (ne'er a God) to you in your work of enlightening the mind of priest-ridden humanity.

LEDA I. ALBERT.

SANTA ANA, CAL., Aug. 3, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It givs me great pleasure to read anything that stands up for Freethought and liberty. What has caused more trouble and bloodshed than Christianity? It has separated thousands of families. I know what I am talking about. I had my wife taken from me because I would not be led around by the nose by the church that she belonged to. When she left me she had $3,000; when she died, three years after, she had only $400. I am confident that the church got the most of it. And then after they had caused all her trouble and mine, they sent for me to bury her, and there was not one of the church-members who went to her funeral. I never want to marry another woman that believes in, or belongs to, any church. There are many people in this state who are Freethinkers, but they are afraid to say anything about it. It would hav been better for me if I had kept my thoughts to myself, but I never could be a hypocrit. G. W. FUSEN.

NEW YORK, Sept. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. J. M. Hopkins criticises in your last TRUTH SEEKER an editorial from August 16th unfavorably. He writes, "'Despoiling the Stranger' contains views on the Mormon question which do not correspond with mine." But I agree to every word said therein, and will go further still. Any observer must know that the church is the greatest persecutor of the Mormons. The more zealous a church-member the worse will he hate the Mormons—to the contrary of the Bible, as polygamy is nowhere forbidden therein, for all the good old patriarchs hav been of that faith a great deal.

Now, consider the fact that the Mormons went by themselvs into a wilderness, and changed it into a garden. There were no other people there then that were or could be taxed for their (the Mormons') benefit, as is the case here with us, where we are the more taxed for all the churches because they are left untaxed. Out of malice and spite, and against the spirit and letter of the United States Constitution, a majority of loving, pious, good Christian members of Congress enacted such an unjust law of despoiling the Mormons and robbing them of their own earnings. Why, then, not confiscate right here at least one-half of all the church property? The most, or at the very least one-half, of it has been accumulated and amassed in a most unjust and unrighteous way, through legacy-hunting, through begging for ground and money, and through not paying any taxes for their property so justly due to a community. The church property has increased so enormously that the time will surely come to pass that the states will be compelled to confiscate at least one-half part of it, for the good reason above cited, as it so happened all over Europe.

Mr. Hopkins writes: "Now, it being conceded that the practice of polygamy is a crime." I deny without hesitation this premis. Our Christian lawmakers hav stupidly denoted too many acts as crimes, of which our boasted civilization ought to be ashamed. Any act of violence to body, life, property, or honor may rightfully be called a crime, but any deed done which harms no one cannot be a crime, or any agreement not fraudulent between two or more persons of age, made with and by their own free will, cannot be a crime. I so contend, to the contrary of present public opinion. We hav too many meddlesome busybodies, who take it upon themselvs to be other people's keepers, instead of minding their own business.

In my views I hold polygamy a hundred thousand times more preferable, and honorable, too, without the so-called social evil existing among it, than a monogamy in name only, and with the social evil in full blast. Any reader must be astonished at the numbers, especially among the rich men, who liv with more than one woman, to the contrary of laws, morals, and customs.

To make such laws, which will not be kept or obeyed, will only produce and increase hypocrisy.

Wise men said that the country with the fewest laws will be best governed.

I myself prefer and believe in monogamy, but that is no reason why I should interfere with others who practice polygamy or polyandry. Would it not be much better if ministers and priests kept harems of their own, at their own cost, if they would then let alone other men's wives and daughters?

I can think of cases which will giv good ground to enter polygamy or polyandry, and be morally excusable. We might with just as good right make laws to force maidens and bachelors into marriage or yoke together.

I ask now, why not allow the greatest personal liberty as long as no one gets hurt, and stop these meddlesome busybodies? FRED. KOEZLY.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Sept. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: "A man should believe only what he can prove. He may hav every hope, but he should believe only what he can prove" (last words of Courtlandt Palmer).

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 8th, under the heading, "Is There a God?" "Macbeth" asserts his belief in a God because science, as yet, is unable to explain the origin and mystery of all natural phenomena, and intimates that the Atheist is wrong in his disbelief, because he is unable to explain the cause and continuance of the operations of nature.

If science was able to explain the source of all of nature's operations, her mission would be done, she could make no further progress, and the deep interest now taken in her promotion would cease; but with the multitudinous problems that are, and will be, brought forward, it is highly probable that science will never be able to fully explain all that is asked of her. It should be remembered that she has a hard road to travel, and every explanation she makes must be proved before it is ultimately accepted.

Because science has not yet discovered the source or purpose of all of nature's operations, it does not signify that a God exists; it rather indicates undiscovered causes. It is well known that but a few centuries ago the thunder and lightning, the rainbow, and the eclipses were regarded as manifestations of divine power. We now know, however, that they are but a demonstration of the immutable laws of nature, and from this we may reasonably infer that all of the phenomena that "Macbeth" now attributes to a God, may, on some future day, be rationally explained.

ALEX. D. BLAIR.

KANAWHA FALLS, W. VA., Sept. 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The Christian churches no doubt view with considerable wonder and apprehension the growth of skepticism in this country.

A few years ago there were but a small number of pronounced Freethinkers, and not much Freethought literature was circulated. Now there is quite a large number of professional Freethought lecturers, and some fifteen or twenty periodicals devoted to Freethought. Several of them hav quite a large circulation; Freethought literature is abundant, which indicates that there must be a considerable demand for it. The spirit of unbelief and incredulity is evidently on the increase. Nearly every community has at least a few Freethinkers in it. There are, no doubt, many who are not avowed unbelievers who are so in fact. They do not find it politic in orthodox communities to express themselvs freely on this subject, knowing that persecution for opinion's sake has not altogether ceased, even if the methods hav changed. The church is still powerful, and not every Freethinker likes to array its influence against himself; still, these silent Agnostics do not join the church or take any particular interest in religious matters. The church does not regard them as Infidels or Freethinkers at all, but only as unconverted sinners, who really do believe the fundamentals of Christianity yet who cannot make up their minds to break away from the world and accept "the easy terms of salvation offered in the gospel." There are, perhaps, some Freethinkers in the church, and many others who perhaps would be if they would venture to read Freethought works, or attend Liberal lectures, where they would hear the other side of the question. We would advise all who desire to remain firm in the orthodox faith, however, not to do this.

J. C. WATKINS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I send you a clipping from the Washington Post. It reads like reality, and if it be a genuin find it more than hints at an antiquity of man on the earth which almost bewilders imagination. First we behold in the record of the rocks the Azoic, or crystalline and metallic age; next the Silurian with its salt beds, conglomerates, shale, limestone, and sandstone, and its fossils, showing what appear to be the beginnings of animal and vegetable life; and next in order the Devonian age, where the remarkable fossil referred to in the subjoined article was found. Next we hav the Carboniferous age with its creeping worms with multitudinous legs, its lizards and flying insects. Next the Reptilian age, when flourished the fern trees and the palm, with birds and scaly monsters of the waters. Next the Mammalian age, subdivided into the Tertiary and Post-tertiary periods, in the latter of which, as heretofore supposed, man first appeared upon the scene. This is but a partial and, perhaps, very imperfect outline of the successiv orders of animal and vegetable creation, yet I trust it will be suggestiv of the great scientific value of the alleged discovery, if it be genuin. If it prove so, I hope it may call forth from your very able scientific correspondents such disquisitions as its importance demands. But suppose it all a sham! Well, we'll smile and pass along! B. W. L.

CARLISLE, PA., Sept. 6th.—Our usually quiet city is considerably excited over the discovery of a wonderful fossil, which was found yesterday by Francis W. Gibson, a resident of Spring township, near this city. The fossil is of the Devonian period, and composed entirely of shells and sand. The shells are well defined, and many of them are visible to the naked eye. It contains an impression of a human face. The specimen was placed in charge of Dr. W. F. Horn, who made a plaster cast of the face and forwarded the same to the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, and a number of leading scientists were notified of the find. The cast shows a face indisputably human, with prominent forehead. The bones of the nose are well marked, and the division between them is also well defined. The upper jaw contains six teeth, the centrals, laterals, and eye teeth, one of which is worn off by usage. The lower jaw is missing, and the farsel has the appearance of having been broken at that point. Many of our leading scientists hav examined this specimen, and hav pronounced it of great antiquity.

CONCORD, N. C., Sept. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I send you Winston Republican, containing the account of the falling from the upper round of the ladder of the church of one of the chosen of God's people. Mr. Connelly had been in office sixteen years—an office paying him about $1,500 to $2,000 per annum. He was a Methodist, and professed to believe in a gilt-edged Bible; sung psalms and hymns and prayed, and stole guardians' and orphans' money. He has fled the county and state. Suppose he had been an Infidel? That is not supposable, for no Infidel can hold office in North Carolina. None but church-members can gain the confidence of the people. How long will this hypocrisy misnamed religion continue? A few years since, the people of this county elected a man to a $1,500 office who had forged two names to a note. He was a church-member in good standing, and no fuss was made about it.

There is now in office here, and has been for ten years, a defaulter for $500. He is an officer in the Lutheran church. No sin, as he pays liberally to the church and attends divine service. J. W. MEHAFFEY.

MARION, CONN., Sept. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The replies to the following questions, as furnished by the writer, are, in his opinion, such as would, or should, be given by at least four-fifths, if not by all, of the believers in the Christian religion. All Protestants who may feel grieved by this assertion can console themselvs with the thought that they consider the Roman Catholics very ignorant Christians.

Question. What is the only true religion? Answer. Christianity.

Q. Which church is the sole correct one? A. By a Catholic—the Catholic church. By a Protestant—the Protestant church.

Q. Who founded the only true church? A. By a Catholic—Christ and St. Peter. By a Protestant—Christ and Martin Luther.

Q. What kind of a man was Martin Luther? A. By a Catholic—he was once a priest in the Roman Catholic church, but, being desirous of entering the matrimonial state, he sold himself to the devil; hence he was excommunicated. By a Protestant—Martin Luther was a very righteous man. He was a priest in the Roman Catholic church in the sixteenth century, but becoming disgusted with the wickedness of his superior officers, and the stupid ignorance shown by a large majority of the members of the church, he protested against the same.

Q. Which was the only true church prior to the protestation of Martin Luther? A. By a Catholic—the Catholic church. By a Protestant ——

Q. Hav you read Gibbon's "History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire?" A. No.

Q. Hav you ever read "Common Sense," "The Crisis," "Rights of Man," and the "Age of Reason," by Thomas Paine?" A. No.

Q. Did you ever hear of such publications? A. No; except the "Age of Reason."

Q. Hav you ever heard of Paine? A. Yes.

Q. Ever heard anything good about him? A. No.

Q. Who told you of Paine and the "Age of Reason?" A. My Christian friends and the minister.

Q. You say you hav never read the "Age of Reason"—what do you think of it? A. It is a bad book.

Q. What you hav heard of Paine, then, has been to the effect that he was a very wicked man? A. Yes.

Q. Your Christian friends and ministers said nothing about Paine being the author of works other than the "Age of Reason?" A. No.

Q. Did they tell you he was a mover of the Declaration of Independence, a secretary of foreign affairs under the first American Congress, and a member of the National Convention of France? A. No.

Q. You hav been informed Paine was an Infidel? A. Yes.

Q. What is an Infidel? A. Invariably a very malicious individual.

Q. Hav you ever perused the writings of any Infidel? A. No.

Q. You say Christianity is the only true religion? A. It certainly is.

Q. Do you know that there are other well-established religions in this world at the present time? A. Yes.

Q. Hav you any knowledge concerning the doctrinal beliefs of any of these other religions? A. Not much, if any.

Q. Jesus Christ was not an impostor? A. You insult me with such a question.

Q. Were all the originators of all the religions, excepting Christianity, impostors? A. Of course they were.

Q. I do not insult you by the last interrogation? A. No.

Q. If I asked a follower of Mohammed whether or no Mohammed was an impostor, would I thereby insult him? A. ———.

Q. You hav never investigated any religion except your own? A. No.

Q. Do you regard the hat you wear made by the best maker of hats in the world? A. I do not know whether it is or not.

Q. Having never sought to become acquainted with other religions, how can you positivly know Christianity is the only right one? A. Because it is.

Q. What religious denomination do you favor with your membership? A. ———.

Q. Do you know the creed of your church, or, let us say, hav you at any time studied it and thoroughly grasped its meaning? A. No.

Q. Hav you any knowledge regarding the creeds of any other denomination, or rather, hav you investigated the same, and was your investigation made before you joined the ——— church? A. No.

Q. Why are you a member of the ——— church? A. Because the girl I wished to marry was; or because my father or mother was. Various other similar reasons could be given.

Q. Will you purchase some Infidel books of the Truth Seeker Company and carefully read them? A. NO!

Q. If I will loan you a few will you peruse them? A. No.

Q. If I make you a present of the "Age of Reason" will you not look it through? A. No; I guess I hadn't better.

Q. Why? A. I am on the safe side, and I do not wish to be annoyed by doubt.

Q. Do you think the Bible is the word of God? A. Do I think? I know it so to be.

Q. Do you ever read it? A. Yes; occasionally.

Q. When you read the Bible do you giv it the largest possible construction? Do you endeavor to ascertain the meaning of what you read? A. I usually select passages easily understood.

Q. When reading the book of books are you ever threatened with submersion in the ocean of doubt? A. No. I believe all I do not understand.

Q. Why do you accept as true all you cannot comprehend? A. I am afraid of hell-fire, everlasting torment, etc.

Q. Which is the Bible a revelation to, our reason or our faith? A. To our faith.

Q. If the Bible did not threaten a disbeliever with hell-fire, etc., which would it then be a revelation to? A. Our reason.

Q. If unbelievers in the "sacred volume" (scaring volume) were not to be punished with hell-fire, or something else equally unreasonable or revolting, would you then regard it as the word of God? A. No.

Q. Would you yourself delight in seeing the vilest criminal the earth ever supported tortured in hell-fire? A. No. Yes.

Q. Why no? A. I am too tender-hearted.

Q. Who made you so? A. God.

Q. Why yes? A. Because David said, "Rejoice in the Lord, O ye righteous, for praise is comely for the upright. . . . Praise the Lord with harp. . . . For the word of the Lord is right; and all his works are done in truth. . . . Delight thyself also in the Lord."

Q. When attending church and joined in singing,

> Lord, I care not for riches—neither silver or gold—
> I would make sure of heaven, I would enter the fold, what do you mean? Is not your song symbolical? A. ———.

Q. Why do you refuse to associate with those who are traveling the "broad road to destruction," and treat them with brotherly affection? How dare you socially ostracize an Infidel in the face of that noble utterance: "For if ye love them which love you, what thanks hav ye? for sinners also love those that love them?" A. ———.

Q. Who said: "Love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you; and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you?" A. ———.

Q. Hav you no pity for an unbeliever who is morally honest, etc.? A. No.

Q. Why? A. Because if such a person dies persisting in Infidelity, God then has no pity for him.

Q. So, then, you know, no matter how good, kind, generous, virtuous, and merciful a man is, if he does not believe Christ was God he will eventually go to hell? A. ———.

Kind reader, I put this last question to a Sunday-school superintendent, in a Sunday-school about four years ago, and he answered me with such precisiv reason that I hav never dared to attend his school since, fearful lest I might be influenced to renounce Deism. He argued thus: "No one in this enlightened nineteenth century has any business to believe except in Christ." The force of such claeque tends to overawe me.

EDWIN N. BEEOHER.

HEPPNER, ORE., Sept. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I admire the skill Mr. Priestley has shown in conducting his argument. As a tactician he deserves praise. Mr. Priestley, I greatly fear, does me too much honor thereby, placing a higher value on my articles than I was aware they possessed. It has never been my desire to take prominent issue with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and this, I think, was indicated in my first letter. Being naturally of a retiring disposition, it seemed to me that it required a great deal of moral courage for me to assume even the position which I did. I did not care to continue this controversy for reasons of my own, and if I do not choose to gain notoriety in this particular manner, my wishes certainly ought to be respected.

Mr. Priestley wants me to tell "what was the need of a special revelation to convey these absurd notions of the physical world," etc. The answer as far as I am concerned is easy. I simply deny that a "special revelation" of "absurd notions" was ever made. Those "absurd notions" never existed save in the brains of those who oppose the Bible, and of some ignorant but well-meaning believers.

My worthy opponent may succeed in making some people believe that there is no such thing as an expanse between the clouds above and the earth and sea below, but I, for one, beg to be excused from being placed with that class of persons. Only a few evenings ago I stood gazing at the fleecy clouds, so perfectly balanced in mid-air, as if upheld by some strong invisible power, against which they seemed powerless to resist. And standing thus, I thought of "the wonderful works of him who is perfect in wisdom."

Mr. Priestley says: "Smith says that the idea of solidity is the fundamental idea implied in the word rakia and all its derivativs." W. L. B., the author of the article first quoted from by Mr. Priestley, says: "The sense of solidity is combined with the ideas of expansion and tenuity in the term rakia." T. J. C., the author of another article on the same subject, says: "The etymological argument in the preceding article only proves that the sense of simple expansion, as in all such cases, originated in an act observable by the senses." The idea of solidity may be said to be the fundamental idea of the word expanse, as may be seen by examining the etymology of the word as Webster givs it. It looks very much as if, in this respect at least, the scripture translators knew what they were doing.

Regarding the azazel, it might be well to say that it occurs only in one chapter in the Bible (Lev. xvi), and is rendered "scapegoat" in the authorized version. Among eminent scholars, however, this rendering does not obtain, as the way in which the word is used shows that it denotes not the goat itself, but its destination. It is derived from a root meaning "to remove," and may, perhaps, be more properly regarded not as a proper noun, but as an abstract term signifying "dismissal" or "removal." The goat thus disposed of typifying the removal of sin and guilt, "to be remembered no more forever."

Mr. Priestley wonders why anyone who professes to believe that the whole of "that old book" is the work of inspired men should "so laboriously" pick out certain passages and "ask us to be surprised at them." I was not aware that anyone had asked him to be surprised, but I judge from this that he was. It is a surprising fact that the majority of those who oppose the Bible are in reality unacquainted with its teachings.

I do not believe that the heavens and earth and all therein were made in six solar days, because, in the first place, I find (Gen. i, 14–19) that the light of the sun did not shine upon the earth until the fourth day. If the light of the sun had nothing to do with determining the length of the three preceding days, it is not reasonable to suppose that it did with the four which followed. But that part of scripture to which Mr. Priestley has called attention is the commandment given by the mouth of Moses: "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work; but the seventh shall be to thee a Sabbath [a rest]. . . . For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, . . . and rested the seventh day." Well, that seventh day has already lasted some six thousand years, and no one can tell how much longer it may last. It is quite probable that the six preceding days were each as long. If the objector insists that God's day and man's day are the same simply because they are so intimately connected, then, according to this style of reasoniug, God's work and man's work, and God's weariness—speaking from a human standpoint—and man's weariness, are the same, or on the same grade, for the same reason. Such a view as this destroys the analogy of the scriptures, by which the less is always made a memorial of the greater, the temporary a type of the eternal. It makes the human Sabbath a memorial of something no higher than itself, instead of being the ever-recurring type of a standing antitype. Such a pointing to something higher is also represented in the Jewish Sabbath year, and in the jubilee period at the end of every forty-nine years, or of seven times seven years.

On the harmony of the two genealogies of the gospels Mr. Priestley has made some statements which, I am willing to suppose, were made unintentionally. For instance, that in regard to Luke. If he will look again he will find that Smith and Luke are in perfect accord. This is neither the time nor the place to enter into the discussion of a subject like this. Suffice it to say that I hav failed to find that "pitiable mess of quibbling" which Mr. Priestley seems to hav found. I regard the article on the "Genealogy of Jesus Christ" in Smith's Bible Dictionary as a most excellent treatis.

With regard to the sterility of hybrids, it is only necessary for me to say that it is vain to attempt to explain this great fact into conformity with the development hypothesis; for, according to this theory, all species are only varieties having a common ancestry, and such a thing as sterility of hybrids ought not to occur, as it actually does, between species apparently so closely allied. This, taken in connection with the fact that never, within the range of man's observation, has a variety been produced so essentially different from other varieties of that order of animals whence it sprang as to produce steril offspring by cross breeding, ought to, and, in fact, does, form an important obstacle in the way of the transmutation theory.

Again: "If Mrs. Ritchey were mounted upon a bear and I on a horse," etc., "I would in time distance her as far as I hav in this argument." In my estimation, it is always better to let some one else do the praising, consequently I will merely pause to remark that Mr. Priestley may possibly hav mounted the wrong beast. As for any advantage which the foot of the horse may giv him over other animals, in point either of speed or endurance, anyone who has ever chased an antelope or elk, or followed the hounds, can readily testify on this point. Even the miserable cayote laughs in scorn at his enemy on horseback.

Being at present immured in the wilds of eastern Oregon, and the years of my life having been few, I don't happen to know how Mr. Priestley knows in what particular manner the eohippus may hav walked; but taking for granted that his statements are true, what reason is there why the change which is supposed to hav occurred ought not to hav taken place by a gradual diminishing of all the toes at once, instead of a sudden dropping off of one or more toes in the peculiar manner which has been described? In any view of the case, each time a toe is lost there is a break in the chain of evolution which natural selection fails to account for, to say nothing of the other points of difference between the several forms of 'hippus. It might reasonably be asked, Do not the facts concerning the different forms of 'hippus, as they are presented by those who favor the development hypothesis, prove the necessity of inventing some other way of accounting for them? Or must not evolutionists, in order to escape the charge of inconsistency, again fall back on the imperfection of the geological record? In order to show the reasonableness of such questions, let us hear what Mr. Darwin has to say. He says: "We should not be able to recognize a species as the parent of another and modified species if we were to examin the two ever so closely, unless we possessed most of the intermediate links; and owing to the imperfection of the geological record we hav no just right to expect to find so many links." "Although geological research has undoubtedly revealed the former existence of many links, bringing numerous forms of life much closer together, it does not yield the infinitly many fine gradations between past and present species required on the theory" ("Origin of Species").

Mr. Priestley objects to a statement which I made regarding the evolution of the horse from the marsupial. The state of my knowledge "previously before the late war" was in an exceedingly limited condition, as at that time my earthly pilgrimage had not begun. But if Mr. Priestley will kindly modify that statement by using the word eohippus instead of marsupial, and four or five in place of five or six, it will serve my purpose equally as well. The question still remains to be answered—In what way could natural selection hav anything to do with the change which is supposed to hav taken place, from the differentiated foot of the eohippus to the simple club-like foot of the horse?

In my first reply to Mr. Priestley I remarked: "It seems strange that evolution should deprive an animal of any of its toes as long as it was supposed to be constantly using them." To which Mr. Priestley replies: "It seems strange that evolution should deprive a polliwig of his tail, but it has to go." What kind of an answer is this for anyone to make who offers to assume a position which he will "defend without equivocation?" What similarity is there between the metamorphosis of the polliwig and the point in question? In the first place, the change from the foot of the eohippus into that of the horse has, according to the evolution theory, been accomplished only during the lapse of ages, while the change through which the polliwig passes while losing its tail takes place within a few days. In the second place, while one is a process of degeneration, the other is that of progression. The little animal above mentioned passes the first four days of its life having neither eyes, ears, tail, nor respiratory organs. It breathes through its skin, then the different organs are developed, including gills and a long, limber tail. But these, too, hav their day and are succeeded by an entirely different set of organs. Up to this time this little animal uses its tail for the purpose of locomotion, and this organ only steps out when other means of locomotion step in, rendering it a useless appendage, i.e., it is carried away piecemeal by the absorbents, when the tadpole becomes a frog. Now, if natural selection had anything to do with this, it is certainly an exceedingly capricious way of doing business, to spend so many long years in developing so useful an animal as a horse, and only a few days in producing so worthless a thing as a frog. But the wonder of it all is, if the evolution theory be true, that, after passing through so many wonderful changes in so few days, this little animal should always stop at exactly the same place, and, when it dies, is no farther advanced in the line of development than its parents and grandparents were before it. To me this is the most wonderful part of the whole business.

That little "fool fixing," as Mr. Priestley calls it, has puzzled many an anatomist, and I can sympathize with him in this respect, for on this particular subject I, too, am an Agnostic. We are constantly being brought face to face with the fact that we are creatures of limitation. "There are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in our science and philosophy."

Mr. Priestley has compared the person who attempts to overthrow evolution to a certain obtuse bovine which once essayed to derail a locomotiv. It is really too bad the silly little thing didn't know any better, but, judging from the amount of puffing and steam which has been emitted, it looks as if the poor little animal had succeeded almost beyond its expectations. However, I am not seeking to overturn evolution, but, on the contrary, to establish it. I believe in an evolution which is the unfolding of an intelligent plan. The best naturalists hav regarded this as a sufficient explanation of the gradation of plants and animals, and hav prosecuted their researches accordingly; but the fact that there is a gradation in nature is not a sufficient foundation for that eternal development theory which, as one has said, "in opposition to the axiom, de nihilo nihil, or, what is equivalent to it, that more cannot come out of less, would bring the highest life out of the lowest forms of matter, and make God himself—supposing it to acknowledge something under that name—the end, instead of the beginning of nature."

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Little Bird-Sellers.

The mocking-birds came from the South
One time, as I remember—
A silver pipe was in each mouth
From May till late September.
And two little children so pretty and fair,
With the truth in their eyes and gold in their hair,
Brought home a full nest of the twittering things,
With scarcely a speckled quill yet in their wings.

Their poor grandame was lying ill,
For many comforts sighing,
When they espied a yellow-bill
Swift o'er their heads a-flying.
And they took down the oriole's nest from the tree
With little birds golden as golden could be;
And while they yet smiled their tears overflowed
For the birds—and the grandmother down by the road.

They sold the mocking-birds in town
And orioles so yellow,
But all the bright gold could not drown
The lone cries in the willow.
And their mother decided this strangest of tests,
That "a friend should be more than the birds in the nests,"
And soothed them as only a true mother could,
While her own heart went out to the birds in the wood.

A Bit of the Rocky Mountains.

A very small bit, too, when we think of that wonderful mountain system extending from the most northern part of our continent to the Caribbean sea, of which the Andes of South America are but a continuation; but, to us, the eighty-mile trip was all very wonderful and beautiful, for we had never before seen a "real, live mountain."

Before we had fairly left Denver behind us, "the smelters" came to view. They consist of four or five large buildings, employing several hundred men in the work of smelting the mineral from the rock in which it is hidden. The furnaces are never allowed to cool, lest so much metal should be wasted, and many hundred tons of rock are melted each day.

Then for ten miles we passed through a beautiful farming country—some fields yellow with ripening grain, others green with alfalfa. This alfalfa is the South American clover, which thrives here. The leaves are a deep, rich green, and the blossoms a beautiful purple, and nearly as fragrant as our own pink clover blossoms.

As rain is scarce here, irrigation is the means by which the crops are watered.

How the water is brought down from the mountains we shall soon see, but here it flows calmly along in the main ditch, and is "tapped" for the small farm ditches, and at the end of it all are the tiny furrows of water running along between rows of corn or among alfalfa roots.

So much for the farms, or, since this is Colorado, perhaps we had better say "ranches."

We soon strike Golden—fifteen miles hav been passed—and now we are in the foothills, which get higher and higher as we proceed, until they finally reach the dignity of mountains, and whichever way we may turn they are there.

The grade is so steep that the eighty-mile trip covers from five to six hours, with two engins to do the work.

Growing tired of twisting and turning about to get glimpses of the mountain-tops, we find seats on the platform, with feet on the steps and hands clasping the iron framework tightly. This is by far the best way to see the wonderful scenery and breathe the mountain air, and it seems to be appreciated by the people filling the steps.

High mountains are on every side, and the creek, which we are to follow all the way, foams beside us, as if angry at the rocks that hinder it. Bare rock rises on both sides of us, so that it seems a great wonder where the ledges of earth came from in which grow the pine-trees—some mere sprouts, some sixty feet high—at their feet delicate ferns and bluebells, scarlet poison berries and purple choke cherries.

Here the irrigating water, on its way to the farms below, flows in wooden troughs along the mountain sides, and at other times in large pipes.

Between Georgetown and Silver Plume is a great piece of engineering skill, known as the Loop.

We thought we had left Georgetown behind us, as we crossed a low bridge and made a sharp turn; at any rate, it was out of sight. However, after going several miles, we found the town stretched out beneath us, and saw we had come back to the same place, while many feet beneath us lay the low bridge and the creek. Then, looking back, we realized what the Loop over which we had passed was, and how we had had to wind around the mountain.

In many places, all along the road, the turns were so sharp that the engin in front seemed coming right toward us on the rear car.

When we reached our destination, we were ready for a good wash and a rest, and then started for a walk down the track, and in a few minutes reached the tunnel leading into one of the mines, and stood watching some lights away in it that were bobbing to and fro, coming nearer and nearer, which we found to be candles carried by a party of ladies who had been into the mine.

We took the candles then, and the mine-boy went before us back into the tunnel again, walking along on the ties of the track on which the little ore-car runs back and forth.

The tunnel was seven feet wide and of the same hight; water was dripping from the walls; it was very cold, and pitch-dark, except for our feeble lights.

All around us was solid stone with the mineral streaks shining, and a white, moldy substance hanging from the stone.

Straight into the mountain we went, with never a turn for nearly a quarter of a mile, and then the darkness, the damp and cold, overcame us, and we turned and tramped back; and, once out, found many beautiful specimens of the silver and lead ore.

We saw a drove of "burros" laden with ore sacks, coming down the mountain road. They were great curiosities to us at first, with their dwarfed bodies, tiny hoofs no more than two inches across, and their immense heads and ears. There was a little baby burro, too, no larger than a lamb, but its mouse-colored "wool" was several inches long; the largest part of it was its "bray," like a hoarse tug-whistle, and it kept it up all night.

Early next morning we started out for a mountain climb, two of the girls, who were acquainted with the paths, accompanying us.

Beautiful pines and spruces, delicate ferns and dainty bluebells, and the little wild, red raspberry bushes, five or six inches high, all around us, and blue sky, with white clouds and the bright sun, above us, while below were the town and the creek, and across on the other mountains, the mines.

In some places there were bare rocks that we had to find a way around, climbing over them being impossible, and again, we had to take hold of bushes and almost pull ourselvs up. Most of the way was so steep that a rest was necessary after every three or four steps.

Having tired ourselvs out pretty well, and being not yet half-way up, we sat down on logs and stones to eat our lunch, and soon started down, being careful not to begin a run, from which we would hardly hav stopped ourselvs, and resting, from time to time, at the cold springs that were so numerous.

On reaching comparativly level ground again, we tried to rest our feet by wading in the creek, but even in August the water seemed ice-cold.

We enjoyed the ride home that afternoon very much, accomplishing the distance, on account of the down-grade, in half the time it had taken to go up, and returned home well pleased with our "bit of the Rocky mountains."

LAURA PRIOR STEWART.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Mother: "Tommy, why don't you say your prayers like your sister Alice?" "I would, mother, if I knew a short prayer like Alice says." "Well, what is it that Alice says?" "Why, she jumps into bed and says, 'O Lord! I wish I had a new bonnet.'"

"Mamma," said little Mabel, who had just come home from church, "what made that man in the corner say 'Amen' so often while the preacher was talking?" "I know," said Willie, confidently. "Well, Willie," said his mother, "why is it?" "It's a way he has of calling time on the preacher."

A boy in the Summer avenue school, in the Eighth ward, scratched his head for a long time before attempting to "compare the animals of North America with those of Europe." At last, in his desire to say something, he wrote: "The animals of North America are not as large as those of Europe, but they get there just the same."

"Ma," remonstrated Bobby, "when I was at grandma's she let me hav two pieces of pie." "Well, she ought not to, Bobby," said his mother. "I think two pieces of pie are too much for little boys. The older you grow, Bobby, the more wisdom you will gain." Bobby was silenced, but only for a moment. "Well, ma," he said, "grandma is a good deal older than you are."

How the Cat Was Good to a Bird.

From Our Dumb Animals.

I can tell you a strange story of a cat. "Is it true?" Yes, it is true. A friend of mine had a pet cat and a tame bird. The name of the cat was Fun, and Fun was so fond of the bird that it would play with it for an hour at a time.

The bird would hop out of its cage and fly down to the cat, and the cat would put out its paw and giv the bird a soft pat on its head, as much as to say, "How do you do? I am glad to see you!"

And then the bird would sit and sing to the cat, and the cat would say, "Mew, mew, mew," as if it would like to say, "Thank you." And then the bird would fly a short way off, and the cat would run to try and catch it; and then the bird would hop off once more, and the cat would run and jump, and do all that it could to get up to the side of the bird, and then the two would hav a game of play.

One day, when these two were at high romps, all at once the cat made a great spring, took the bird and ran with it out of the room. Did it harm the bird? You shall hear. It was all done in so short a time that my friend could not stop the cat. As quickly as she could she got up from her chair and went to see what the cat had done with the bird. But just then, what should she spy but a strange cat that lay hid like a thief at one end of the room? So my friend drove the strange cat from the room and then went to the door and called, "Fun, Fun, Fun! come here, Fun!"

And then in came the bird, hop, hop, hop; hop, hop, hop; and our good cat Fun came close by its side. And when Fun saw that the strange cat was gone, it put its soft paw on the bird and gave it a pat, as much as to say, "There, now you are safe, quite safe! That strange cat is gone; now we may play and romp again."

And the bird sang a little song that seemed to say, as plain as words: "My good cat, my brave Fun, how I thank you!"

If a cat and a bird can so learn to agree,
How kind to all creatures should we learn to be!

Correspondence.

SODUS, MICH., Sept. 15, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I went to the United Baptist church last Sunday night to listen to a Methodist Episcopal preacher. He said a good many funny things. I thought perhaps it would interest some of the Corner friends—Uncle Joe especially—to hear some of them, too. He said his father, mother, wife, and child were all in heaven, and he thanked God for it. He didn't believe God would damn babies and heathens, but he certainly believed in future rewards and punishments. He had a foretaste of hell when his conscience upbraided him, and he said that he had jumped up and down, and said, "Who was Lord Jesus Christ that he had to serve him?" I suppose that happened when he was a bad Infidel. Well, the United Baptist man got up when the Methodist Episcopal man sat down, and he said that man said there was no hell, but God said there was a hell, and he proposed to take God's word for it. I suppose all he is sorry for is that "Jonah didn't swallow the whale," so he could believe that, too. I hav often heard Uncle J. Fitzpatrick say that he would giv any preacher $5 that would read his selection from the Bible before an audience. He would soon lose his money here. But there are a good many around here that are not so superstitious.

Your Liberal friend,
ZELLA FITZPATRICK.

SEWARD, NEB., Sept. 9, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Of S. P. Putnam, who has given us three excellent lectures in the last week, I purchased your "Story Hour."

In reading it to my boys, I noticed the picture of your little niece, and your dedication, showing your sympathy with children, and I take the liberty to mail you a picture of my youngest boy to put in your gallery of boys and girls, which I feel you must hav. Perhaps the fact that I was a Massachusetts boy twenty-five years ago, and that "Jonah's" (George's) mother was a Massachusetts "school-marm," may, with the common fellowship of Freethought, excuse me for this liberty.

I shall attend the Congress in October at Pittsburgh, where I hope to meet many of THE TRUTH SEEKER family, of which I hav been a member many years.

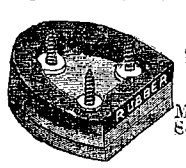
In common with all Liberals, I appreciate your work in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and, although forty years old, seldom fail to scan the Children's Corner. Yours for Freethought,

G. BABSON, JR.

[Thanks for the lovely photograph of an exceedingly bright and intelligent baby Freethinker, the youngest in our picture gallery of handsome, wide-awake boys and girls of the Corner. We thank our friend for his kind appreciation of our efforts.—ED. C. C.]

FRENCHTOWN, NEB.

MY DEAR FRIEND: The incidents related in the lines I inclose are strictly true. And the children, now grown up, feel sorry to this day for taking the little birds from their mother.



The $10 which the birds brought, and the delicacies purchased for the grandmother, could not quite stifle the voice of conscience in those who had been for several years little "bird defenders." With best wishes for yourself and the Corner, I am ever,

Your sincere friend, MARY B. FINCH.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectively and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. FURTHER AND MORE WONDERFUL DISCOVERIES WITH THE LICK TELESCOPE.

THE NINE DEMANDS

From the New York Sun.

While the Lick telescope has failed so far to solve the enigma of the so-called canals on Mars, or to cast any important light upon those phenomena beyond confirming the fact of their existence, it has made some astonishing discoveries in the nebular regions of the universe. But for Professor Holden's assurance to the contrary we might, in fact, be led to think that the mighty lens on Mount Hamilton, like Lord Rosse's huge mirror at Parsonstown, would prove less useful in observations requiring accurate definition than in those which demand great light-gathering capacity. We recently described Professor Holden's discoveries in the celebrated ring nebula in the constellation Lyra, where he found a marvelous structure of concentric ellipses, composed alternately of stars and nebulous stuff—in short, a half-finished creation, where, it would seem, the great sun-smith is still forging the orbs of light. Since then Professor Holden has kindly sent us photographs showing the appearance of two other nebulæ as viewed with the giant telescope. One of these, he thinks, must be regarded as the first representativ of a new class of nebulæ, in which the nebulous stuff is arranged "in the form of a helix or screw, just as if the nebula had been formed by one brilliant particle revolving around the central star and leaving a brilliant train, while the central star itself was rapidly moving through space.

Not since William Herschel surprised the world with his accounts of the wonders revealed for the first time to human eyes by his telescope, has any news been received from the celestial spaces of such absorbing interest as these announcements from the director of the Lick observatory. The nebula in question is one of those contained in Herschel's catalogs, and is situated in the constellation of Draco, in the north polar quarter of the heavens. The photograph shows a central point, or star, surrounded by two superposed nebulous spirals, the appearance of which certainly justifies Professor Holden's suggestion that they may be the train of luminous matter left by a brilliant orb in its spiral path around a moving center. The reader can obtain a clear conception of this by considering the case of the earth and the sun. The earth makes a complete journey around the sun once in a year. But the sun meanwhile is not standing still, but is moving forward on an apparently straight course toward the constellation Hercules at a rate which, though undetermined, is certainly not less than two or three hundred million miles in a year. If the earth in its journeying left a luminous wake in space, its path would appear in the form of a vast spiral, resembling that actually seen in the nebula in Draco. So far from this being a unique object, Professor Holden says that several other nebulæ examined show evidences of a similar form, and he expects to discover further examples, perhaps still more perfect, of the same class of phenomena.

It is difficult to suggest a satisfactory explanation of such a structure in a nebula. In the well-known "spiral nebula" we hav long had examples of nebulous forms made up of flat concentric rings or ovals, but these seemed naturally to suggest a likeness to the imagined condition of our solar system when it was in the earlier stages of its formation from a nebulous mass that had been shaped by rotation and condensation into a central aggregation surrounded by rings. But the helix-shaped nebula in Draco is something very different. There, if the nebulous spirals really imitate the form of the thread of a screw, the matter of which they are composed must hav been left behind the moving body from which it was cast off, and the difficulty is to understand exactly how that could hav occurred unless some medium is supposed to exist in the space through which the system is moving.

It is evident that these discoveries will pretty certainly lead to new and important views not only of the contents of space, but of the laws that prevail throughout its unbounded domains, and govern the birth and growth and destiny of its countless and marvelously varied creations.

THE MISSING "CONTINENT," LIBYA.

Correspondence of the New York Tribune.

MT. HAMILTON, Aug. 21.—The Lick Observatory has been officially "completed" for something like eleven weeks, but the first six of these were hardly available for regular observations. There were many changes to make in the preliminary arrangements in order to turn the observatory from a mere collection of buildings and instruments into a busy laboratory of work. We are even yet far from the last and highest state of efficiency, but, at least, our work is going on with full activity, and we see the way out of every difficulty yet remaining. The testing of the great photographic lens of thirty-three inches aperture is now in progress, and during the present lunation we hav secured some exquisit pictures of the moon, several having been taken every night (for all the nights are clear in this astronomer's paradise).

These pictures are to form the first chapter, as it were, of a work on the moon, which seems to be admirably well worth doing in a systematic manner. As soon as we hav completed the arrangements for enlarging the photographic pictures in the telescope itself, we shall proceed to study special regions and craters in detail by photographing them also every night, under all conditions of illumination, and enlarged about five to seven times. These enlarged pictures will giv the craters on a scale of about twenty-five to thirty-five inches to the moon's diameter; and they will bear a second enlargement in the camera of perhaps two or three times more so that finally we expect to be able to hav photographs of certain regions of the moon on a scale of fifty or more inches to the diameter. This ought to present really important testimony in regard to the vexed questions of changes on the moon's surface, and as to whether or no we hav to regard the surface of our satellite as simply dead; since life is nothing but change.

It is rather the fashion among many practical astronomers to slight observations of the moon, as if nothing more was to be learned by such work. But I think that all of us hav learned one lesson already in our use of the large telescope, and that is to look at every celestial object with a free and open mind, just as if we were seeing it for the first time. There is a kind of professional nonchalance which will not do here, unless we are willing to miss some golden opportunities. I hav always admired the spirit of the section in Maedler's "Kurzgefasste-Beschreibung des Mondes" where he treats of the rather dangerous question of the inhabitants of the moon. He is not afraid to include such a subject in a strictly scientific work, and yet he treats it in a dignified and scientific manner. As this work is probably unknown to many of your readers, I venture to translate the section in question, which will be interesting from a literary as well as from a scientific point of view:

> Only with reluctance do I touch upon a second question, that of the inhabitants of the moon. Not that I would deny the great importance of the subject, or that an answer good for all future time would be impossible, but because the subject, on account of the careless way in which it has usually been treated in the past, has fallen into discredit with those who earnestly reason in a truly scientific spirit. I hav discovered nothing certain in this matter—as little as others before me. I can entertain no hope of success in the future, and I cannot prevail upon myself to consider many uncertain, and in all probability needless, speculations. That everything created was made for wise and noble purposes is a thought which necessarily forces itself upon our consciousness. Again, as living matter fulfills higher and nobler purposes than that which is without life, so everywhere, when life is a possibility, we are really to assume its presence. In what has gone before, everything that has been said about the moon proves, it is true, that neither we, nor any living creature on our earth, could liv on the lunar globe, but it by no means does away with the possibility of all and every form of life upon the moon, so that living forms are to be expected.
> But much that is indispensable to us is inaccessible to them, and, on the other hand, many things for which we hav no name may be indispensable to the inhabitants of the moon. Their organs of sight must be adapted for stronger light, and they must be able to endure greater contrasts of light and darkness without injury. Just as little can their notions correspond to ours. In comparison with us it appears that they must be disproportionately lighter. How their days and nights are arranged, how the firmament appears to them, has already been stated in detail. All this, however, is insufficient to giv us more than an imaginary picture of their form, hight, mode of living, etc., and it will remain just as impossible to see as to reach them; even the idea of corresponding with them, although suggestions in that direction might not be wholly illusory, would seem to be just as far from realization. Works that would be similar to our own are probably not to be thought of, so that it will always remain a doubtful matter correctly to understand that which, in this respect, our telescopes might possibly show.
> Viewed in this light our hopes as to better knowledge of the Selenites in the future are extremely scanty, and tend little to satisfy the impatient imagination of many an inhabitant of the earth. However, the object of our investigation of the heavens is by no means to be looked for in this direction. With reference to the moon in particular, there are questions to be answered which are of a totally different and, in fact, of a much more important nature. How was the moon created in the beginning? What finishing process did it undergo? Was the rotary motion always as it is now, or not? How did these motions harmonize with the position and magnitude of the axis? In what ways can the moon's influence be shown, and what laws govern these influences? These are only a few points about which we may in all probability expect information in the future, and will, if properly handled, furnish us more and better knowledge of the moon and its relation to the earth than could be obtained from a living Selenite, if we were able to lay hands on him.

We are extremely fortunate in having in our corps of astronomers two who are photographers of distinction—Mr. Burnham and Mr. Barnard. Together they constitute a most efficient working force, and hav already obtained results of real value. Among the interesting things which hav been done in this direction is Mr. Barnard's discovery that the twelve-inch Clark equatorial which was designed only for visual work is in fact also a most efficient photographic telescope. Mr. Barnard has succeeded in making capital pictures of the moon, of the Pleiades, of the cluster in Perseus, of double stars, of Jupiter, etc., by its use, and we find the star images to be excellent over at least one degree. We hav not tried more up to now. To utilize fully this instrument, a more powerful driving clock is needed, and one of our problems of to-day is how to get such an addition. We find it a misfortune to hav the observatory reputed to be "completed," and would prefer it to be regarded as yet incomplete until we hav tested its capabilities in every direction. Legal terms often stand in the way of rapid progress.

Perhaps the most generally interesting work of the large telescope has been done on the planet Mars. It will be in the memory of all that Professor Schiaparelli, of Milan, has devoted much time to a minute study of the surface features of this planet, and that lately he has reported a very interesting and novel phenomenon, namely, the duplication of the "canals" on Mars. "Canals" is a very unfortunate word, for the markings, so-called, may not be water at all, and, at any rate, they are too broad to bear any analogy to canals on the earth. However, Professor Schiaparelli has repeatedly seen these "canals," which were ordinarily single, duplicated—paralleled—by similar markings. So that his map is crossed in every direction by sets of parallel streaks—the canals in question.

The opposition of Mars took place this year on April 11th, and the months of March, April, and May were the favorable ones for a study of its surface. The observatory was officially completed on June 1st, but it was not until July 16th that regular observations of Mars could be undertaken. Since that time more than forty careful drawings hav been made at the large telescope by Mr. Schaeberle, Mr. Keeler, and myself. These drawings were made when the planet's diameter was less than nine seconds, when its zenith distance was more than sixty degrees, and in the early evenings before the object glass had the time to cool down to the temperature of the external air—that is, our work was done under conditions as unfavorable as possible. Still, the drawings show a great amount of detail, are consistent among themselvs, and all agree in showing single broad streaks of dusky marking which cover the regions where Professor Schiaparelli givs two parallel dark canals with a bright region between them. It would be a very simple explanation of the difference in our observations to say that the Lick telescope was lacking in defining power. But our observations of hundreds of difficult double stars, of nebulæ, and of the surface of Jupiter, quite dispose of that alternativ. It appears to me that so far as the question of the double canals is concerned we must wait until the next opposition in 1890 to obtain entirely satisfactory evidence from our own observations.

We hav, however, obtained satisfactory evidence on another point of equal importance relating to the surface of Mars in spite of the late beginning of our observations. I refer to M. Perrotin's announcement of the submergence of the "continent" Libya in April last. Writing to the Paris Academy of Sciences, M. Perrotin, the director of the great observatory at Nice, speaks first of the canals on Mars (some of which he was able to see doubled), and then goes on to say that of the modifications on the surface of Mars the most important is "the disappearance of a continent which extended on both sides of the equator in longitude 270° (the continent Libya of M. Schiaparelli's map). This continent is of a triangular form, and is bounded on the south and west by a sea and on the north and east by canals. Although plainly visible two years ago, it exists no longer. The neighboring sea (if sea it is) has totally submerged it. To the reddish-white color of the continents has succeeded the black or rather deep blue hue of the seas of Mars."

I do not know the exact date of these observations, but I presume them to hav been made in April and early May of this year, since they were printed by the Paris Academy on May 14th. They hav been made the basis of far-reaching speculations. For instance, we read in the French journal L'Astronomie for July, 1888, that "important occurrences from the climatological, meteorological—and, perhaps, 'human'—point of view, are just now taking place on the surface of this neighboring world"—and much more of the same kind. From the scientific journals this news has gone into the newspaper press and into current information. A hundred visitors to the Lick Observatory hav inquired if these changes on Mars were observed here, and hav been deeply disappointed when they hav learned that our observations do not agree with those just quoted.

In fact, out of the forty drawings which we hav been able to secure since July 16th no less than eight represent the continent Libya in its accustomed place, just as it was portrayed by M. Schiaparelli in 1877-8, not to speak of many later drawings by others. In fact, drawings by Mr. D. Smart, of London, on May 7th, and by M. Flammarion, of Paris, on June 2d, hav recently been published, and help to fill up the history of Libya, from the date of M. Perrotin's announcement to the date of our first observations. Both of these drawings show Libya in its accustomed state—well out of the water of the neighboring sea. If it really had been "submerged" in April, and had really emerged by May 7th, this would hav been indeed a singular fact. But it seems to me that these astounding revelations of even "human" import hav their basis in a confusion of terms. Who knows that the continent Libya is a continent at all? Who knows that the neighboring parts are really "seas" and canals? We know that Mars has aqueous vapor in its atmosphere; but who has yet decided which part of its variegated surface furnishes this by evaporation?

Suppose that the region viewed by M. Perrotin had been simply under clouds for a certain period. Might they not hav produced the change in color which he undoubtedly observed? However we may account for the appearances before the beginning of May, it seems clear from our own observations that this "continent" has remained in its normal state from July 16th until now, and the drawings of Flammarion and Smart seem to show that it was so in early May and in early June.

Scientific men are often blamed for not putting their observations before the public promptly. They usually defend themselvs by quoting such cases as this, and by pointing out the harm that is done science when sensationalism creeps in, and wrong or hasty conclusions are drawn and run their course of error around the world. It appears that there is still something to be said in favor of an early communication by the scientific men themselvs. But as they realize the danger of misinterpretation of their observations, they will, or should, be careful to giv them in sober words which cannot be exaggerated or misunderstood.

To return to the case in point, it seems that our observations clearly show that Libya does still exist—just as it has in the past. And it is a reasonable inference that the obscurations observed by M. Perrotin were something in the nature of veiling by clouds, rather than the terrific catastrophe of the submergence of a continent.

Our observations upon the nebulæ in the last five weeks hav been most interesting and important. The power of the great telescope is nowhere better shown than in reviewing objects which are familiar in other great and small telescopes, and by the drawings and descriptions of Lassell, Herschel, and Lord Rosse. The nebula in Lyra, known to all possessors of small and large telescopes, has not only showed us new features and many new and minute stars within it, but it has also afforded by the critical situations and arrangements of these stars new proofs that the force which formed this nebula was a central force. If we please, we may assume that this force was gravitation; if this step is too hazardous—and it certainly is not proved by any nebula—we can with certainty say that this particular nebula, with its ovals of stars and nebulous matter, was formed by the action of central forces.

Other well-known nebulæ hav afforded striking and interesting features which it is difficult to describe without the aid of illustrations. One in particular has seemed to be of especial import. I refer to the planetary nebula 37 H. iv. Draconis. Mr. Schaeberle and myself hav observed this on many occasions, and it seems to be the first representativ of a new class of objects—a class of nebulæ where the nebulous matter appears to be, and very probably, in fact, is, arranged in the form of a helix or screw, just as if the nebulæ had been formed by one brilliant particle revolving around the central star and leaving a brilliant train, while the central star itself was rapidly moving through space.

Sir William Herschel was the first to enumerate and to classify the nebulæ. Lord Rosse's giant reflector resolved many of Herschel's nebulæ into stars, while many others remained unresolved. The spectroscope appears to hav shown that many of these last are truly gaseous. Lord Rosse added a new class of highly interesting nebulæ, namely, those whose parts were disposed in spirals on the flat ground of the sky. It appears to us that in this planetary nebula of Herschel's we hav the first example of still another new class, in which the parts, at least, appear to be disposed in the form of a helix. Several other nebulæ already examined show evidences of the same form, and it is more than likely that other perfect examples of the class can be found.

There are many large telescopes in America which will easily show this structure, and we hope they may be turned on this object. I add the remark that the focus for the central star, which is yellowish, and for the nebula, which is blue, are not quite the same, and that the helical forms are best seen when the focus for the star is changed slightly, for Clark telescopes about 1-2,000 to 1-1,000 of the focal length.

Our observations of Jupiter hav been much interrupted by the necessity of observing Mars, and of photographing the moon at the most favorable hours for viewing this planet. Still, we hav seen enough to know that much yet remains to be done here.

Mr. Burnham has also utilized the hours when the telescope was not in use for other purposes by discovering new binary stars. He has already a list of some twenty or more such, all with distances not over one second of arc. Perhaps the most interesting of these is Gamma Cassiopea, a star of the second magnitude, with a most minute companion close within the rays not two seconds off. It is in a favorable situation at present, and will be a fine test for the largest telescopes.

With the twelve-inch telescope Mr. Barnard has discovered some twenty or more new nebulæ, mostly very faint, and has made several series of observations on the comets of Faye, Encke, Brooks, Sawerthal, and Olbers. Mr. Barnard's observations of the Olbers comet are especially important, as they are more than a month later than any others of which we hav heard, and thus will serve to determin the orbit of this famous comet with a high degree of precision. One of the chief services of the Lick Observatory to the science will be in utilizing its splendid equipment and its beautifully clear skies in observations of faint and difficult objects which are lost elsewhere. I hav not spoken of several other series of observations which hav been made within the few weeks of our astronomical activity, because of their more technical nature; but I hav, I trust, given an account of our work sufficiently in detail to show that the Lick Observatory will fulfill the design of its generous founder, and will in fact be, as he prescribed that it should be, "useful in promoting science."

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

A FAITH CURE.

And Moses made a serpent of brass, and put it upon a pole: and it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived.—Num. xxi, 9.

Gems of Thought.

RELIGION creates artificial virtues and sets them off against actual vices.—Winwood Reade.

THE perversion of our moral standards by the dogmas of an antinatural creed is still glaringly evident in the prevailing notions of natural justice and the precedence of social duties. The modern Crœsus who deems it incumbent on his duties as a citizen and a Christian to contribute an ample subvention to the support of an orthodox seminary, has no hesitation in swelling his already bloated income by reducing the wages of a hundred starving factory children and taking every sordid advantage in coining gain from the loss of helpless tenants and derendants. . . . The bank cashier who would never be pardoned for kicking the hindparts of a mendicant missionary is readily absolved from the sin of such secular indiscretions as embezzling the savings of a few hundred widows and orphans.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in The Bible of Nature.

JUST in proportion that the human race has advanced, the church has lost power. There is no exception to this rule.—Ingersoll.

WHEN a true genius appears in this world, you may know him by this sign, that all the dunces are in confederacy against him.—Swift.

EACH nation made its god and devils not only speak its language, but put in their mouths the same mistakes in history, geography, astronomy, and in all matters of fact, generally made by the people.—Ingersoll.

A CLEVER theft was praiseworthy among the Spartans; and it is equally so amongst Christians, provided it be on a sufficiently large scale.—Spencer.

SUCCESS has no tendency to inform the understanding. It rolls over us like a summer billow, leaves us where it finds us, and lets in no new ideas to the mind. But failure, thrusting us rudely from our position, compels us to take a survey of the past, to glance sharply into the future, to acquaint ourselvs with a new condition of things, and thus furnishes new facts to the reason, and new materials for reflection.—S. P. Herron.

I HAV often concluded that the honest part of mankind would be much too hard for the knavish, if they could bring themselvs to incur the guilt, or thought it worth their while to take the trouble. —Fielding.

EVEN your brethren do not claim that men are to be eternally punished for having been mistaken as to the truths of geology, astronomy, or mathematics. A man may deny the rotundity and rotation of the earth, laugh at the attraction of gravitation, scout the nebular hypothesis, and hold the multiplication table in abhorrence, and yet join at last the angelic choir. I insist upon the same freedom of thought in all departments of human knowledge.—Ingersoll to Dr. Field.

EVERY noble work is at first "impossible."—Carlyle.

THERE is, in fact, almost as much to be said on moral grounds for the divorce of unhappy couples as for the marriage of happy ones. Nor does Jesus by any means face the real difficulties of the question by allowing divorce where either of the parties has been guilty of adultery. This, no doubt, is the extreme case, and if divorce is not to be given here, it can be given nowhere. But why is adultery to be the sole ground of separation? Why is an institution which may bring so much happiness to mankind to be converted into one of the most fertil sources of human misery? Why, when both parties to the contract desire separation, is an external authority, whether that of opinion or of law, to enforce union? None of these questions appear to hav presented themselvs to the mind of Jesus. Supposing even that his decision were right, he assigns no reasons for it, but simply lays down the law in a trenchant manner, without giving us the least clue to the process by which he arrived at so strange a conclusion. Nor is it in the least likely that the many perplexities encompassing this, and all other questions affecting the morals of sex, had ever troubled him. His mind was not sufficiently subtle to enter into them.—Lord Amberley.

THE soberest and best-governed men are least practiced in these affairs; and who knows not that the bashful muteness of a virgin may oftentimes hide all the unloveliness and natural sloth which is really unfit for conversation? Nor is there that freedom of access granted or presumed as may suffice to a perfect discerning until too late. And, lastly, is it not strange that many who hav spent their youth chastely are in some things not so quick-sighted, while they haste too eagerly to light the nuptial torch? Nor is it, therefore, for a modest error that a man should forfeit so great a happiness and no charitable means to relieve him, since they who hav lived most loosely, by reason of their bold accustomings, prove most successful in their matches, because their wild affections, unsettling at will, hav been so many divorces to teach them experience.—Milton.

MRS. MUDDLE: "What are you thinking about, Mr. Muddle? As if the Israelites knew anything about poker!" Mr. Muddle: "Well, my dear, I may be wrong; but I thought our minister said, 'They lusted after the jackpots of Egypt.'"

BAD little boy (to good little boy): "Hey, Johnny, does yer wan' ter take a hand in de ball game?" Good little boy: "No, I thank you; my mamma doesn't allow me to play with bad boys." Bad little boy: "What's de matter? Does yer ma t'ink you'll make de bad boys wuss?"

"YES, father," he said to old Mr. Hayseed, "I've graduated, and my education is complete. I s'pose I know about everything. Now I must choose a field where my abilities can be used to the best advantage. I want a large field where I will hav plenty of room." "Son," replied the old man, "there is the ten-acre cornfield, and you kin hav it all to yourself."

REV. CHARLES POUNDTEXT (who has been writing his sermon, looking up suddenly): "Maria, will you take the children out of the room for a few minutes?" Mrs. Poundtext (in surprise): "Certainly, my dear. But—are they annoying you?" Rev. Poundtext: "Not at all; but I hav just dipped the mucilage brush in the ink-well, and I would like to be at liberty to make a few remarks."

SHE (blushing): "What did pa say last night, George, when you went to gain his consent to woo and win me?" He (somewhat embarrassed): "Well—er—to tell the truth, Clara, in some way we got to discussing politics, and I forgot all about the other matter. Ah, darling, are you sure that you will always love me as you do now?" She (coldly): "I beg of you, Mr. Samson, let us talk about the tariff question."

"MY young friend," said old Mr. Surplus to young Mr. Giddiboy, "do you not think that you were rash to ask my daughter to marry you when you are not able to support her?" "Well," said the young man craftily, "perhaps I was. I admit my fault, and throw myself on your generosity, sir." "That's right," declared the old gentleman. "You shall not lose by it, I assure you. There, sir, is a nickel to pay your car-fare home. No thanks, if you please. Good-day, Mr. Giddiboy."

EDITORIAL in the Hickory Fork Sentinel: "It has come to our ears that the Rev. John Horn, during a prayer before his congregation at Elk Creek church last Sunday, made some very uncomplimentary and uncalled-for remarks in regard to the editor of this paper. He prayed that our paper might wither as it falls from the press, and that the hand that writes its editorials might be paralyzed. Now, here is the reason why Mr. Horn uttered such a prayer: Last year he came out as a candidate for justice of the peace. We had nothing against him, although he is a Methodist and we a Baptist, and would hav supported him, but when we asked him to put his announcement in our paper he hemmed and hawed, and that, too, after we had offered him the half rate which we usually extend to the clergy. Then we to'd him that if he would giv us $3 we would print his announcement. What did he do? He wrote out a lot of notices and stuck them up on trees. Could an American citizen brook such an insult? We think not. Is a citizen of this great commonwealth called upon to bear such contempt? We do not think he is; so, with the pen of just retribution, we 'pricked this bull-calf till he roared again.' We threw ourselvs into the campaign; we, in the language of Logan, chief of the Mingoes, glutted our vengeance. We saw the reverend gentleman defeated and then we quietly sought our humble abode. Now this man must run us into one of his prayers. He must hold us up before a congregation and persuade his hearers to look upon us with contempt. Pray on, weak vessel, covered with the rust of iniquity—pray on, for the prayers of the wicked are of no avail, but if ever you come near us, you gobbler-headed hypocrit, we'll giv you a kicking that will appeal to every ungodly joint in your body."

THE SUNDAY LIQUOR LAW.

From an Original Shaksperean Manuscript.

MANTUA, with a Sunday liquor law. (A street.)

(Enter Romeo, attired in the unostentatious manner of a dude.)

ROMEO (pausing before a gilded den of vice after the manner of a thirsty traveler):

An' if a man did need a beverage now,
Whose sale is present death in Mantua,
Here lives a caitiff wretch would sell it him,
I know him well—
A portly German with a crimson face,
Rotund of belly and of massiv hip,
Who with each thirsty guest could smile and smile
And keep his balance still.
Full well do I remember in the past
Long evenings I hav spent within well-full,
And now my tongue quite hangeth out a yard.
This man shall aid me. What, ho! within.

(Enter saloonkeeper.)

SALOONKEEPER: Who's raising such a racket?

ROMEO: Hold! there are forty ducats; let me hav
A dram of pizen; such soon-speeding gear
As will disperse itself through all the veins,
That the life-weary drinker may feel happy.

SALOONKEEPER: Such mortal drugs I hav; but Mantua's law
Is death to any he that utters them o' Sunday.

ROMEO: Dost thou perceive aught in my eagle eye
That looks like verdant color?

SALOONKEEPER: Methinks you hav,
As Shylock says, "a damn ask cheek."

ROMEO: I do admit the multitudinous flies
Hold not conventions on my person.

SALOONKEEPER: Then what's the matter with the side door?

ROMEO: Oh, it's all right! (Exit hastily around corner.) —Tom Hall in Life.

A DISCUSSION of the Malthusian theory in England elicited the statement that clergymen, as a rule, hav the largest families.

A LONDON preacher placarded the city with notices that he would preach in Spurgeon's Tabernacle on the subject: ";—;—:——?—!—." There was a large congregation, to whom he announced the text: "Stand thou still awhile," and then said that his subject was, "The Pauses of Life."

AN observant Bible student says: "I hav never known, in all my observations, of a Jew who was a carpenter, and whether the fact that the Bible tells us that Jesus was a carpenter has put any odium upon that occupation in the eyes of the Hebrews has been a question that I hav never heard answered."

THE pope has at last drawn on the Papal Guaranty Fund, established by the Italian government in 1871. By this fund the pope was to receive an annual grant of $600,000. Pius IX., in resentment at his deprivation of temporal power, would not touch it, but Leo XIII. has been driven, it would seem, by financial exigency to draw on it.

"BRETHREN," said a Tennessee preacher, "don't put Pontius Pilate down as a bad man. He wasn't a bad man; he was only a weak one. He himself would much rather hav released our savior, but he couldn't resist the pressure of the scribes and Pharisees and the howlings of the rabble. He didn't hav any backbone. He wasn't bad, but he was a poor creature—in fact, there was nothing to him. Brethren, if Gen. Andrew Jackson had been in Pontius Pilate's place that trial would hav had a different ending."

A WRITER in a Chinese paper asserts as a physiological fact that the Chinese lack the full complement of nerves that are possessed by Western peoples, or that their nerves are less sensitiv than those of other races, and explains in this way the wonderful endurance of the Chinese, their impassivness, and their ability to get along without bodily exercise.

DR. MARY WALKER is a plucky woman. She wants to go to Florida to tend yellow fever patients. She has applied to the health officer of Washington for the necessary authority. She quotes her record as a surgeon in the regular army during the war, and asks for money to enable her to make such purchases as will render her outfit for the work of Jacksonville effectiv.

RAJHIB BEY, a Turkish official, was recently arrested in Constantinople for accepting bribes. He has now been released and is engaged in investigating the charges against Osman Bey, first chamberlain of the sultan's palace, who is accused of stealing civil-service funds. The explanation is given that Rajhib Bey robbed none but unbelievers, while Osman stole from the faithful.

IMPORTANT news from Washburn, Wis.: "The Congregational church, by a unanimous vote, hav asked the present incumbent, the Rev. Mr. E. Cory, to remain as their pastor another year. Mr. Cory has made himself very popular among all classes of people during his brief stay here. He is catcher for the Washburn Baseball Club, and can play ball as well as preach. His presence on the ball-ground has had a great restraining influence among the boys. Scarcely an oath or profane word is ever heard. He takes great interest in all athletic sports."

THE process of sheep-shearing by machinery is now performed in Australia by an ingenious kind of device, the results, as represented, being very satisfactory. The apparatus in question is a very simple one, being made on the same principle as the cutter of a mower or reaper, and the knives are worked by means of rods within the handles, these in their turn being moved by a core within a long, flexible tube, which is kept in a rotary shaft, and wheels driven by a stationary engin. The comb is in the form of a segment of a circle, about three inches in diameter, with eleven conical-shaped teeth. Each machine is worked by a shearer, and, as the comb is forced along the skin of the animal, the fleece is cut. The machine can be run either with a steam or gas engin, or by ordinary horse-power, and does not easily get out of order.

THE fact that colored persons in Orlando, Fla., attended the Central Avenue Methodist church called forth protest from some of the white members of the congregation, and these drew from the pastor, the Rev. P. J. Reeves, the following letter, which was published in a Sunday newspaper there: "I now wish to inform the people of Orlando that I hav not been sent here into your town for the purpose of harmonizing the two classes of colored and white into church fellowship, not by any means, and neither do I intend to attempt any such thing. As I only hav the very best interest for the people, I shall not allow them to keep back any who may desire to worship with us, or bring their friends to our meetings. Therefore, from this date no colored person will be allowed to attend the Methodist Episcopal church services of which I am the pastor."

THE contemplated Channel bridge, as outlined by French and English engineers, is expected to cost some $200,000,000, the shortest distance being some 22 miles, that is, on the score of shallowness. The depth of the Channel is declared to be much less than is commonly supposed, and there are two shallows—those between Cran-aux-Aufs and Folkestone—where the depth is only 20 feet, and these, it is expected, will insure a material difference in laying the foundations and huge piles which will be required for such a gigantic structure. From the French coast to these shallows the depth is about 160 feet, and from the other shallow to Folkestone about 100 feet. The plan is to hav a bridge with two slight bends, the first deviating a little to reach one shallow, and the other falling back to reach Folkestone. The piles required would be blocks of concrete and masonry 160 feet long by 100 broad, these to be placed at intervals of about 550 yards, these measurements to be possibly augmented in order to insure to the bridge a strength capable of bearing some 25,000 tons weight. The causeway of the bridge will be about 160 feet above the sea level, or of sufficient hight to enable vessels of any class to pass freely beneath it.

How to Convert Atheists.

The word Atheist means simply a person without an idea of God, and the word Atheism describes but one negativ quality of a very copious and extensiv positiv philosophy of which the word itself givs no hint. This system is more properly called universology, natural cosmogony, or monism. Of course there may be individuals called Atheists who are very ignorant and not well versed in philosophy and science, but such are extremely scarce, if they exist at all. It will be generally found that when anyone openly avows Atheism he thinks he has all the true science in the world to back him up. And he will appeal to the fundamental axioms of the greatest and most progressiv scientific and philosophical schools in support of his position.

The task, then, for the Christian is simply to find out and refute those particular axioms, and show that the science and philosophy which teaches them is thus far false.

It is generally admitted that the starting-point of all knowledge is the knowledge of one's own existence. As the reality of one's own self is self-evident, so it is also self-evident that anything capable of producing an effect upon a reality, one's self, must be as real as the self or reality affected. Atheists observe countless changes produced by such causes as light, heat, sound, odor, electricity, gravitation, work, and so forth; and that all these things affect themselvs, therefore they conclude that they are as real as themselvs. Hence they infer that by long-continued observation of these realities man can discover the true causes of all phenomena in proportion as the observations hav been accurately made, recorded, and systematized. Thus, the eye everywhere rests on existing substance of some kind or other. There is no record of its having been otherwise. Countless experiments of the severest kind hav failed to reduce a single one of these substances to nothing. Therefore they conclude that, in the absence of a single exception and in the face of universal observation, substance is absolutely indestructible. That it is utterly impossible for something to become nothing; and if this be true, its converse follows as a self-evident necessity—that is, that something could not come from nothing. Hence "from nothing nothing comes" is one of their most, if not the most, fundamental axiom of Atheism so called. They contend that no person who really believes this to be a true axiom can consistently believe in the creation of a world by a God with nothing as a raw material. That if infinit nothing were multiplied and condensed to all eternity, it would still be nothing and weigh nothing. That if there was ever a time when nothing existed but a God, he being of necessity in total darkness, having yet to make light, with nothing to stand on, nothing to look at, nothing to take hold of, nothing to speak to or to move, and himself wholly immaterial, without "body, parts, or passions," existing eternally in a perfect vacuum, anything he could make would be quite immaterial also. They claim that such is the logical result of the theological belief and that it is the very climax of absurdity. They think it is far more reasonable to believe that substance has always existed in some form or other. They claim that all forms are subject to change—or, in other words, that nothing has ever been made till something had been destroyed or dissolved to make it of, and that this process of dissolution and formation has had, like a circle, no beginning or end. That it has existed through the countless ages of the past and will continue in like manner to all eternity. And that this eternal repetition is a necessity from the fact of the axioms to be mentioned a paragraph or so later on. Hence they claim that if a God did exist he could not, from the very nature of things, be a creating God, but only a director, former, or modeler of what already existed equally with himself. No refutation of Athei m will be successful or complete till this principle of "From nothng nothing comes" is proved to be false.

The second great principle is arrived at something on this wise: Man has ever observed that adequate causes always precede effects, and that these effects become, in their turn, causes of following effects, and so on without limit. And as not a single exception has ever been recorded, therefore they conclude that there can be nothing without a cause—that is, that everything has had a cause. Therefore, if all causes are caused by previous causes of which they were the temporary effects, it follows that there never could hav been a first cause, any more than a cause can fail to produce an effect. To suppose a first cause is to break the axiom, for it is to suppose that something can come from nothing.

This axiom, they claim, makes it impossible that there ever was a God who could be the primitiv cause of motion, forms, or substance. If it is claimed that he had a limitless string of causes preceding him which were sufficient to cause him to exist, then it must be admitted that he cannot be the first cause. And also if he was caused, he, as a God, had a beginning, and therefore is not eternal or infinit.

The next great principle to be mentioned is the self-evident outcome of the preceding, and is that "Action and reaction, all things considered, are equal and opposit." This they may consider proved, not only by all natural phenomena, but by thousands of careful experiments. The alternate growth and decay of vegetation, the rise and fall of empires, the facts of history seeming to repeat themselvs, the evaporation and condensation of water, and almost numberless other things, are considered as illustrations of this principle. It is by this theory of all things progressing in cycles, so to speak, that they account for the formation of our earth and all other astral spheres; and they also believe that when the reaction sets in they will all in their order disappear from their present places, and their substances be more or less mingled with each other, till the next reaction shall form other spheres in their places of a more or less similar character, but never exactly the same.

The cause for the manifest adaptation and what harmony there is to be seen in nature they ascribe to similar principles, which it is unnecessary to fully explain in this paper. But an illustration or two will perhaps serve to giv the reader a faint idea. Thus, when any number of free molecules or particles of substance are attracted to each other, their forms and polar magnetisms necessitate their union in some uniform configuration. If the particles are each spherical and are very numerous, a sphere cannot help being formed, as is the case with a drop of water; but, if there are but eight molecules, a cube is necessarily formed; if four, a square; if three, a triangle. And as all forms are composed wholly of these two elements, the curve and the angle, it seems plain to them how all naturally existing forms came to be as they are, without there being any intelligence either in the particles themselvs or outside of them.

It thus appears to them that the systematic, uniform, angled, and even-sided appearance which minerals and some vegetables manifest is as necessary as that three and two should make five and not four or six. The reader is recommended to read Haeckel's "History of Creation," four volumes, for further exemplification of their ideas.

The doctrin of the "conservation of energy," which means that all energy is indestructible, is but another aspect or wording of the preceding principle. It declares the same of force that the first great axiom does of substance.

The third great principle held by most Atheists is that "all intelligence comes from forms," i.e., organisms. That everything is adapted to a certain use, first, according to its form; second, according to its size; third, according to the quality of its substance, and fourth, according to the force that is made to actuate it. In brief, that organisms manifest intelligence according to their form, perfection, size, quality, and actuating force. And that no substance of any size or quality actuated by ever so much force can manifest intelligence unless it is in a certain form. That if anything exists without form, it must of necessity be wholly inert and utterly void of any intelligence whatever. As the infinit means the limitless, so it follows that the infinit is really the only thing conceivable that has no form, bounds or limits. All are accustomed to think of the boundless expanse of the universe, or of space. So they infer that if there is an infinit God and the infinit is formless, and the formless is non-intelligent, that it follows conclusivly that an infinit God must of necessity be totally lacking in intelligence, because lacking in form.

It is claimed that intelligence is purely an attribute of the finite and hence if an intelligent God exists he must be finite, for it would be impossible for him to hav either will, wisdom, memory, justice, mercy, or goodness, without organs of some form capable of producing these qualities. Hence it will be seen that before the Atheist can be convinced that there is a good, just, and wise God, it must be demonstrated to him either that intelligence depends in no way whatever upon forms; or else that God is simply a great giant but still only finite.

And now to sum up the position of most Atheists in a few lines; it is this: First, from nothing nothing comes, therefore, as something exists, something must hav always existed. A creation from nothing and a creator are both utter impossibilities. Second, there is nothing without a cause, and therefore there never could hav been a first cause. Third, action and reaction are equal and opposit, and all forces are indestructible, therefore there can be no personal governor or director of the universe. Fourth, no form, no intelligence; therefore, if a God should exist and be infinit, he must be formless, conditionless, and limitless, hence would be utterly destitute of intelligence, wisdom, justice, goodness, badness, or any other attribute of forms.

When these four principles of science hav been completely and publicly overthrown, Atheism, as now existing, will be so completely unarmed that if positiv proof of a God can be shown all will cheerfully accept it. And until then all minor arguments are utterly futil.

A few more things should be added which Atheists generally believe, but which if proved false might not affect their position regarding a God.

First, that old forces are correlativ—that is, that they can be changed from one kind into another. For instance, heat may be converted into work, work into electricity, electricity into magnetism or light, and light may be converted back into heat, electricity, magnetism, work, etc. The same being true of all kinds of force. Hence it is claimed that as thought and will are but sublimated kinds of force, they are subject to the same principle. As one of the products of life, namely heat, can in its turn be made to contribute to the support of life, so it follows that as mind can cause motion, the motion of organs of certain form and quality can reproduce mind. It is in perfect harmony with the old axiom, "Action and reaction are equal."

In short, if the correlation of forces be true, and if mind and life are forces, other forces can, under proper circumstances, produce life and mind as readily as life and mind can produce the other forces.

To illustrate: A man can consume sugar (carbon), take in water, and breathe air, and the resultant force, when acting through his physical form, may turn the crank of an electric dynamo which converts his work into electricity, which may appear as heat in one place, as power in another, as light in another, and as sound in another. Parallel: A steam engin and boiler may consume sugar or coal (both carbon), take in water and air, and the resultant force, acting through the form called an engin, can turn the dynamo, and produce the same identical results. And if either form or machine be sufficiently impaired, or the supply of either the air, water, or carbon be shut off, they both alike come to a stop.

Therefore, they seem to think that when the organism, i.e., the machine, that converts crude substances and forces into the finer ones of thought and will is destroyed or broken, the thoughts and mind that came from it must cease to be evolved, and only exist in history. This is one reason some hav for thinking that death ends all conscious, personal existence. The second is that, "Whatever has had a beginning must hav an end." Therefore, if life, thought, feeling, love, hope, joy, and sorrow had beginnings, they feel sure that their end is equally certain. Third, that, "All forms are perishable." And as change of form is change of character, personality, and identity, and as man and the earth he livs upon are forms, they think that it follows that he and it must also vanish away. The particles of each helping to form other worlds, and other men or animals, it may be, some time. Construction and destruction in the universe, as a whole, must be equal.

And now, in conclusion, a brief statement of a few of their moral or ethical rules and maxims will not be amiss. "The world is my country, and to do good my religion." "The time to be happy is now, the place to be happy is here, and the way to be happy is to make others so." The Atheists' try-square enables them always to detect right from wrong. It is understood in the fullest extent of the meaning of its words and includes mind, body, property, prospects, or position, present and future. It is this: "Whatever injures yourself or another is wrong; all else is right." "Without liberty there is no virtue." "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." "All men and women are born free and equal and hav an inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." "Reason is the lamp of the mind." "Hear, read, and investigate all sides before deciding." "Error alone fears investigation; truth courts it." "Freethought, investigation, and discussion will giv us truth."

They believe in the trinity of father, mother, and child, and in the pricelessness of love, purity, and truth. They believe that their word, their liberties, their honor, their homes, and the rights of others are sacred. They believe in the school-house, in temperance in all things, in order, in the freedom of speech and press, and in universal mental liberty for man, woman, and child.

They believe in doing right because it is right and not from fear of punishment or from expectation of reward.

They think the best preparation for the next world, if there should be one, is to do one's duty in this. That as one man cannot believe all religions at once, he is safest who is truest to his own convictions, while he seeks for truth and then livs nearest to his highest conceptions of duty. They worship truth. They bow to demonstrated facts. They pray for the naked truth, but they believe work is the prayer most likely to be answered. They praise a noble, generous, magnanimous deed. They love all mankind as brethren. They hate error, superstition, fraud, hypocrisy, cruelty, tyranny, and oppression. They hav no respect for ancient lies or reverence for old mistakes. They oppose Christianity because they hav reasons for thinking it fundamentally false, wrong in theory, and partially demoralizing in practice; and because they think it is a foe to the progress and higher morality of which the world is in such sad need.

"Be thyself," "Know thyself," "Think thyself."

Whatever may be done to their philosophy, how can one fail to admire their ethics? The hope that this exposition of Atheism may promote the cause of truth, virtue, and human happiness is the sole desire and motiv of the author, who has tried both sides and is now happy to subscribe himself as an ex-Christian. PROF. C. L. HASKELL.

The Jew to the Christians.

To further demonstrate the utter inadvisability of wasting theology to prove the inconsistency of Christianity, especially that which is practiced by the arch-falsifying Freshman and company, I will, as usual, avail myself of facts only. There are more than one hundred million individuals whose Christianity hinges upon the faith of the pope's infallibility, and all are honest in their belief, yet nobody ever stopped to examin whether this infallibility was ever realized. I will not disturb the musty pages of history, but will confine myself to the present day. One of the pope's most eminent subordinates committed a certain crime againt his holiness, the infallible. The highest punishment for such iniquity is excommunication. After repeatedly warning the erring divine, the fatal act of excommunication was pronounced.

I wish from the bottom of my heart that Dr. McGlynn should die of a very ripe old age, but, for argument's sake, suppose that when the excommunication was read to him, he had been struck down by lightning, apoplexy, or even slipped down on a banana-peel and fractured his skull—would we ever hav heard the end of such a miraculous conception? I believe not. This would certainly hav added thousands of converts to Catholicism. But, thank God! Dr. McGlynn, besides not being stricken down, is alive and kicking. With what result? The Catholics are as silent as the grave. Not a suggestion is made, not a whisper is heard, to question the pope's infallibility and suggesting a screw loose somewhere. The only satisfaction left for us is that hundreds of millions protest against the pope's infallibility, but supplant it with faith. Their faith then becomes infallible. Hence, they place faith in the faith devoured by Freshman and his $10 faithless converts. Nay, according to the gospel of the New York Herald, a faith curist, a policeman of Newark, testified how the holy faith not only cures humanity, but also killed multitudes of bedbugs, swarms of roaches, and herds of rats. The Sun a few Sundays ago devoted an entire page to the infallibility of faith, and its capability of curing people, from a musketo bite to hydrophobia.

I, who am wicked enough to lose faith in what Mr. and Mrs. Freshman liv on, am made the target for revenge, by Freshman's being selected as the mouthpiece of Christianity to proclaim the good tidings that Jews of the Montefiore type are damned for ever and ever, while those Christians prematurely dying upon the scaffold in the faith of Freshman are as happy in heaven as they were miserable upon earth. This sort of faith is especially attested to by the following LL.D.'s and D.D.'s: Crosby, Deems, Buckley, Ormiston, Taylor, Vincent, Sabine, McChesney, Virgin, McArthur, Kidd, Wales, Warner, Colgate, and Van Norden, comprising the board of trustees of the faithful son of a rabbi Freshman, and company. The above eminent divines are so enraptured with Freshman's faith that they humbly submit to the unpleasant truth heaped by me upon their sacred heads. As for Freshman himself, nobody but a saint would undergo the lashing of my pen. More than once I concluded that he was a genuin saint, but for his unsaintly performances in his rabbinical habiliments upon the Christian pulpits, where, after each performance, the hat is passed around and emptied into his pockets, which are filled up with faith to the brim. Since such mode of proceeding is far from being saintly, I am convinced that he is the typical black-souled and black-hearted specimen of humanity, devoid of every feeling of sensitivness, who, when thrown out of the front door, will enter through the rear, as long as his greed for notoriety and gain is satisfied. To use a biblical phrase, slightly changed, "He eateth and wipeth his mouth and sayeth, I hav done no wickedness" (Prov. xxx, 20).

These are thy gods, O Christianity!

He is protected by the Christian clergy and editors. He is permitted, like the Balaamic quadruped, to open his mouth so as to wean away the Jew from the barbarity and fierceness of his Judaic lion to join the lamb-like and dove-like Christianity which erased the word persecution from its dictionary, especially the one in vogue in Russia and Roumania.

Yet Christianity is agitated and tries to solve the problem why the Jew is persecuted ever since the tragedy upon Calvary, jumping to the conclusion that it is a retribution for not joining Freshman's faith. This reminds me how once a man, holding on to a mule's tail, was crying out that the creature would kick him to death. When a bystander suggested, "Let go the tail and you are safe." Here, too, Christianity is shamefully persecuting the Jew searching for the reason. Why, my dear Christian, let the Jew alone, and there will be no more mystery.

As I am confining myself to facts only, I will endeavor to add a few more concerning the depravity of St. Freshman, and the inconsistency of his guardian angels, the clergy. The business cards of Freshman and company were for years printed on both sides. While advertising his holy wares on one side in English, the specialty of his trade was announced on the other side in Hebrew. As a son of a rabbi, Hebrew scholar, he paraded a verse from the Psalms. Through a typographical error the sense of that verse was converted into that Christ was to sit upon hades instead of footstool. These cards were piled up mountain-high in his religious depot of faith, and were freely circulated for years. Finally I submitted them to Drs. Crosby, Deems, Ward, Ferris, and a few others. My revelation was, of course, quietly transmitted to the apostle Freshman, who in return quietly destroyed the objectionable cards, substituting soft paper circulars for the hard pasteboards. But, alas! this innovation, too, bore the stamp of Freshman's huge ignorance. This time the Hebrew, on account of a wrong vowel sign, presents Christ in the feminin gender. This error was even detected by Dr. Ward of the Independent, who is a profound Hebrew scholar. But, in order to shield his fraudulent protege, Freshman, he is silent on this point also.

As to Freshman's backers, Drs. Crosby, Deems, Buckley, and the rest of the trustees, they don't care a snap what Freshman makes of Christ and Christianity, as long as he is fed upon faith, and produces as many converts as the eighth plague—the locusts in ancient Egypt about which the Bible tells us, "and they shall cover the face of the earth"—for according to the gospel of St. Freshman, from Dan to Bethsheba, and from Maine to 'Frisco, the roads are swarming with faithful converts. In fact, so much so that Mr. Freshman is perplexed how to provide faith enough for the multitude of converts to liv on.

In the current number of Freshman's tract, a letter from Dr. Crosby is republished, as follows: "The matter, then, is reduced to this: That the Hebrew-Christian church, which we support, is an institution of despicable, disgraceful, mercenary, convert-mongering. This I deny. I assert that it is an honest, honorable church, and that there is nothing in it mercenary." Dr. Crosby, who formed this epistle, certainly never thought of the Feinsteins, Oppenheimers, Brumers, Sterns, Salzmans, Rubins, etc. All of them, I believe, stand as living witnesses of the "despicable, disgraceful, mercenary convert-mongering."

But why wander away from the subject, when I repeatedly offered, and am still willing to pay, a thousand dollars toward the missionary fund for the privilege of proving the rascality, falsification, and gross ignorance of even Freshman himself? Since the clergy are shy to accept my offer, it is conclusiv evidence that they are fully aware of the truth of my statements, but rely upon the scepter of herculean power they sway, and the utter helplessness of myself.

The Christian editors, God bless them, repeatedly admitted the fraudulence and ignorance of Freshman, hence his professing Christianity must be for mercenary motivs only—barring faith. Will Dr. Crosby make a note of this in Freshman's organ?

Another matter I would like to call Dr. Crosby's attention to is, how one hundred and four times annually, every Saturday and Sunday, the Herald announces the following good tidings: "Rev. Jacob Freshman will preach; Israelites especially invited." I challenge Dr. Crosby to prove that the Rev. Mr. Freshman preached half of the time in his church. The fact of the matter is that he hires an old gentleman, the Rev. Mr. McLane, of Brooklyn, for a couple of dollars, to preach in his church, while Freshman himself is passing around the hat elsewhere in his religious costume. How does this correspond with Dr. Crosby's proclamation, "I assert that it is an honest, honorable church?"

In the misnamed sixth annual report, Dr. Crosby again asserts, "The services are well attended." The good doctor could certainly not hav attended the services himself, for I hav put down the attendance during twelve times, and they averaged a fraction over twenty-one, including the man and wife faith-eaters.

The Jew, as a rule, is supposed not to be very liberal in flinging away $1,000. If I am willing to do so, I must know whereof I speak.

Will ye, Christian ministers and editors, who hav everything to gain and nothing to lose, come up to rescue Christianity from its assailants?

Shame! where is thy blush? A. BENJAMIN.

History Our Witness.

History repeats itself, and upon this rock we Secularists and Infidels are proud to stand. This week's TRUTH SEEKER brings the glad tidings that Col. Robt. G. Ingersoll will go upon the platform and lecture, and devote the proceeds to the yellow fever fund. Good! One hundred and five years to-day on Sunday (save the mark!) Stephen Girard, a wealthy merchant, a nativ of France, and one of the members of the committee sympathizing with the wretched situation and condition of the sufferers of Bush Hill Hospital, voluntarily and unexpectedly offered himself as manager to superintend that hospital. The surprise and satisfaction can better be conceived than expressed. Peter Helm, a nativ of Pennsylvania, also volunteered his services. Their offers were accepted, and the same afternoon (Sunday) they entered upon execution of their dangerous and praiseworthy office. Did they go with holy water and a cross and open with prayer? No. Did they present every patient with a Bible, as they do the pupils in Girard College? Matthew Carey, Esq., thus extols him: "The perseverance of the managers of that hospital has been equally meritorious with their original and magnanimous beneficence. During the whole calamity to this time they hav attended uninterruptedly for six, seven, or eight hours daily, renouncing almost every care of private affairs. Stephen Girard, who was stationed in the interior of the hospital, has had to encourage the sick, to hand them necessaries and medicins, wipe the sweat off their brows, and to perform many disgusting offices of kindness for them which nothing could render tolerable but the exalted motivs that impelled him to this heroic conduct" (Girard's Life, by Simpson, page 62).

Girard's Bank never refused specie for its notes. In 1814, when the government credit was exhausted and the treasury bankrupt, Girard subscribed to a loan of $5,000,000. When he died he bequeathed to the Pennsylvania Hospital $30,000; Deaf and Dumb Institution, $20,000; last, but not least, Girard College, where thirteen hundred orphan boys are fed and clothed, which trust is now shamefully violated by the trustees by allowing religious services and erecting a chapel, which is contrary to his will. So much for a man who was a student of Voltaire and Rousseau. Simpson, his biographer, says (page 215): "Perhaps this is the only instance on record in which no clergyman walked to the grave of a man as rich as Stephen Girard, not only without impairing his popularity, but adding to his celebrity and fame." I say that there is an institution that the Secularists can point to with pride, and which no clergyman can enter and maintain his self-respect. Had he died in the Roman Catholic faith and left his estate to the pope, he, in all probability, would hav been sainted, and the institution would hav borne the name of St. Stephen's Orphan Asylum, and its cross would hav been higher than any church in America. His deeds were his life, and his actions speak for him. I hope this will answer the question as to whether the teachings of Secularism are beneficial.

A Spirit's Tribute to Paine.

Whilst Spiritualists sometimes say savage things of Materialism, there are those among them who can appreciate the Liberalizing work of Materialists, as witness the attached extract in praise of Thomas Paine, given in a Fourth of July oration by J. J. Morse, London, or by his purported "spirit control," printed in the Banner of Light, July 7th. The entire address is admirable, whether coming from a ghostly source or originating with the sensible orator.

Then follow the thunder of cannon, the clash of arms, the conflict of opposing forces, and the Continental troops grow weary and dispirited. Some are afraid that ammunition, the commissariat, and money will fall short, that for lack of numbers and lack of material the conflict will hav to dwindle into an ignominious conclusion. At this time one of the stanchest lovers of liberty that stood upon the scene of continental strife makes his voice heard and presence felt. For some years a mighty agitation had been inaugurated by this man, whose voice that had vigorously assailed the old systems of ecclesiasticism and politics was yet sounding on the air. This man's bright mind and earnest soul were cast with full weight and force into the destiny of the Continental struggle, with heart and soul, mind and brain, tongue and pen, so that when the Continental forces were growing weary, "The Rights of Man" rung out upon the breeze. Those writings were printed, distributed broadcast, and read at the head of every company of the Continental forces. There was the pivotal point; "The Rights of Man" stirred every soldier's breast, gave new life and fresh courage to the army, and from that sprang such determination to do or die that it conquered in the end, and gave you the liberty you now fully enjoy. This man has been denounced; bigots hav reviled him, ignorant fanatics hav obscured the labor he did and the service that he gave you, but the enlightened present and a still more enlightened posterity will tell you who he was, and it will be found that you will hav to giv him his due and proper place in the framing of that Declaration of Independence whose principles you celebrate to-day. When, hereafter, that name stands revealed, all will know the soul who did so much to revive the courage, stir the pulses, expose the errors and the evil that were oppressing your forefathers, who helped them forward in their hour of trial, and then the world will write in letters of gold in the heart of Columbia herself the name of Thomas Paine.

No wonder religious people feared him in the country across the sea. If his doctrins were true, he had undermined a state that sanctioned the theory of the divine right as associated with kings; torn the mask away from a hereditary ruler, uprooted the fiction of an aristocracy that, like leeches, sucked the blood from the common laborers of the land. No wonders they denounced him, for his voice was as the voice of a god, kindling life and action in the hearts of men, that, in the name of liberty, they might drive the evils that oppressed them from the world!

Official Call for Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

To the Local Secular Unions, Life, Charter, and Annual Members, and all Liberal citizens who support the Nine Demands of Secularism, Greeting:

You are hereby invited to attend the Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, which will convene at Lafayette Hall, Wood street, near 4th, Pittsburgh, Pa., Friday, October 5, 1888, at 10 A.M., for a four days' session—5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th inclusiv.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-Presidents, all Chairmen of State or Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Unions are entitled to seats and votes in this Annual Congress. Each Local Secular Union is entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates. Annual Members who pay or hav paid $1 in the national treasury are entitled to seats, but not to votes, except by unanimous consent of the Congress.

This Congress will specially consider practical questions tending to further agitation for taxation of church property; the abrogation of state aid to sectarian institutions; abolition of state, national, military, and prison chaplaincies; repeal of judicial oaths, Sunday and other oppressiv and unjust ecclesiastical laws; nullification of attempts to subvert our Constitution by a legal recognition of Theism in the American Magna Charta, and such other measures as will not merely thwart intended theological encroachments, but will absolutely expunge from our laws, state and federal, such insidious acts as hav already crept in to blot out mental freedom from our republic.

It is to be hoped that the addresses delivered will deal with the practical issues of the organization, so that there will be such an awakening of the people to these vital questions of the hour that a revival of the instinct of liberty and justice for all will necessarily result; that again from the Keystone state—the birthplace of our association—the clarion voice of freedom shall vibrate throughout the land.

Pittsburgh being situated almost in the center of a district containing many of our most distinguished workers, thinkers, and writers, besides the activ host within its limits, there is little doubt but that this Congress will be a glorious gathering of the forces who stand for mental liberty, as expressed in the desire for complete Secularization of the government.

President Putnam at the Forum.

The Chicago Secular Union has had another feast of Freethought, for our poet president has just given us two inspiring lectures not soon to be forgotten in the history of the Forum, where good lectures are always looked for. Samuel P. Putnam's Sunday afternoon and evening addresses surpassed all his previous efforts here, and won frequent and heartiest plaudits from his host of admirers. "The Bible and Modern Thought" is a severely logical argument which shows the wild impossibilities which orthodoxy atraches to "holy writ," and the wreck of reason and experience necessary to accept the definitions and limitations of the so-called religions. Our Secular soldier assails this citadel of dogmatism—the Bible—as though at the head of a courageous, indomitable, and irresistible storming party, and quickly levels the enemies' ramparts to the earth, playing havoc generally with their munitions and supplies and floating the standard of reason aloft. By special request he gave in the evening "The Glory of Infidelity," and took us to traverse hights sublime with heroic thoughts and deeds of those who, in the troublous past, then trod this ignorant, ungrateful world. "The Glory of Infidelity" makes us proud to bear that term of reproach; it makes life eminently elastic and proves that the heretics increase the world's wealth of knowledge; it givs us clearer, wider, deeper stretch of mental vision, and thus confronts us as Secularists with the importance of our present duty, besides picturing the substantial realization of a Secular paradise, where peace, wisdom, and justice may find a resting-place, and bigotry, hatred, and superstition be forever banished. It was a refreshing draught of mental ozone.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

COOS COUNTY, ORE., Aug. 15th–28th.—It is a long railroad ride from Corvallis to Roseburgh, where I arrived at 2:30 in the morning, and at once sought a much-needed bed, with only two hours and a half of repose. I rose at 5 A.M. to take stage to Dora. The so-called stage proved to be a wretched old buckboard, loaded with trunks, grips, boxes, and bundles, with the unfortunate passengers squeezed in between. They charged me $8.50 for jeopardizing my life, smothering me with dust, jolting my internal and bruising and cramping my external organization, from the effects of which I am not yet fully recovered. The road is execrable, and so narrow that when teams meet one has to back down sometimes over a quarter of a mile, then the passengers hav to assist in lifting the stage up the bank, and the other vehicle passes, rubbing the wheels of the stage on one side, the other tilting over a precipice at an angle of 95°. But they are used to it. It is only occasionally—not oftener than three or four times a month—that horses and people are pitched down the precipice and mangled or killed.

The scenery is romantic and grandly beautiful, but nineteen-twentieths of the time you cannot see through the thick clouds of dust, even if you could get the dust out of your eyes so as to see at all. I reached the home of that stalwart Liberal, James Laird, at 3:40 P.M., only to learn that he was absent, and that I had yet twenty-seven miles more to travel ere I reached Myrtle Point, where I was advertised to lecture at 8 P.M.

Despite every effort, the road was so bad, and over such steep mountains, that I did not reach Myrtle Point till 9:30 P.M. Friends had come in from a great distance, but had gone home discouraged, not knowing if I should come at all or not. Yet the Liberals of Myrtle Point gave me a right cordial greeting, and the next night I had a most enjoyable time delivering a lecture on "What Liberalism Teaches" to a large and very enthusiastic audience. The friends all expressed regrets that I could not stay another night.

Myrtle Point is full of jolly, genial, whole-souled, intelligent Liberals, who will never permit the car of progress to halt for lack of earnest, self-sacrificing efforts on their part.

COQUILLE CITY, Aug. 16th, 17th.—This is the one dark spot on beauteous Coos county. Here is where all the little, narrow-minded, penurious folks of the county congregate. They are under the spiritual control of an uncultured gospel-shouter, whom, despite his followers' great reverence for his spiritual attainments, they yet fail to pay enough to keep him from beggary.

Good, loyal, tried and trusty Henry Nichols did all he could, but the Liberals are so few, and even a majority of the few are so weakly, so overawed by Mrs. Grundy, they dare not aloud claim any proprietorship of their own souls.

At the first lecture there were only twenty persons present, and even at the second not over sixty. Yet I am glad I made an effort in the place, for the lectures stirred the stagnant putrescence into which even the good were sinking, and aroused a spirit of inquiry and discussion, so that lively debates were held in store and mill, forcing Christians to hunt the evidences of their faith, and may yet result in a healthier state of things, although it must be admitted the average Coquille citizen is so small-souled, dwarfed in intellect, and penurious that it will be slow, hard work to evolute him to anything like Liberalism.

ARAGO, Aug. 18th, 19th.—This is the home of J. Henry Schroeder. His name is the synonym for all that is manly, generous, public-spirited, and Liberal. Although he is an outspoken Infidel, there is no place or position of honor or trust in their gift which the citizens of Coos county would not gladly bestow on him. Here is additional evidence that Infidelity lived out helps, instead of injuring, popularity and good standing in an intelligent community.

The lectures were held at the pavilion on the county fair-grounds. (The spacious and admirably fitted up fair-grounds, with a splendid full-mile race track, are mainly due to the enterprise and liberality of J. Henry Schroeder and the Infidel friends.) There was quite a good attendance at the lecture on Saturday night. On Sunday we had a grand picnic, and lectures morning and afternoon. Large delegations came from Myrtle Point and adjacent places. The Schroeder brass band attended in full force, and performed some choice selections with admirable taste and skill. Dinner was held in the grove, a sumptuous repast—every delicacy,' fish, flesh, and fowl, and the luscious fruits for which this part of Oregon is unrivaled on the earth. There were over one hundred and fifty persons present. I sold large quantities of Liberal books and pamphlets, and obtained a number of new subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. All heartily enjoyed the occasion, and besought me to return next year, and bring Mrs. Reynolds with me.

BEAR CREEK, Aug. 20th.—Judge F. S. Lowe is the standard-bearer in this vicinity, and one of whom the Liberals may well feel proud. He is of the first settlers on the river, and has a very large and lovely ranch. His two sons are well worthy of so noble a sire, earnest Liberals, bright, intelligent workers for universal mental liberty.

The lecture was delivered at the school-house up Bear Creek. After rowing across the river from the house of Judge Lowe, we marched a mile and a half through the woods, along the creek's banks, to the school-house. Yet here, so seeming far from anywhere or anybody, there was quite a goodly rally of intelligent people who appreciated the truth made plain, and expressed determination to read and investigate, and do what they could to help others by circulating Liberal literature. In the morning I took the steamer to Bandon, of which more anon.

BANDON, ORE., Aug. 21st, 22d.—This is a thriving little town on the ocean shore. Its people are quite Liberally inclined. The newspaper folks take the lead in every good word and work. I found a curiosity—a perfect wonder—in the printing-office here. A crude, home-made printing-press, built thirty years ago by J. H. Bandon, with only a saw, maul, and ax for tools. It is made entirely of wood, except a marble slab used as a bedplate. The bedplate is 24x18 and runs in wooden grooves. The power of the press is constructed on the plan of a notary's seal. It does really excellent work. Such a press would not cost over $25, and would be invaluable in any small printing or newspaper office.

Thanks to the energetic efforts of J. Henry Schroeder, who imparted his own spirit of enthusiasm to all the Liberals in the vicinity, I had a good attendance, and aroused considerable interest by the delivery of two lectures.

MARSHFIELD, ORE., Aug. 23d, 24th, 25th.—This is the banner city of the banner county for Liberalism in Oregon. There are a few parsons and a number of Chinese who are not Liberal, but they are scarcely worth mentioning. Of course there are some intelligent birthright Christians, but they don't work at it much. Their piety is of the mildest kind and their real inclinations are toward Liberalism.

This is the home of the ever-genial Garfield, a whole-souled, generous-hearted Infidel and enterprising merchant, doing a very extensiv hardware business. Here, too, I enjoyed a visit with dear old Fred Mark, a Dane, a thoroughly naturalized American, one of nature's noblemen, a born mechanic, who has earned a handsome competency by his skill, industry, and enterprise. Despite his openly avowed Infidelity, he does the furniture business of the whole county, and, like Friend Garfield, is by all loved and respected.

I really greatly enjoyed lecturing in this place. My audiences seemed so fully in sympathy with me; even the Christians present were of the manly, honest kind, and acknowledged I had proved things from the Bible that were entirely new to them, and that necessitated their careful revision and investigation as to the evidences of their religious belief.

NORTH COOS RIVER, ORE., Sunday, Aug. 26th.—Sunday was a busy, happy day. Up at 6 A.M., on board the little steamer Bertha at 7 A.M. sharp, and steamed away along the north fork of Coos river. There were only a few passengers, and I felt a little doubtful of the success of our proposed picnic, but every few miles we made landings and took on passengers at the ranches along the river till our little craft was overloaded. On reaching my destination I was delighted at the beauty of the place, and agreeably surprised to find two hundred and fifty people there, and a happier, jollier crowd never assembled. I at once urged the duty of subscription to Liberal periodicals and delivered a lecture. After supplying the eager demand for Liberal publications, we adjourned to dinner.

Coos county is greatly favored by nature; she glories in superabundance of all desirable gifts, fish, fruit, grain, grass, cattle, lumber, and coal, and the people seem to partake of the same generous nature and liberal spirit. Oh, what a sumptuous, bounteous feast the ladies spread in that grove! No wonder the men are stalwart, jolly, and content; the women sprightly, bright, and happy. After dinner I gave the second lecture; it was listened to with deep interest and attention. At 4 P.M. I reëmbarked on the steamer and enjoyed a delightful sail back to Marshfield, only marred by having to bid good-bye to the kind friends along the route. I arrived at Marshfield at 7 P.M., and at 8 delivered a lecture in the hall, subject, "Salvation: Christian or Secular, Which?"

EMPIRE CITY, Aug. 27th, 28th.—This is a sawdust town on the coast, mainly depending on its mammoth saw-mill. S. H. Hazard, the able and distinguished lawyer, is the leading Liberal, and he knows just how to marshal the forces. The lectures were delivered at the court house. The first evening the attendance of ladies was small, but the second night there was a full delegation.

On the journey to Portland I had the pleasure to hav Ex-Governor Thayer (now judge of the supreme court of Oregon) and his good wife for compagnons de voyage. They are a most kindly, unassuming, lovable couple, both stanch Liberals, and interested in all that pertains to human progresss.

Thanks to good J. Henry Schroeder, who so self-sacrificingly and intelligently arranged for me, I had a most successful campaign in Coos county.

Poor Jamieson is grieved a column and a half, in the letter department of THE TRUTH SEEKER, over my proposition to debate with Braden, if he, Braden, would, from his own resources, pay half the expenses, and I the other half; and each pledge to giv all money received on account of such discussion to the sick and destitute.

Jamieson's "debating with Braden" has had its contaminating influence. The odor of the skunk has permeated him. In his long, silly tirade he evinces the same reckless disregard to truth—bombastic self-laudation—and the same mean, mercenary spirit of his dear friend and teacher, Clark Braden.

Jamieson's lachrymal whining is all on account of his loss of his job to debate at Silverton. Like Braden—his prototype—he givs himself away.

"Notwithstanding the Silverton committee requested me to hold myself in readiness to debate with Braden, and I refused calls to lecture East on account of the prospectiv debate West, I will release the gentleman, and Brother Reynolds will conduct the debate at a cheaper rate than I possibly can."

I never "retreated from Braden;" never, to my knowledge, hav been within a hundred miles of him, so could not possibly run from him. I never ran from Braden, or any other creature, but one—that was a rattlesnake on Lookout mountain. It takes a Jamieson to run after Braden—to laud and defend him for the sake of the money to be obtained by debate with him.

The wisdom of the advice of THE TRUTH SEEKER to avoid the skunk is fully demonstrated. Jamieson's contact with Braden has so demoralized and corrupted him that he cannot conceive the possibility of anyone being honest in offering to make any real sacrifice for the cause of truth, since neither he nor Braden would advocate or defend any cause only for the money they obtain by so doing.

What next? Jamieson and Braden in partnership—arranging series of debates, and traveling together—for what money there is in it. Alas! poor Jamieson to become the mere tool of such a thing as Clark Braden—too bad, too bad! But it is the natural effect of bad associates.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Lecturing in the Lake States.

Saturday, September 8th, I bid my wife and babies an affectionate farewell—even the little black dog had to shake his master's hand good-bye—and started on my first lecturing tour of any extent.

With not a few misgivings and fears as to the results of the future did I take this step. It is no easy thing for a young man, without fame or fortune, to break away from home, when he knows that his absence causes many a heart-ache and lonely sigh from those who are dearer to him than his own life. Nevertheless, having determined, several years ago, to devote the best years of my life to the service of humanity, I felt that the time had arrived to commence work.

I reached Deuster, Wis., the place of my first appointment, late Saturday night; there is no town there, nothing but a platform where the train stops for passengers. There was no light to be seen—no sound even reached me but the rumbling of car wheels, as the train was vanishing in the distance. What could be the matter—had Mr. Kruschke failed to receive my card announcing the date of my visit?

As I stood there revolving in my mind what to do, I saw a shed I took to be a horse-stable, and being of an ever-hopeful disposition, I was about to see what chance there would be for a Liberal missionary to get lodgings. I began to sympathize with him "who had not where to lay his head," when I heard buggy wheels rattling along the road. Soon an old gentleman drove up and asked the lonely wretch standing there if he answered to the name of Dawes, being answered in the affirmativ. I received a hearty hand-shake, and was made to feel at home. We drove to Mr. Kruschke's house, two miles from the railroad, and there being a social dance at another one of the Kruschke's, we were also taken there, and spent part of the night in visiting. Word was given out that there would be a Freethought lecture at the hall over Mr. Kruschke's cranberry house the next evening.

Where an audience was to come from was a query with me. But Mr. Kruschke drove around to the neighbors, far and near, inviting them to the lecture. Then, to my surprise, an audience of nearly one hundred greeted me. After the lecture the young folks enjoyed themselvs again, for two or three hours, with a social dance. No hesitation in enjoying oneself in that neighborhood on account of the Lord's day—no church within ten miles accounts for it. Preachers are about as conspicuous for their absence there, as they are at present in Jacksonville, Fla.

From Deuster I came on to Minnesota Lake, but no arrangements had been made for a lecture; we tried what could be done in so short a time, but a ball in town spoilt affairs for us. Arrived at Delavan and met Mr. Horton and Mr. and Mrs. Geddes. I had been advertised to speak there, but nearly everyone was away to the state fair, so thought it best to postpone the lecture until after my engagement at Fairmont. I crowded myself onto the friends at Fairmont a day ahead of time, but I was made welcome with Mr. and Mrs. Merritt and Mr. and Mrs. Bonney, who are enthusiastic Liberals. There is also Mr. House, the harness-maker, and Mr. Kendall and his aged mother-in-law, Mrs. Moore.

The meetings at Fairmont were a grand success. The lecture Monday night was, "What Objections to Christianity?" and Tuesday night, "Has Christianity Benefited Women?" The hall was well filled each night by intelligent and attentiv listeners. The ladies placed on the table each night two beautiful bouquets, and helped to make the meetings successful.

At the close of the lecture, Tuesday night, we organized a Secular Union of ten members, and there will be others with them soon. And we hav every hope of the success of the Union at Fairmont, as the ladies are engaged, and when they are for us there is something encouraging—the orthodox ask if God is for them, who can be against them, but if it were not for the support of the women, their Gods, devils, saviors, and churches would hav been laid down in brine long ago.

The charter-members of the Union at Fairmont are: J. House, president; Mrs. John Merritt, secretary; Mrs. H. Bonney, treasurer; John W. Merritt, H. H. Bonney, H. I. Townsend, A. B. Payne, G. Kendall, Mrs. E. Moore, Delbert Dale. Long will I remember the pleasant visit and kind friends at Fairmont, Minn.

I can assure any lecturer who may be called to Fairmont that he will be received by as good and sensible and hospitable a class of Liberals as there is in the world.

From Fairmont I returned to Delavan, but things worked a little out of joint again at Delavan. Political conventions and fairs had taken most of the people friendly toward Liberal ideas out of town. But a very small and very attentiv audience of gentlemen gathered about half-past 8, and I gave a talk of thirty or forty minutes.

At Delavan I was entertained at the home of Mr. Giddes, who is ever ready to put forth some effort in behalf of liberty of thought and speech. From Delavan I go to Waterville, Minn. Liberals in Iowa and Missouri wishing lectures, and who would like to favor me, can address me at Waterville, Minn.

GEO. H. DAWES.

Lectures and Meetings.

MRS. M. A. FREEMAN'S lecturing engagements are as follows: Pittsburgh, October 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th; Farmdale, 11th, 12th; Andover, 13th, 14th; Painesville, 16th, 17th; Canal Fulton, 18th, 19th; Akron, 21st, afternoon and evening.

OWING to illness, Mr. G. H. Hertwig notifies us that he cannot attend the Pittsburgh Congress of the American Secular Union. He will fill his other lecturing engagements when he recovers, which he thinks, and we trust rightly, will be very soon.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club begins its fall and winter meetings on the 5th instant. The first lecture is by Henry Nichols, who will consider "A Protectiv Tariff." October 12th S. P. Putnam will speak on "The Reign of the People." Dr. Foote, Jr., the genial president of the club, hopes the hall will be crowded on October 5th, though he will be in Pittsburgh. The place of meeting is the old one, German Masonic Temple, 220 East 15th street.

Communications.

Babylon.—Concluded.

All the ancient religions of centuries and ages before the Christian era had their prophets, seers, and oracles, so the God of the Jews must hav his also; and every one of them, Jew or pagan, was a self-made prophet.

Of what use are prophets and prophecies at any time, or in any age?

Can anyone giv a good reason why God's prophets are not on earth to-day as well as three thousand years ago?

What is the reason that miracles and violations of the laws of nature do not occur now as well as in centuries past?

And why did God appear on earth and talk familiarly and flippantly to men at the time these Bible prophets say he did, and at no other time?

The first thing that King Cyrus did after getting possession of Babylon was to thank the gods—not God—for the success they had given him. Then in honor of the taking of the city—by the orders of King Cyrus—a great religious pageant and feast was held, of the last of which I quote from Rollin the following description: "When they came to the field consecrated to the gods, they offered the sacrifices, first to the sun and then to Jupiter. To the honor of the first they burnt bulls, and to the honor of the second horses."

When the church talks about the barbarity of heathen sacrifices, and the idolatry of the pagan religion, it should bear in mind that King Cyrus was God's anointed, and his beastly and inhuman sacrifices, and idolatrous ceremonies, the accounts of which are in the five books of Moses, where they were ordered by the Christian's God and participated in by Aaron and the high priests, far exceed others. King Solomon, one of this God's favorits, sacrificed to his and the Christian's God at one time twenty-two thousand oxen and one hundred and twenty thousand sheep. King Cyrus lived about thirty years after the capture of Babylon, which event took place about 500 B.C. His last words were: "My sons, fear the gods [not God], who never die; who see all things, and whose power is omnipotent. Fear them and let that fear prevent you from ever doing anything contrary to justice and right."

Compare the last words of this heathen king with the last words of that God-exalted and Christian saint, King David, as recorded in 1 Kings ii. Does any unbiased man believe for a moment that King Cyrus ever spoke the words that the last verse of 2 Chronicles says he did, namely: "All the kingdoms of the earth hath the Lord God of heaven given me, and he hath charged me to build him a house in Jerusalem?" This is untrue, for Cyrus never owned all the kingdoms of the earth. The latter part of this verse condemns itself, for no devout worshiper of paganism, as King Cyrus proved himself to be, would ever forsake the gods of his religion by turning infidel and acknowledging other gods. any more than a devout worshiper of the Hebrew God to-day would in any way acknowledge or build a temple for heathen gods.

The character of this heathen, this idolator, whom the scriptures say was God's anointed, and the man that Israel's God chose to do those horrible deeds prophesied by Isaiah, was good. We hav no account of him doing or allowing his soldiers to do such atrocious deeds as this man Isaiah—who claimed to be God's prophet—said he would do. Therefore he put into the mouth of his God the name of the wrong man for such diabolical purposes. This deity of the Jews, about the time he chose Cyrus to do his work, was almost destitute of followers. For over four thousand years, amongst the many populous and enlightened nations that surrounded this Jewish nation not one worshiped or recognized this being in any way, and, as far as ancient history informs us, did not know of his existence; and in this respect profane history is sustained by the Bible. This book savs further that at about the time King Cyrus took Babylon, or some years before, the Jews, with the exception of a few Jew priests, had deserted their God and turned pagans. Strange that these people, continually seeing the wonderful things done, and miracles performed right before their eyes, should hav no fear or veneration for the being that did them, but were continually rebelling against him. It was about this time that occurred that wonderful miracle, as related in 2 Kings, of the angel of the Lord that went out and smote in the camp of the Assyrians one hundred and fourscore and five thousand. When they—it must mean those he smote—rose early in the morning they were all dead corpses. Also that miracle of knocking down the walls of Jericho by blowing ram's horns, and many others equally absurd and surprising. All these seemed to hav no effect on the chosen people of this Bible God. This being, then, had but the one nation of followers for about four thousand years, and a great part of the time but few of them. And even at this day there is not one nation of people that show by their deeds and actions that they believe in this God of the Hebrews and the Christian religion.

The Rev. H. W. Beecher declared there was not a Christian nation on the face of the earth. He was right. I suppose this country comes as near to being one as any other, and yet, as nearly as I can estimate, there is not to exceed fifteen per cent of the population of America that dies Protestant Christian, and of the world's population not two. Then to call this a Christian nation, where eighty-five per cent of the people die outside of Protestant churches, would be a clear case of the tail wagging the dog.

But, from this digression, let us return and finish Babylon. Amongst all the nations that existed before the Christian era, the Jewish nation stood lowest in the scale of civilization, and their God was theirs alone. Every reader of ancient history knows that Rollin wrote the truth when he said, "Through the multitude of profane history which heathen antiquity furnishes, and in every part thereof, there reigns an entire oblivion, not to say worse, of the almighty. The Jews were the only people who, in that age, acknowledged God." And, again, he says in speaking of some of the best and wisest men of ancient Rome and Athens: "I hav observed that certain examples exhibit a noble and grand scene in history. But only one country, and that of very small extent, knew the true God. In Judah is God known. His name is great in Israel. Elsewhere all mouths are mute in respect to him. Men adored everything but God, and other religions had deluged the whole earth."

Isaiah, in his fearful prophecies against Babylon, said the city should be overthrown and no traces of it left, and wild beasts of the desert shall roam there. Now, this was all to happen soon, for he said, "And her time was near at hand; and her days shall not be prolonged." To show the utter falsity of these prophecies, it is only necessary to state that Babylon, after it was conquered by Cyrus, remained a great city until Alexander the Great captured it four hundred years afterward, and it was then a great and magnificent city. And among other gifts presented to Alexander when he captured Babylon, was a set of astronomical observations taken by the inhabitants for a space of nineteen hundred and three years, which, consequently, went as far backward as the age of Ninus.

Babylon never was destroyed by fire or the sword, as these impostors said it would be. On account of the Persian kings removing their places of residence to other cities, it went into gradual decay, and about 100 B.C. the last of its inhabitants removed to a rival city, the abode of the Persian kings. Some years after this, a portion of Babylon was used as a public park and zoological garden. Fanatical theology, like drowning men catching at straws, because wild beasts were kept in cages in this park tried to construe it into the fulfilment of the prophecy, "That wild beasts shall lie there." Nations and cities, like human beings, are born, grow, liv, and die. This great city of Babylon lived much longer than the average life of cities. It stood as one of the wonders of the world for over two thousand years, notwithstanding hundreds of cities all around it were destroyed by wars, desolation, and the ravages of time.

Babylon, therefore, remained a monument to refute false prophecies, and to defeat the vengeance of the wrathful God of these (at that time) marauding, barbarous, and savage tribes of Jews. At the time the Bible says Nebuchadnezzar was eating grass with cattle (why did not the writer of this book write a probable lie instead of an improbable and ridiculous one?) profane history says he was engaged in a thirteen years' siege of Tyre. Isaiah said his God swore he would destroy this city also. Now, I for one agree to take the word of any God that selects Isaiah or any other of these Bible prophets to make evil prognostications for him, as well without swearing as swearing, for I do not think swearing is a divine attribute. I hav not, nor hav other people, much respect for prophets that flourish to-day, and I cannot see why we should respect men that assumed to be oracles, seers, prophets, or sorcerers three thousand years ago. And I can see no difference between those that do business for pagan gods and those who do business for Israel's God.

Damascus was another city of which Isaiah prophesied destruction, in these words: "The burden of Damascus. Behold Damascus is taken away from being a city, and it shall be a ruinous heap." Damascus can be traced back for forty centuries, and was a city in the days of Abraham. It never was destroyed, and is one of the oldest cities in the world, and a flourishing city to-day. So much for lying prophets and prophecies. The prophecies of Daniel and Revelation are wild, dreamy, and visionary, written by cunning and demented Jews in vague, symbolic, and ambiguous language. And as in all other prophecies in the Bible, there is no specified time mentioned when these terrible predictions of evil are to be fulfilled. They can be construed to mean everything and anything, but they really mean nothing. Like the darky's trap, they are sot to cotch the coon a-going and a-coming. Prophets and prophecies are bad, and of no benefit whatever. On the contrary, they hav an evil tendency, and hav done much harm in all ages. The predictions are almost invariably of disaster, pestilence, famin, destruction of cities, the end of the world, and similar evils. The foretelling of these horrible calamities unsettles the minds of weak-minded people, and, like all religious excitement, has a tendency to produce insanity and suicide.

JOHN IRWIN.

Chicago, April, 1888.

Higgledy-Piggledy.

Of the multifarious higgledy-piggledy that adorns the pages of the Holy Queer, and appropriately so, perhaps, the sample to be met with in the latter portion of the fourth chapter of Exodus, takes, if not the entire cake, a very liberal slice thereof. It appears that Jahveh and Moses had had a confab regarding Pharaoh and his personal or primogenial belongings, Jahveh threatening to do thus and so, if Pharaoh did not do so and thus, as it were. This confab I speak of winds up with the twenty-second and twenty-third verses, as follows, Jahveh speaking to Moses:

22: "And thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, even my first born." 23: "And I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me; and if thou refuse to let him go, behold, I will slay thy son, even thy first born." This ends the discussion, the twenty-fourth verse opening out as follows: "And it came to pass by the way in the inn, that the Lord met him and sought to kill him."

Now, the question is, Who did Jahveh meet by the way in the inn, and seek to kill? Was it Moses, some time after the confab had terminated, or was it the primogenial chip of the old block, Pharaoh? This verse, sprung as it is upon one without hint or warning, startles and shocks, and quite considerably flabbergasts the reader, unless he be of the Talmage type, which bolts everything at a gulp, without a thought. To the members of this type, who are never startled or incited to think, the course over the cross-cut sea of higgledy-piggledy and incongruity in this and other chapters is plain sailing, and they never hav to start a sheet or brace a yard.

The ordinary reader, somewhat startled by the alleged murderous intent of Jahveh, takes it that the latter met and sought to kill Moses, and lets it go at that, feeling that it is no funeral of his; but the reader who is shocked by said intent, as set forth, asks himself, Who did Jahveh meet and seek to kill? and concludes that it was the "chip" as above mentioned; then he goes back and reads over again to find that he couldn't safely bet on said chip, winding up by refusing to bet on either party; and this is the position in which I find myself. I would like to bet, but want to bet safely, and can't, for the life of me, decide whether to bet on Mose or the "other feller." Talmage and, no doubt, the good Shepard man of the Mail and Express could each giv me the tip, but unfortunately I should hav no confidence in the winning power of either tip.

That Jahveh met some one "by the way in the inn [take notice that no previous mention is made of the inn] and sought to kill him," is a cocksure thing, it being thus recorded in Ex. iv, 24. Now, who was that somebody? If Moses, why did Jahveh seek to kill him? If the primogenial scion of the house of Pharaoh, why didn't he kill him? Was the intended victim too many for him—too cute, too fly, as it were? We read of no one else in the Holy Queer who ever got away when Jahveh "sought to kill him," and the devil of it is, we don't know who this lucky fellow was.

It is taken for granted, of course, that Jahveh didn't accomplish his object, but why? Did he repent him of his murderous intention? Hardly, else had the fact been chronicled with other, and by no means few, repentances of his. It follows, then, that the party, whether Moses or the "other fellow," was too fly for him, which is a sockdologer! The party who was too cute for Jahveh, when the latter was on the warpath, was some tar on a stick, and don't you forget it. Satisfied that Jahveh did not repent him of his death-dealing intention, also that he did not carry it out, as would hav been recorded in either case, I am completely flabbergasted to think that the intended victim escaped the would-be killer! It knocks me galley-west to think that such a thing could be to overcome one like a summer cloud, or a wet blanket, say.

There must be some mistake about this circumstance or the report thereof, it seems to me. If Jahveh really met anyone "by the way in the inn, and sought to kill him," that fellow's goose was as good as cooked, if Jahveh was what he cracked himself up to be, for when he was on the kill, it was woe to those he sought to get away with; they were doomed and as good as done for! That he didn't carry out the bloody program, goes without saying, as otherwise it would hav been recorded that he was in at the death, sure pop. Of course it is barely possible that he repented and let up on the mysterious party, but I take no stock in such a hypothesis, as he was not at all bashful about admitting repentance. Now, he either met a person "by the way in the inn, and sought to kill him," or he didn't. If there was such a meeting, with such intent, then was Jahveh euchred and not the party he cracked himself up to be, and as he showed himself to be on many occasions when in pursuit of gore; if there was no such meeting, then he allowed a senseless, lying report concerning himself to get into the columns of the Holy Queer, the same to muddle all creation for all time, save those of the Talmage type. But this is not likely. The report, such as it is, is there, and the occurrence, such as it was, took place, of course, simply for the reason that it is recorded in the H. Q.

That Jahveh was euchered, somehow, in that transaction, is rather surprising and not a little gratifying, but what exercises me is, Who was the party that escaped him—Moses or the first born of Pharaoh? With all my lamps, search as I may; with all my augers, bore as I may, I cannot determin which was the he that Jahveh met in the tavern and sought to kill. Can any of my readers make it plain to me that it was Moses? Can any make it plain to me that it was the primogenial scion of the house of Pharaoh? Who says Moses, I will bet him 'twas the "other feller," who says the latter, I will bet him 'twas Moses, when, if they bet, they will hav to prove up, I in the mean time holding the stakes. If this is satisfactory, come one, come all, the more the merrier!

Now for more higgledy-piggledy; in fact, higgledy-piggledy on higgledy-piggledy's head accumulates in Exodus, chapter iv. Immediately following the verse relating to the meeting in the tavern, comes one (the 25th) leading off thusly: "Then Zipporah [no previous mention of "Zipporah" in the chapter] took a sharp stone and cut——" well, she performed a surgical operation peculiar to Hebraic medical jurisprudence, yelling after the operation, that some one —no name mentioned—was a "bloody husband" to her, when, in fact, she was the bloody wife, as it looks to me. Immediately the 26th verse gets in its work, opening out in this wise: "So he let him go"—the rest of the verse is but a repeat of the woman's words. Here's higgledy-piggledy for you in all its richness, in the two verses immediately following that relating to the tavern episode—higgledy-piggledy of a three-ply, triple X pattern!

"So he let him go." Now, that's as clear as river mud permeated with sludge acid, but no clearer, and all may not get onto it—I don't, for one. Who let him go? Who let who go? Who was "he" and who was "him?" What did he let him go for? Who was it that let him go, anyhow? I tell you this would flabbergast a Bismarck, but would it a Talmage? Never! Why, that most remarkable saw-mill-swallower could, blindfolded, and with his hands tied behind, tell us who was which and which was who without turning a hair, and I'll bet on it. Alas, we are not all Talmages! This is not our fault, but our misfortune, and for one I exclaim, in accents wild, Bully for the misfortune!

The higgledy-piggledy continues, the 27th verse bouncing us to a distance and an interview in which Jahveh and Aaron appear, but which is of no consequence, as Toots would say, only going to show that higgledy-piggledy appeared to be Jahveh's strong holt the day he got up the fourth chapter of Exodus! I read the latter portion of said chapter to a Bible-bawling acquaintance and asked him who the "Lord met by the way in the inn, and sought to kill?"

"Moses," said he at once, without a gasp.

"Are you sure?" said I.

"Let me read that myself," said he.

"Oh, that was Pharaoh's first-born," said he, after his own reading.

"Cocksure of that, are you?" said I.

"Well, it was one or the other," said he, with all the wiseacre look of Sir Oracle, I feeling that I stood by the fount of "exceeding much wisdom," being correspondingly elate! SI SLOKUM.

A Christian Jumps on Comstock.

Don Platt in Belford's Magazine.

Our peculiar form of government, that is construed to mean the largest liberty to those who can seize it, generally the self-willed and selfish, and a corresponding limit to the timid and helpless, has largely developed a pest that is restrained and in a measure abated under more despotic governments. In this we refer to the self-constituted reformers who go about looking after the morals of other people.

The principle underlying the European despotisms is that it is easier for one class to govern another than it is to govern itself. This is practical politics, and has been demonstrated to be sound and safe through many thousands of years.

We are not advocating this European and Eastern system. We are only stating a fact, for we are truly patriotic and believe in self-government as constituted by the fathers. But with this condition before us it can be seen that we hav no place for the self-constituted reformers whose business in life is to look after and govern other people than themselvs. It is strange, therefore, that we should be beset more than any other people with this pest.

Of course, as this is a self government, the care of the people's morals is eliminated from our political structure. It is one of the foundations of our constitutional law that every man is left to worship God in accordance with the dictates of his own conscience. True, some well-meaning but gravely mistaken people insist that this does not preclude the enforcement of some sort of worship. Such provision would nullify the right of entire liberty in that respect. It was meant by the fathers, who knew in this what they were doing, that all moral questions were to be left open to a settlement between the man and his maker. They limited the intervention of the government to overt acts of violence against the peace and well-being of the community. A man may be arrested, tried, and punished for blasphemy, not because his mind and morals are in a shockingly bad condition, but for that he disturbs the peace of the neighborhood by his violent and and unseemly language.

Of course, under this state of facts there is no place given for moral legislation, for no man has a right to look after the moral condition of another man; for if he had, self-government would cease at once to exist. It is true we recognize the authority of the church, with its moral suasion and the power given it in public opinion—that public opinion which crucified our savior, and is ready now to crucify anyone who fails or refuses to worship him. But the moment the church calls in the aid of the government, and drops its reliance on moral suasion and the consequent public opinion, it crosses the line so clearly laid down by our blessed redeemer when he said, "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's."

And yet in spite of all this we meet at every turn, almost, a self-constituted reformer, more or less earnest, who makes himself extremely unpleasant by a vociferous demand on one to correct his moral condition by the standard such animated nuisance sets up and believes in. Sometimes this unpleasant person appears in the shape of a temperance advocate. He will brook no denial. He would hav dealers in liquor hanged, drawn, and quartered. He wants stringent laws and a quick execution of them. Now, all thoughtful minds recognize the evils of intemperance, and the temperance organizations hav wrought out great good to the community through their efforts. It will be found, however, that this good has come from moral suasion and public opinion. So far as legislation is concerned, Henry Reed, an able journalist, disposed of it in a few terse sentences when he called attention to the fact that the law against selling liquor could be of no avail so long as the law of God recognized the right to drink liquor. The abuse of the natural appetite found in overt acts of violence against society can be taken cognizance of and restrained or punished, but to assail by law a class for selling what the citizens hav a right to use cannot be made successful.

Of this sort of unpleasant person is the Communist, who seeks to reconstruct the social world by law. Yet more offensiv is the Anarchist, who goes to the other extreme. And of this sort, and the most intolerable of all, is Anthony Comstock.

Now, there is nothing in the moral law, nor in the Constitution as amended, that prohibits a man from asserting in a mild, gentlemanly way that he is more chaste than his neighbors. There may be an opinion among the listeners that the boaster is lying, or that he is restrained by some natural or other defectiv condition from the abuse he claims to be free of. But we all recognize the virtue of chastity, and we would that all men, especially other men, were chaste; therefore we are patient with the modern Joseph so long as he remains gentlemanly in his claims. But when such a remarkable man gets vociferous and crowds, as it were, his chastity down our throats, when he goes further and seeks and obtains the aid of law, the indignation is deep, wide-spread, and justifiable.

To say that the modern St. Anthony is extremely offensiv in this way to the people of the United States, and especially of New York, is to express but feebly the feeling his existence creates. He appeals to that class of our fellow-citizens who recognize but one crime in all the calendar, and devote themselvs to its punishment. Cruelty, intemperance, treachery, fraud, theft, murder—in a word, the entire list, exists in their eyes as of small concern beside the one offense of incontinence. These are mostly elderly gentlemen, and St. Anthony has succeeded in organizing them into a body which may be entitled, "An Association for the Immediate Control and Future Suppression of the Sexual Passions." St. Anthony's stock-in-trade consists of some awful instruments and hideously obscene books that he carries about with him, and exhibits to the curious gaze of the bald-headed patriarchs, who are filled with horror, and incontinently resolve things.

It is a singular law of our being that when the passions are burnt out through excess, a sense of disgust sets in that makes its victim a misery to himself and all with whom he comes in contact. It is the shirt of Nemesis that is given as a punishment for such excess, and the sufferer finds himself possessed of a strange fascination that holds him to a consideration continually of what givs him nothing but horror and disgust. And recognizing this fact, we ought to feel a pity for St. Anthony and his aged followers —as much so as we do for the miserable wretches in Eastern lands who are purposely reduced to this condition for the better protection of seraglios.

This would be our feeling—one of mingled disgust and pity—were it not for the mischief and irritation they cause by their control of the law-making power. Any wrong may be perpetrated upon us if done in the name of God and morality. It is like the cry of liberty in France, since broadened into "equality, fraternity, liberty," under which poor Madam Roland, when about to lose her fair and capable head, said all crimes were done. St. Anthony's first achievement was getting a law through Congress making the post-office department a great moral machine. The integrity of that necessary arm of the government was violated in an attempt to prevent the transmission of immoral letters. Not only this, but the pernicious author of the measure was given an office that covered the cost of transportation, and the right to open letters at will where he suspected the contents were objectionable.

No other civilized people on earth would permit such an outrage. When the head of the English post-office department, in the troublesome times of Garibaldi, had reason to believe the mails were being used to further assassination, and tampered with the letters intrusted to his care, such an indignant cry went up that he was forced to resign. Under the despotism of Louis Napoleon, when the emperor's life was in peril at all hours, the revolutionary committee at London could use the French mails with an impunity that was limited to the watchfulness of an army of detectivs, who seized the circulars and letters after delivery. Neither the czar of Russia nor the iron duke of Germany dare attempt what this man Comstock has accomplished in the United States.

The latest phase of this chaste war is an attack on the nude in art. It is laid down as the law that, in art or in nature, for a human being to appear or to be made appear as God created him or her, especially her, is to commit a crime. We owe all our virtue to the tailor and the dressmaker, for, according to this, our modesty depends on our clothes, and when we retire at night, or take a bath, we hang our modesty on hooks or chairs. A gentleman's pure wife or innocent daughter who dresses for an entertainment with exposed bust and bare arms is to that extent immodest, or, as the "Society for the I. C. and F. S. of the Sexual Passions" would assert, to that extent without chastity.

This is not only the talk of moral eunuchs, but the vulgarity of brutal ignorance. Of course there are men filled with evil thoughts at the sight of an innocent girl's bare shoulders; but that is the crime of the man, not of the girl; and such a brute would hav the same feelings before the shrine of a saint.

True, there is, we are pained to write—for we would all men were chaste—such a thing as lascivious works of art. But such evil finds more expression in pose and look of countenance than in drapery, or in the absence of it. Indeed, the clothing so much harped upon often serves such evil far more than nakedness. As a learned judge said, in a puzzled way, not long since, when a number of pictures were seized by the society for the I. C. and F. S. of the Sexual Passions, in his eyes the most objectionable painting was one with the figures clad in accordance with the law. Indeed, it is common for the front row of bald-heads at a theater—old gentlemen graduating into the S. for the I. C. and F. S.—to look weariedly at the nude bodies of the ballet, and awaken into intense interest when a wicked little singer leers at them from her lovely face as she lifts her skirts and exhibits a shapely foot and a round ankle.

The worst feature of all this chaste fad is to be found in the insult it offers our women. They are treated as if they were an inferior class that had to be protected by eunuchs as the slaves of the East are. God help us if the virtue of our mothers and daughters depend on legal enactment and the assinin activity of Comstock! They were saints through generations before this Comstock was born, and saints the blessed women—the mothers of the people—will continue long after the animated nuisance is dead and forgotten.

It is, also, an insult to the church, whose holy office it is to care for the morals of the people. We discern no loss of power in this direction, nor are we likely to, for such would force the confession that the mission of our savior was a failure. The law under which this Comstock and his associates are doing their mischief should be entitled "An Act to Amend an Act entitled the Act of God," and it is the duty of the church to say that no such legislation is called for.

It is a shame and a disgrace to our people that this gang of ignorant and vulgar cranks should be permitted to enter the house of a respectable merchant and drag him and his wares into a criminal court, on the prurient beastliness of their low tastes. If such laws are to pollute our statute-books, regularly appointed officials should be commissioned to execute their provisions, and not allow and encourage these pests in their crazy raids on civilized humanity.

Badness.

We find the following in the Christian Advocate, Methodist organ, of September 27th. The Advocate is edited by the Rev. James M. Buckley, D.D., at college called "Jim," and noted for his facility in constructing sentences which bore little relation to the events or sentiments which they purported to describe. Inasmuch as the words quoted are those used by the Editor of this journal, we fancy Mr. Buckley means THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"The most blasphemous, malignant, and vulgar Infidel paper ever published in this country, and probably as bad as any ever conceived by the human mind, speaking of a note published in the Christian Advocate on Rabbi Jacob Joseph, in which it was stated that he had come none too soon, for many of the Hebrews hereabouts were Infidels, says: 'It is queer to see that the Methodists would rather hav a man a superstitious Jew than an Infidel, or words to that effect,' and then asks: 'Is it one slavedriver sympathizing with another?' No, it is rather two ships in somewhat different kinds of legitimate business uniting against a pirate."

While it grieves us to see our beloved contemporary in such a state of mental perturbation, we are grateful for the authoritativ information that religion is a business, though the legitimacy of that way of making money is at least open to criticism. But we hav always held that the preachers were in the business for revenue only, and they naturally regard as pirates all who seek to take their customers away from them.

We admit the "blasphemy" of THE TRUTH SEEKER, deny the malignancy, and challenge Mr. Buckley to find in our columns any vulgarity whatever, or even anything one-thousandth part as vulgar as the "word of God," commonly called the Bible. There are chapters upon chapters in that work which we would not reprint in these columns for any consideration. In fact, we do not believe Mr. Buckley would print them in the Advocate. The charge of vulgarity is the unsubstantiated and untruthful assertion of an enemy of mental freedom and human justice.

Why is THE TRUTH SEEKER bad? How is it bad? We and our correspondents are simply showing that Christianity is as false as any other supernaturalism; that it is not true in fact; that it is absurd and illogical in theory; that the Old Testament, "from the first mistake in Genesis to the last curse in Malachi," is only the ignorant record of a barbaric people; and that the New Testament is a conglomeration of all the spiritual myths and legends that hav bothered the race from the cave man to the third century of our present era—in fact, to the last Revision. We simply ask as a matter of justice that the word of an honest Agnostic shall be put on an equality with that of a dishonest Christian; that the honest Agnostic shall not be taxed to support the dishonest Christian's religion; that the Agnostic shall not be compelled by law to observe a day which to him has no significance above other days; that he shall not be compelled when he goes to a public assemblage to hear an invocation to the Mumbo Jumbo of some ignorant and superstitious instructor in the art of guessing; that he shall not hav his pockets picked to pay for religious teaching in our schools, nor to support fat priests and lean ministers in soft positions in public institutions; and that he shall not legally be held to fast and pray and giv thanks when he is hungry and without cause for thankfulness. We only ask that every citizen of this country shall hav equal rights, civil and political, without regard to his religion or lack of religion. That is all. And these things are denounced by the Christians as "as bad as any ever conceived by the human mind." This denunciation shows the mental and moral obliquity of brains distorted by religion. Because we speak our honest thought, we are condemned as vile! Because we tell the truth about Christianity, we are blasphemous! Because we show up the ignorance, hypocrisy, and cruelty of the church, we are malignant and vulgar! A few decades ago we would hav been loaded with chains, tortured on the rack, strangled on a Puritan gallows, or burnt at the stake. Denunciation now takes the place of murder.

But, really, is it as bad to say that Christianity is but one among many false systems of religion as it was for David to kill Uriah to obtain his wife? Is it as bad to say that the Old Testament is full of mistakes as it was to kill all the male children and save the girls to satisfy an army's lust? Is it really as bad to say that Jesus Christ is an unhistorical character as to threaten everyone who doubts it with eternal torture? Is it as bad to remonstrate against the appointment of religious fasts, which are but occasions of gluttony—of thanksgivings which are for many but weeping mockeries—as it was for the Lord God to depopulate a country, smiting all the country of the hills, and of the south, and of the vale, and of the springs, and all their kings, leaving none remaining that breathed, "as the Lord God had commanded?" Is it as bad to ask for the taxation of church property as it was to hang Quakers for holding their own opinions? Is it as bad to ask to be permitted to enjoy Sunday as one pleases as to burn a physician because he disagreed with a doctor of divinity? THE TRUTH SEEKER has done the asking for these things; the Lord and his followers and worshipers hav done the deeds. Who is the guilty party? And to whom should the word bad be applied?

The church hates a Freethinker, because he is one less victim for the priests—one pocket buttoned too tight for their nimble fingers. And when that Freethinker sets about making other Freethinkers, her hatred is multiplied by the numbers of his converts. The church used to kill all Atheists. A step in toleration was taken when, as Jonathan Edwards said, an Atheist might be "tolerated" if he kept quiet. To-day, when the Atheists won't keep quiet, they are regarded as bad, bad, bad. "No rogue e'er felt the halter draw, with good opinion of the law." We commend that little couplet to the serious attention of our Christian contemporary.

The Fight of the Women.

In December the municipality of Boston—a city in which the Calvinistic Congregationalists used to hang Quakers—will hold an election for school committeemen. The law in Massachusetts provides that in such elections a female vote counts just as many as a male vote, provided the female who casts it has been assessed by the tax assessors, paid her fifty cents poll tax, and registered. Reports come from Boston that the women are now flocking to the assessor's office in such numbers as to overwhelm the working force of the institution. About eighteen thousand are now on the assessor's roll.

The cause of this new phenomenon is the school question. Early this summer a school history, because of a paragraph about the sale of indulgences, was tabooed by the school committee, and a high school teacher who had commented on the subject in a manner which wounded the feelings of his Catholic pupils was transferred to another post of duty. The Catholics hav also established a great many parochial schools, and the whole educational question has gone to the legislature in the shape of a proposed law that no one can teach in any school who has not first been licensed by a state board, and that all schools shall be under the supervision of the state. The Catholics hav succeeded in putting their men upon the public school committees, and at present are in a position to direct the course of education.

The Protestants, through the efforts of Justin D. Fulton, a Baptist preacher who hates Romanism, hav aroused public interest in the matter, meetings are held almost nightly, and the watchword is, No more Catholics in the school boards; no more Catholic teachers in the schools. The desire of the Catholics to wreck the public schools is fully known, and the Protestant ministers hav started a campaign which is resulting in this unprecedented rallying of the women to vote.

In the mean time the priests hav not been idle. The Protestants got the best of the start, but last week it was estimated that nine Catholic women for one Protestant visited the assessor's office. Many of them, however, could not stand the test of the naturalization laws, but all nativ-born Irish women are capable voters, and there are a great many of them in Boston subject to the orders of the priests. The higher authorities in the Catholic church pretend to be indifferent in the matter, but it is evident from the number of Celtic and Italian faces in the crowds which last week thronged the assessor's office that the church is saying one thing and doing another.

The outcome of this fight will be of great interest to the country. It will show whether the ministers or the priests hav got their women best in hand. It will also show whether the Bostonese are indifferent or alive to the encroachments of the Roman church upon the public schools. Protestant religious teaching in any school is bad enough, but to substitute practically parochial schools for the present public institutions would be the most dangerous innovation that Boston could suffer.

Students of the woman suffrage problem can also learn a lesson from this contest. It is conclusivly evident that the ministers and priests control the female vote of their parishes, and the probabilities are that when fully enfranchised the women, so far as their votes will do it, will hand the country over to the blackcoated gentry. And while this is no reason for robbing them of a natural right possessed equally with the men, it is a very good reason for Freethinkers to make strenuous endeavors to educate them out of their devotion to the pastor and into a devotion to reason and justice.

Our Canadian Co-workers.

The convention of the Canadian Secular Union, held at Toronto September 15th and 16th, appears from the reports to hav been a large and earnest gathering, composed of men determined to sustain and spread their principles even at considerable sacrifice.

The work in Canada seems to center around Mr. Watts's Secular Thought and the Toronto society before which Mr. Watts lectures almost constantly. But outside of Toronto there are several societies, and although Secularism is not as popular in Canada as its merits deserve, Mr. Watts thinks the prospects are encouraging. The Secularists, he said, hav gained the public ear, partially secured the attention of the press, and made the church feel their existence. In Halifax and St. John, N. B.; in Summerside, P. E. I.; and in Hamilton, Ont., Secularism is flourishing. The Toronto society is in fair condition—the main difficulty being financial—and possesses many self-sacrificing and hard-working members. Mr. Watts said that one of the drawbacks to Secularism's progress is from "having in our ranks men who are with us, but not for us. They are," said Mr. Watts "the paupers of Freethought, constantly taking from us without giving us anything in return. Be it remembered, such persons are not Secularists at all, their conduct is the very opposit to what our principles inculcate. They are 'hangers on' in the Freethought camp, mere speculativ adventurers, like Micawber, always waiting for something to turn up to their own advantage. Secularism is frequently blamed for the misdeeds of these parasites. Our duty in future must be as much as possible to guard our movement against their evil associations."

The convention passed a resolution of respect to the memory of Courtlandt Palmer, and another of greeting to the Pittsburgh Congress of the American Secular Union. Mr. Watts was also requested to suggest to the American organization the propriety of amending the Ninth Demand of Liberalism, "so that an opposing critic could not make it appear that we are in favor of abrogating every detail of what is called Christian morality." Mr. Duval, of Toronto, who brought the subject up, was satisfied that it is the system as a whole that should be abrogated, and that this was the real meaning of this particular demand, but he thought it placed Secularists on the defensiv by being compelled to explain. A verbal change was desirable. A committee was appointed to consider ways and means to sustain Mr. Watts's paper, which reported in favor of raising one thousand dollars annually, for three years from January 1, 1889, to be devoted exclusivly to the aid of the paper. The report was adopted, and the larger portion of the first year's subsidy raised upon the spot. The officers chosen for 1888–9 were as follows: President, William Algie, Alton; secretary, J. A. Risser, Toronto; treasurer, A. Earsman, Toronto; central executiv committee, T. Littlehales, Hamilton; W. G. Hay, Listowel; A. Roe, Wingham; J. G. Jopling, F. Armstrong, and R. Stevens, Toronto. Speeches, and good ones, were made by Charles Watts, William Algie, Thomas Littlehales, Mr. Duval, and others. The convention recommended that the Toronto society sustain the "Open Air Propaganda," and also arrange for lectures by local talent for the benefit of a literature fund. Letters from a great number of Freethinkers in the United States and Canada were read, and altogether the convention was harmonious, enthusiastic, and well attended and lectured to. Mr. Watts givs the results as follows:

"The elements of practical work were there, and men were present to giv them their proper force. The invitation to earnest workers to rally round the cause at this important juncture of its career in Canada was well responded to. Willing toilers in the Secular ranks, young and old, men and women, came from far and near to aid in the deliberations as to the best course to be adopted to advance the interests of Secularism throughout the Dominion. There could be no doubt that one desire actuated the many delegates and friends present, and that was, to immediately take activ steps to extend and consolidate the usefulness of the Secular organization in Canada. Never before, so far as we know, was there such an unmistakable determination shown by the members of a Toronto Secular convention as that manifested in Science Hall last week, to avail themselvs of the advantages already gained against the machinations of priestly power. Not only was this proved by the voices of those in attendance, but the assurance came in the many letters from 'all parts,' which were printed in this journal last week. It is such encouragement as this that givs us bright hopes for the future, and imports new life into the conflict in which we are now engaged with the theological errors of the day."

Surely these are encouraging words, and in the words of the convention's resolution to the Pittsburgh Congress, we "express our hearty sympathy with the useful work being done by our brothers and sisters, the members of" the Canadian Secular Union, which is one in its objects with the American Union. If we could without trenching upon politics, we would say with the poet,

A union of hearts, a union of hands,
A union that none can sever;
A union of lakes, a union of lands,
The Secular Union forever!

A Righteous Decision.

The supreme court of Illinois has made a good beginning in checking the extravagant appropriation of public money to pay the bills of sectarian institutions engaged in manufacturing Roman Catholics out of the raw material furnished by improvident parents.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 25th last, Mr. E. A. Stevens furnished a report of the trial of the case of the Chicago Industrial School for Girls against Cook county, the school suing for various sums for the care and maintenance of girls committed by the county court to the institution, and the county refusing payment. The county's defense was that the industrial school system was unconstitutional; that the Chicago Industrial School for Girls was an institution existing on paper for the benefit of two sectarian institutions—the House of the Good Shepherd and St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum; that the county had no right to pay money to institutions controled by any church, and that a number of commitments by the county court were not legally made. For the church its attorney submitted the act incorporating the school, the approval of the governor, the record-book kept at the House of the Good Shepherd, duplicate warrants for the committal of the girls, and warrants for supplies.

When the evidence was submitted, the following facts were shown: That the Industrial School had no real existence; that it was organized in the parlor of the House of the Good Shepherd; that girls committed to the Industrial School were to be turned over to the House of the Good Shepherd and St. Joseph's Home; that in fact the Industrial School was in these two institutions, and nowhere else; that they were Roman Catholic charities, and derived a revenue from laundry work performed by abandoned women who temporarily lodged there; that no portion of the buildings of the House of the Good Shepherd or St. Joseph's Home was set apart for the Industrial School; that, the Industrial School having no location, its supposititious inmates were mixed with the inmates of the two institutions, and that the managers of the House of the Good Shepherd were also the managers of the Industrial School. The state claimed that the Industrial School was a swindle, and the county attorney attacked the whole system of "industrial" schools with a large and heavy cudgel. "They existed," he said, "only by special legislation, and that is unconstitutional."

Judge Tuthill, before whom the case was tried last February, held that the commitments made by the county court were legal; that the article of the state constitution which says that no public funds shall be used for sectarian purposes has not been violated; that the Industrial School was duly incorporated, officers elected, and reports made from time to time, and the fact that the members of a particular church predominated in its management made no difference. There was nothing of sectarianism in the character of the work for which the school was organized, and the fact that it had, by contract, turned over its pupils to the House of the Good Shepherd and St. Joseph's Home was a good thing rather than otherwise, as the children were well cared for. The county must, therefore, pay the Industrial School the $19,585 asked for.

The supreme court has now reversed this decision, on the following points argued before it by the county attorney: 1. The act under which the commitments were made was in itself unconstitutional. 2. He maintained that the grant of money to the House of the Good Shepherd under an assumed name was an illegal contrivance to evade the constitution. The act which is said to hav been drafted by Judge Prendergast was in the nature of special legislation, and ought to be declared void. The irregularity of the commitments he held was censurable, but they were but incidents of the case. By threatening to place all the church authorities, the archbishop, and the heads of the religious orders on the stand, he got the attorneys for the school to admit in their stipulations the sectarian character of the House of the Good Shepherd and the St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum, and that the money obtained for the Industrial School was turned into the common fund of those institutions.

The decision of the court will probably affect all the industrial schools of Cook county. There is one at Feehanville, to which Catholic boys are committed, and another at Evanston, to which Protestant girls are sent. Mr. Bliss, the county attorney, has conducted this case, says the Chicago Tribune, "in a manner entirely free from sectarian prejudices or prejudices of any kind. He presented the questions involved free from all spirit of controversy, and purely as a question of law." The victory, therefore, is not of Protestants over Catholics, but of Secular over sectarian government. It is a decision in accordance with the third of the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

There are two parties to whom the tax-payers of Cook county should be particularly grateful. It is to Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll that Illinois largely owes her secular constitution, and the prohibitions upon which the decision of the supreme court rests. The Chicago Secular Union, under the leadership of E. A. Stevens, has been behind this case all the way through, and hopes to wipe out other frauds of a similar nature. Now for Girard College!

Buddhism and Christianity.

An interesting comparison of the missionary efforts of the Japanese Buddhists to convert this country, and of the American Presbyterians to evangelize Japan, is made by the Sun. The Presbyterian and Congregational churches, according to the official organ of the missions of the Presbyterians, are endeavoring to unite their work in Japan, in order to make greater progress. The Buddhists, however, are going into the work of consolidation with even greater zeal, proposing to unite all of the nine sects of Buddhism in the effort to spread that religion throughout the United States. Both religions are extremely hopeful of ultimate success. A missionary writing from Japan says:

"There seems of late to be a new development of interest even among this interested and inquiring people. In what forms these unsettled elements will crystallize next no one can tell; but during this plastic state we must impress the mold of Christ as firmly as may be, so that when the new form of civilization is seen it will be not simply modern, but Christian."

But the Buddhist disciples in this country are just as sanguin. One of them writes to the Japanese journal:

"If we had among us some persons who could intelligently expound the doctrins of Buddhism as they really are, and who were authorized to admit candidates into the church, I hav no doubt that many people would openly embrace the faith, and receive the doctrins of the great teacher."

Another says:

"Christianity is on its decline, even in this country, much more than in Europe, and it would be a good thing if some Buddhist missionaries would come here and preach. They would be received by the Theosophists with open arms."

So it seems that each sect is sure that the religion of the other is going to decay in its own country, and that it has but to step in to reap a rich harvest. But Buddhism has as yet made no appreciable progress over here, and we doubt if Christianity has in Japan. Touching this point the organ of the Buddhist says:

"Some missionaries from France, England, the United States, and Russia are endeavoring to Christianize this country, but for the present their followers are few and the influence of their religion is very weak upon society. Meanwhile our young Buddhistic men, particularly those of the Shin Shiu sect, exhibit a strong spirit to propagate the truths of Buddhism over the face of the world, and they are making preparations in learning English and other languages."

We are inclined to believe the Buddhist organ, for we know that the rosy reports of returned Christian missionaries are made to encourage the giving to the missionary fund, to the end that their own supply of bread and butter may be plentiful. An interested witness is not often a strictly truthful one.

The Japanese are the most progressiv of the oriental religious people, as the inhabitants of the United States are certainly of the western religions. Neither Buddhism nor Christianity is suited to progress. Both of them are ancient creeds, effete philosophies, impossible of historic certification. It is probably true, therefore, that Buddhism is being gradually abandoned in Japan, as it is assuredly true that orthodox Christianity is waning in this country. But we cannot believe that either religion will replace the other—certainly Buddhism will never be more than a transient "fad" in this part of the world. Christianity here is being replaced with common sense and science. After it has gone through the various stages from orthodoxy to free religion, if it blossoms out as a religion at all, it will be into one founded on humanitarian principles, and not in the dreams and metaphysical jargon of a religion as absurd as the one abandoned.

Neither the Buddhists nor the Christians should build too lofty missionary castles in the air. To borrow a simile from our national game, Human Nature and Science are yet to hav their innings when Superstition has been struck out.

Editorial Notes.

THE following dispatch is dated Pittsburgh, October 1st: "The state superintendent of public instruction, Mr. Higbee, to-day decided against Father Sheedy in the parochial school matter. Father Sheedy's church and parochial school are located in the eighteenth ward of this city. A majority of the citizens are Catholics and they elected a Catholic school board which leased to Father Sheedy four unoccupied rooms of the public school building for parochial school purposes, and both schools hav been conducted in the same building since the first Monday in September. There was no jar, because the public school principal and his assistants are Catholics. Father Sheedy had nuns for assistants. The Protestants were much incensed at the action of the school board, and in mass-meeting passed a resolution instructing a committee to call upon Superintendent Higbee, who in reply writes a letter condemning the use of a public school building for a parochial school as illegal." Now let Mr. Higbee bounce the Romanists, and let the school committees make no more dickers with the church. The prosperity of a parochial school means the deterioration and ultimate extinction of the public school. Both cannot flourish, and it never was the design of the Romish authorities that they should.

WE learn from the Investigator that the "Writings of Horace Seaver" hav been compiled and put in book form by his friend L. K. Washburn. The selected writings comprise the best editorials written during the past forty-five years, and touch a great variety of subjects—religion, politics, science, Spiritualism, and Materialism. The book makes over two hundred pages, and is illuminated by a fine likeness of the venerable editor of the Investigator. It will be ready for delivery October 15th, price $1.50. No Liberal can forget the service to mental freedom of Horace Seaver, and this, a memorial volume as it were, should be in the library of every Infidel, if not for what it contains then for what its author has done. But its contents will win it a place. Courteous, kind, manly, straightforward Mr. Seaver has written himself into the Investigator, and his work is like him. His love of truth, his courage, his ability, make his readers his friends, his friends his lovers. In the nature of things he can be with us but a few more years. Let us giv him his reward of praise, of fame, of substance, now, and make the last decade of his life the happiest of the many he has lived and labored. Mr. Seaver's older friends will, we know, appreciate his book; let the younger generation also rise up and thank him for helping to make the substantial freedom which they enjoy.

JOPLIN, MO., Sept. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 1st, page 550, over the signature of Arthur B. Moss, in the second column, is the statement: "The resurrection of Lazarus seemed to hav no perceptible effect on the people." Johu xi, 45, says: "Seeing the things he did, many believed on him." If Mr. Moss is a truth seeker, let him reverse his statement in another issue, for it is the very opposit of truth.

ELD. T. J. JACKSON.

BOSTON, MASS., Sept. 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The contrast between Paine and Wesley in this week's paper shows first-rate for Thomas Paine. I, being a college graduate, object to being called an Infidel, as I know that means "unfaithful" literally. I prefer to be called a Secularist as a positiv designation of a believer in all there is useful in this world, or any other that we know of. But to be designated as "Infidel to" or "unbeliever in" the Christian, or Mohammedan, or any other religion, is too negativ to please me.

HENRY N. STONE.

DEUSTER, WIS., Sept. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Please let your readers know that George H. Dawes, of Pittsville, Wis., is on a lecture tour. He selected this wild settlement to start on. He gave us his fine lecture last night, "What Objection to Christianity?" which was well received and very attentivly listened to by about a hundred persons in H. O. Kruschke's Hall, 32x45 in dimensions.

Mr. Dawes is a fine and fluent speaker, but his voice was hardly strong enough to penetrate in this board structure; still, the best points were all heard, and of these there were many. This was the first time that a lecture was listened to in this part of Juneau county, Wis., but it will not be the last one. Mr. Dawes was well pleased with the result, and is willing to come again. After the lecture we engaged in a social hop for about three hours.

J. W. KRUSCHKE.

CHAMPLIN, MINN., Sept. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It is quite a matter of interest as well as encouraging to progressiv Infidels to notice within the last twelve months an increase of Atheistical productions on the God question in THE TRUTH SEEKER, from the pens of able and creditable writers. I will name, for the want of space, but three, Washburn, Longshore, and Peck. I hope they will continue their discourses until this basic question is settled in the negativ, for as long as there is a vestige of belief in a God of any form, so long will orthodox Sunday-schools be run and God-houses be erected.

The facility for the propagation of Freethought has never been so cheap and near at hand as now. Then let us take courage and act. We can hav at very short notice from publishing-houses, book-stores, and from all Infidel paper offices, anything we need in support of the Freethought cause; and, more than this, there is scarcely a town or community but has a sufficiency of Infidels and Atheists to form a league, and plenty of home talent to govern it and make it attractiv. And, as the long evenings are coming on, it will be a pleasant change for us Infidels to step into the lodge for an hour and talk on the subject or listen to others. I am so much interested in the cause that I feel sometimes like throwing off my coat and going to work in starting one; but I am taken back when I think of the attempt I made once in that business. When it was brought almost to working order, the day set for organization came, one and myself met, and the other members stayed at home. There is no move we can make that will forward the Secular cause so rapidly as to unite. Let us form clubs for strength and self-defense. The church is a regular body-snatcher, and when an Infidel dies the first thing she does is to make arrangements to hav the body run through the meeting-house, and then she boasts.

One thing more, and that is a little criticism on the way the "Letters from Friends" department is edited. Two pages are exclusivly devoted to letters from subscribers. These, I naturally suppose, should be to the point and short. Now, there is not more than one in ten but will sustain me in saying that it is unjust for writers to take up from one to two and sometimes three columns, to the detriment of many others. Surely, letters of three or four hundred words should be sufficient to explain our ideas on almost any question.

J. KINSER.

KENT, O., Sept. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Sunday evening, September 2d, the Kent Secular Union concluded a series of five mass-meetings held in the interest of Secularism, and addressed by ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham and Miss V. d Cleyre, of Michigan. Fortunately the weather was all that could be desired. A harmonious executiv committee, after having made every preparation, allowed a want of government—Anarchy—to creep in, which compelled Miss V. de Cleyre to deliver the same address, "Convent Life Unveiled," twice, and prevented her friends from hearing her on her favorit themes. But while we were thus denied, we heard her dramatic recital of "Nameless," which won for her many encomiums, and must hav made her hearers realize society's unjust discrimination against the fallen of her sex, while it condones the conduct of the worse than fallen seducer. As the finale the choir played "Home, Sweet Home," with thrilling effect.

Brother Burnham's address, "Does the Genesis of Evolution Explain the History of Man?" deserves especial mention for its deep thought and clear elucidation of a deeper subject. It is not too much to say that from our rostrum its equal has not been heard.

Now, brother Secularists, wherever you find priests trading upon the religious emotions of their dupes, advertise a Secular meeting, admission free, and invite Brother Burnham to come and deliver his lecture on the "Philosophy of the Religious Emotions." The resulting light will open their eyes to see the delusion, and the world will contain fewer fanatics like Freeman, and more stalwart freemen.

Remember, you must invite him, for he is too modest to invite himself. He is a man you cannot help liking—a true Secularist in faith and practice.

As we were about to inaugurate the experiment of a series of grove mass-meetings, our local press advised our executiv committee to look well to the moral status of our future speakers, lest they should by their example demoralize our citizens. It is needless to say, as far as Miss V. de Cleyre and Brother Burnham were concerned, the advice was uncalled for. We hope to meet both again in Kent.

Thanks to the judicious conduct of the speakers, to the generosity of its promoters, and to the tireless efforts of the workers, this series of meetings was a success numerically, socially, educationally, and financially, the subscriptions and collections having exceeded any previous efforts in the history of the Secular Society of Kent, O.

PETOSKEY, MICH., Sept. 16, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: As this section of the country had got to be noted for its pure and healthful atmosphere, and hundreds and thousands of people, old and young, male and female, and from the far South, East, and West, were making this their resort, and had been for a number of years, in order to escape that tormenting trouble about the throat, lungs, and head which I hav suffered with, I concluded to giv it a trial, and came up here the latter part of August. I can truly say that it has given me much relief, and by another year, I now think, I will make this my home for at least three or four months—say from the middle of July until the white frosts come. If any of our people want to know more about this place as a refuge from the asthma, phthisis, hay fever, bronchitis, catarrh, etc., I will be glad to tell them what I can by printed letter.

But this was not what I had on my mind to write about when I began to write, but I wished to say something about THE TRUTH SEEKER and the National Liberal League, now the American Secular Union.

At the time that Mr. D. M. Bennett came to New York with THE TRUTH SEEKER I was taking the Boston Investigator. As THE TRUTH SEEKER was a new paper, I concluded to try it for one year, and by this time I found that the Christian church was dead-set against THE TRUTH SEEKER, and so concluded to continue on with it another year, as I had learned this much about the church, that when it turned its face against anybody, or body of people, there was something about these people that was worth our attention, so I gave my attention to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its grand old hero, proprietor, and editor.

This autumn nine years ago D. M. Bennett was in the national penitentiary at Albany, sent there through the influence of this Christian church for no crime whatever, but purely through spite, and to get him out of their way and break down THE TRUTH SEEKER. But, as far as breaking down THE TRUTH SEEKER was concerned, it was an entire failure, and worked right the other way.

I went down to Cincinnati to attend the third annual Congress, and a noble, good one it was. The next annual Congress was held in Chicago, at which time there was a little difference of opinion in reference to our duties on the subject of what is commonly known as the Comstock laws; but at the next annual Congress in the same city this matter was pretty well smoothed over, and there left for the present.

The next annual Congress was held at St. Louis, Mo.; but, as there were some side issues brought into the convention, it did not accomplish much.

The next annual Congress was held at Milwaukee. I was not there; but when I read its doings in THE TRUTH SEEKER I was almost ready to giv up the Congress as dead, killed by overloading it with side issues.

The next annual Congress was held at Cassadaga. At this convention these side issues that had been loaded onto the Liberal League were all removed, and the Nine Demands were considered all-sufficient for a base to work from, and a proposition was made to change the name from the National Liberal League to that of the American Secular Union, which proposition was adopted at the following Congress. I gave my approval most heartily to this change, and added that we ought to be able to publish a paper that would fully represent us before the public, and to hav it called the American Secular Union. We hav one good, substantial paper in Boston, one in New York city, and one in San Francisco, and now here is the place for a central organ to hold Secularism up to the whole nation, Canada included—I mean Chicago as this central point—and although now nearing my seventy-seventh year, I am still ready to help on this noble work, and hope to see something done at our coming Congress that will tell in the right direction. But all side issues must be left out of the convention, and we must hav it a purely Secular one, based on the Nine Demands.

SAMUEL D. MOORE.

Sept. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of September 8th appeared an article by "Macbeth," entitled: "Is There a God?" The article was addressed to Atheists, with a view of convincing them, if possible, of the existence of a God, or some supreme, unknown power which controls the workings of nature. The first great difficulty I had to contend with was, that he had utterly neglected to define what he meant by the word "God." To me the word itself is a word without meaning. The first and essential point to be established in the discussion of any subject is a strict definition of the lines or principles of the subject under consideration. This "Macbeth" has neglected to do, which, therefore, renders the task of answering more difficult.

Arguing from a "sentimentalist" standpoint, "Macbeth" "assumes" that there must be a God. Perhaps he feels the necessity of one. I do not. How can he hav an intuitiv feeling which I cannot experience? If there is an innate idea respecting God, why should I not hav it as well as he? If there is something in nature which "Macbeth" cannot understand, what right has he to fix limits to that "which he admits he cannot understand," and ascribe what are as yet secrets in nature to something out of nature? It is no answer to invent a name and call it God.

"Macbeth" can understand that part of nature which keeps our planetary or solar systems in their course, which keeps them in their orbits moving round that mighty luminary "the sun." He can understand all this, but he cannot understand how the universe came there without a creator. If "Macbeth" contends that the universe could not be in existence without having been made or caused, but that the maker could so exist without having been caused, he is simply answering one seeming impossibility by proposing another. He asks: "How could matter exist without a first cause? One question may be legitimately answered by another. So I ask, where, then, or what, is the first cause? The question is unanswerable—indeed, it is unthinkable; it is impossible to conceive a beginning, a first cause. We cannot imagin an uncaused cause, neither can a cause cause itself, for then it would cease to be a cause and would become an effect. The whole of nature is one continuous line of evolution, which line the human understanding can only conceive as cause and effect, each effect being a cause to all that follow, and each cause being the effect of all that preceded. To imagin an origin you must break the line somewhere and annihilate existence. This is impossible. It is not sufficient to invent a first cause and call it God, because I require to know how he could hav had an existence without being caused. Neither is it any answer to say that he always was, because the same can be said of matter. Matter has always existed and always will exist. It can neither be destroyed nor created, neither increased nor diminished; therefore in that sense we do not require a creator. If matter is eternal then God is only number two. Matter is subject to certain laws, which may rightly be considered as laws of matter. Gravitation is law or quality of matter, not a property, as "Macbeth" says. A property is a substance. Gravitation is not a substance, but a quality, which every particle of matter in the universe possesses in greater or less degree, according to the size and weight of the body. The specific gravity of a given body may be determined by the third law of Kepler. Again, the laws of nature never change. Nature, under exactly the same circumstances, will produce exactly the same results. If the laws of nature were subject to evolution, they must of a necessity change. But all science is built upon the unchangeableness of the laws of nature; therefore, if nature's laws could change, we could hav no science.

"Macbeth" also says that it is an absurdity to assume that such remarkable laws emanate from nothing.

The absurdity is of "Macbeth's" own proposition. No Atheist ever yet said that they did emanate from nothing. The Atheist does not know of a time when nothing existed. He says existence always was and always will be. I myself cannot think of nature's commencement, discontinuity, or creation. I am unable to think backward to the possibility of existence not having been, and I cannot think forward to the possibility of existence ceasing to be.

It appears to me "Macbeth" argues as in a circle, commencing in a certain place and when he has done finding himself in the same position that he started from, and not being able to extricate himself from the dilemma in which he is placed, he calls that dilemma God, as the easiest way in getting out of the difficulty.

"Is there a God?" The question is undecidable. It is as difficult for "Macbeth" to prove as it is for me to disprove. No truly scientific thinker would be so dogmatic as to declare emphatically, "There is no God." The question is undecidable, and to the scientist is a matter of no very great importance.

"Is there a God?" is a question which many might ask with good reasons to justify the inquiry. The poor unfortunate girl, now an outcast, who is shunned by her Christian sisters, having fallen low in the toils of vice, being without hope, sinks lower in misery and disease, accelerated by want and privation, and in painful expectancy of an approaching death, cries out with faint and piteous accents: "Is there a God?" The patriot struggling for freedom fails in his effort, is torn from his home, his wife, his children, and all that he holds dear in this life. He is cast into prison and lies languishing in a cold, damp dungeon, his life slowly ebbing away, while the tyrant still rules in luxury; he will strike his breast, and raising his hands on high will cry out with painful voice, "Is there a God?" Let "Macbeth" look around him. Let him see the misery, the wretchedness, and the crimes that are endured by thousands of his fellow-creatures, and ask himself the question, "Is there a God" or some suprême, intelligent power superintending things?

A short time ago we read an account of a collision in mid-ocean between two vessels, in which hundreds of lives were lost. Was that supreme, intelligent power superintending things about that time? "Macbeth" must also be aware of that dreadful scourge which has afflicted Florida, and by which, through no fault of their own, thousands of victims are sent to premature graves. Can he complacently say that this supreme, intelligent power, which he calls God, is superintending things there? Perhaps in all these evils to which I hav alluded "Macbeth" can see the manifestations of God, but this is entirely beyond my comprehension. I see no necessity for one. There is no need to go outside nature before we thoroughly understand nature herself. Does "Macbeth" affirm that he knows all that nature can do and how she does it? If not, then why does "Macbeth" demand from me a belief in the supernatural until he can account for the natural? Does he know all that matter can do? How could the first material forms hav appeared on our globe except by material influences? Is it logical, is it natural, to ascribe material effects to immaterial causes? It is an absurdity known only in theology. Science ignores it, reason shuns it, and common sense despises it. The priest, and not the philosopher, suggested the delusion. And as the light of secular knowledge dawns upon the world, it will pass away as a fiction of man's mental babyhood.

Then, in conclusion, I would ask "Macbeth," If there is a God, why does he permit misery? Why does he permit crime and tyranny to exist in the world? Why does he permit poor men to be oppressed and enslaved, when by an intervention on his part these evils may be averted?

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

ENON VALLEY, PA., Sept. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: When I became a Secularist I quit drinking whisky and going to church simultaneously. Dread of the devil and fear of the Lord did not make me temperate, for I was formerly a very intemperate Christian who didn't doubt for a minute but that I was booked for hell. A perusal of some Secular works brought me to my senses. I hav ceased to spend the "Lord's day" in dissipating or in idleness, and hav learned to control myself without the aid of prayers, gods, or ghosts; and now I spend my Sundays reading my Bible in connection with THE TRUTH SEEKER, visiting my friends, and having a pleasant time generally. The other evening as I was going past a church I heard a lamb of God who occupied a seat in the choir bleat out in a superbly orthodox voice, "Shout the glad tidings." He was accompanied by an orthodox organist, assisted by an orthodox choir, and no doubt the music deeply affected the orthodox ear of God. I thought to myself, such music may be good enough for God, but it does not come near up to my standard. Perhaps heavenly music should receive a spiritual interpretation. If Mozart is in heaven, I mused, I wonder if he can listen to heavenly music and maintain a holy and reverential, Gladstonian calm. But, I reflected, Mozart is not in heaven after all; Mozart got drunk occasionally, and wrote operas, besides. People who write operas must be worse than those who go to hear them; therefore, Beethoven, Wagner, and all the rest of the great masters must be in hell. I am a musician myself, and it consoled me, somewhat, to think that all those poor devils who are lost can dance to good music.

Surely most Christians who shout so much about the "glad tidings of great joy," do not know what these glad tidings are. Most Freethinkers hav investigated the matter, but for the benefit of my Christian friends I will for a few moments cast aside my self-respect, imagin I am a Presbyterian, and sum up their glad tidings for just what they are worth.

Adam sinned, and we, in all reason and justice, ought to be eternally damned for his guilt. But God "out of his mere good pleasure from all eternity" elected some to everlasting life. We are not to inquire why it did not suit his "mere good pleasure" to elect us all; that is too sublime a "mystery" for us to contemplate. It is all for the best. (Of whom?) If God, out of his "mere good pleasure," elected the minority to everlasting life, it is logical to conclude that on the other hand the instigator of everything out of his mere good pleasure elected the majority to everlasting death. Though we are aware that countless billions of our fellow-creatures will suffer eternal agony, we expect to be happy when we are in heaven with God gloating over their sufferings; and even though we feel badly for them when we are in this world, in heaven we will not care, and will be "perfectly happy" notwithstanding their misery. We know that we are all totally depraved, and that we, the elect, merit damnation if we were to get our deserts, as richly as the rest of humanity. Why we were "elected" in preference to all others is, perhaps, another mystery, unless it is because we are credulous suckers who are willing to be agents for God, and no questions asked. God hates inquisitiv people, and we, the elect, never doubt his "goodness, justice, mercy," etc. We know God has a right to damn us if he wants to, because he made us. The "glad tidings" are that we shall not get our just deserts, and the great joy will consist in gloating with the merciful God over the agonies of his "damned mistakes."

Who can possibly conceive of a more contemptible creed than this? How can a man who has any respect for his family, his friends, or himself adopt such a doctrin—a doctrin which indirectly says that a just and merciful God created enemies merely for the satisfaction it will afford him to damn them? Why does not God love his enemies, as he recommends men to do? And by the way, Christians who love their enemies must love the devil, at least, next to God—upon whom all sensible Christians should look as their worst enemy. I do not wonder that men who love their enemies adore the Lord God so heartily.

We are told that if we lead another astray, induce another to do wrong, we must answer to God for the other's sin, i.e., our sin. On the same principle, why does not God hold himself responsible for our sins, i.e., Adam's sin, i.e., the devil's sin, i.e., God's sin; for he made the devil, and was thereby the author of evil. Or if, as they say, the devil was the author of all evil and was entirely to blame, why in the name of justice did he not crucify the devil instead of Christ, and thereby get "square," satisfy his wrath, and out of his depraved "mere good pleasure" save us all? Imagin if you can a "merciful, loving" father who was so revengeful that he must hav blood, even though it were the blood of his own son—the blood of the innocent—to satisfy his infernal "wrath."

Show me a Christian who can honestly say he would not be happier were these "glad tidings" a myth, and, even though he may be satisfied as to his own salvation, if he tells the truth, he is as big a brute, as much of a savage, as his God; for any civilized man, any decent barbarian, would rather be annihilated himself than that countless millions, that a single soul, should suffer infinit torture forevermore. Would not all good Christians be happier knowing that death ends all, than they are shouting such "glad tidings" as this: We, the elect, think most of us will be saved, though the chances for some of us are slim. We cannot hope for the salvation of all of our dearest friends. Our fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, wives, children, a few of these we may pray into heaven if the Ghost happens to roost on them, but the Bible says we cannot expect to meet them all in heaven.

If I believed this doctrin and were entirely satisfied as to my own salvation, it would still be awful tidings of despair to me. I repeat, I am not surprised that Christians who love their enemies love their God. It would be easier for me to love the devil than such a God. If the Presbyterian God is the true God, I'm content to go with the crowd—the more the merrier. I'm fond of music, and I like opera better than doxology. I'd rather watch devils dance a can-can to a fandango by Mozart, than join old bigots praising a tyrant.

M. H. VEON.

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., Sept. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: W. T. S Hadley, whom I suppose to be a Liberal, is very orthodox on tariff, as he quotes Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, etc., but skips the father of protection, and says that the expression at present, tariff vs. tariff, is misleading. As to the last, it would perhaps be better to say a tariff of forty-seven per cent against a tariff of about forty-two per cent, much higher than we ever had so long during a time of peace. It is not with a view to help Mr. Holland, as I think he is able to take care of himself, but to giv perhaps nearly the same result in a different solution, that may be plainer to some, that I write these few lines.

Now, what use his quotations serve in the present discussion to get us to the truth of what is best for the laboring man in the United States, when manufacturing has been so improved since then that the old state of things has passed away, is hard for me to see.

Let me quote a little from my political bible, the "Life of H. Clay," on protection, from the second volume, part of page 169, viz.: "The theory of protection supposes, too, that after a certain time the protected arts will hav acquired such strength and perfection as will enable them subsequently to stand up against foreign competition. If, as I hav no doubt, this should prove to be correct, it will, on the arrival of 1842, encourage all parts of the Union to consent to the continuance of longer protection to the few articles which may need it." This he said on Feb. 25, 1833, fifty-five years ago, when England had a high protectiv tariff, which we had to pay on all our exports to her; but in 1846 she repealed her tariff laws, leaving a tariff on only some twenty different articles, thus starting as a comparativly free trade country.

Now, although H. Clay was in the United States Senate and made his memorable speeches on the compromise resolutions in 1850, he never reiterated his protection sentiments after 1846, or his historian failed to report them in his Life; but, if he had, he would not hav had the light on this subject that we hav to-day.

To-day we behold England, having outstripped all her protectiv neighbors in substantial progress, the greatest manufacturing and commercial nation on earth, with the condition of her laborers or common class much improved after a practice of comparativ free trade during forty-two years, thus giving the lie to all protectiv theories of the past. Is England's success under comparativ free trade a sure guide to our ruin if we dare to lower our tariff only a little?

Is it wisdom in the broad daylight of to-day to parade the same twaddle as of fifty years ago about our infant industries and their owners, when they hav made nearly all the money that was made during the last twenty years and hav become millionaires, and the heads of combinations and trusts, which are determined to extort even what little is left to the agriculturists and common laborers (who hav become poorer and poorer all this time), even that little that the high tariff was not able to clean up? What would old, honest Henry Clay think if he could to-day see his infants and wards so pampered into monopolies, trusts, etc., by the Republican party's high tariff that our nation has become their helpless ward, and the majority of laborers their slaves?

As to the times before 1860, let me answer, we knew nothing about strikes among laborers or trades unions, as far as any inconvenience from them to the public was concerned. This ought to be answer enough so far as laborers and hard times are concerned. The Rebellion caused the high tariff, and the high tariff caused the strikes and discontent among our laborers, as everyone living during this time ought to know. To tax the poor man to make the times for him good is on a par with these lottery agents who advertise to giv a man a prize in a certain locality in order to induce others to buy tickets, but in order to get this favor he must first send $5, and that is the end of the transaction. I answered the agent to consider I had bought the ticket on credit, and then when it drew the prize, which he was sure it would, to deduct double the amount of the ticket, and remit the balance. That ended the matter; because he knew I knew he was a liar, and he could not fool me.

Let us look a little how the Republican party treated the poor man since the war. Along with our high tariff there was an income tax, a stamp tax, etc., borne almost exclusivly by those well able to bear them, yet the Republican party repealed these taxes so long ago, without any compunctions of conscience, that young voters scarcely knew they ever existed, but when it comes to cheapening the clothing, etc., of the poor laboring man and his family five per cent there is a terrible howl of impending ruin from one end of the country to the other. It did not hurt the country to lower the taxes which bore only on the rich, but it hurts terribly to do the least bit of the same kind of work for the poor man. Shame on such duplicity!

As to the wages of laborers in different countries, let it be known by all laborers that England pays better wages than any of its surrounding high protectionist neighbors, and that it has a population of 290 inhabitants to the square mile, while the United States has but 14; therefore, knowing that wages are less in proportion as population increases, in our own country, as in the East and West, all things considered, England pays the best wages to-day.

As to the Cobden Club, I know nothing, but I would like to know its price to ruin us as it has ruined England to-day, as I understand the poor man is not taxed there by his loving friends as here, and his wages in proportion to popu'ation are better than in any other country on earth. My own view of honest taxation to support governments is this: All taxes ought to be collected from those able to pay them, at a certain per cent, after exempting $1,000 from taxation and execution for every family. Thus, on less than $20,000, a certain rate per cent; after $20,000 and less than $40,000, an increased rate; after $40,000 and less than $60,000, the rate increased again; and so on, making the richest and ablest pay much the highest rate, as it comes from their superabundance. All tariffs and license taxes are unjust to the poor, because, according to their consumption, they pay even more than the millionaire, who, as a rich man, can always buy cheaper than the poor man. Therefore, I say, when we become as honest to the poor as we now pretend to be to get his vote, we will arrange taxation on some such basis to relieve the poor man entirely, and that will be the end of strikes, Anarchy, etc. But so long as we ask him to throw money into the tariff-pot, with a view or make-believe that he will get it back in some unknown way to him, it seems to me we ought to doubt our own words at least a little. Of course, the tariff tax is so insidious that it is hard to say how much anyone pays, but he pays it all the same, nevertheless.

As a farmer, I looked up the matter on transportation. I saw last January that, when steel rails sold in England for $20 per ton, the same sold here for $33, or sixty-five per cent more. But let us say sixty per cent in round numbers. Then five-fifths the English price, plus three-fifths, our tariff, makes eight-fifths, or the English price as five is to eight. I ship every year about two thousand bushels grain to the seashore, and at our tariffed price it costs me eight cents per bushel, instead of five cents, a difference of $60 in transportation to the seashore; but that is not its destination, for it competes with or derives its price from the English market, so we must consider what it will cost to take it there—more than it ought to under fair competition—therefore, as we hav only one sailing-vessel and one steamship, it is safe to say I lose at least another $60 till it gets there. I also sell beef and pork, and buy fertilizers and coal, and travel some, like most people, so that my extra tariff tax in transportation would be a nice income in a year, even for so small a farmer as myself.

But this is not all, for we must allow the extra cost of farm machinery, stone goods, etc, which makes another bill, one year with another, to equal the other, and all this without a cent's worth of benefit in return to me. This every grain farmer has to pay and does pay, yet many seem never to learn any better than, the more money they pay in this way, the more they make, and keep adding mortgage, from year to year, to square up.

They are certain that their religion and their politics are all they claim for them, without any examination whatever, and their noses are counted every year all right, and their votes prove afterward there was no mistake. Their prejudices would not allow them to read a Liberal book, or a paper of the opposit political party; they would rather burn them, so conservativ are they. And yet, with all this, in many ways they are good, honest, respectable people, and the best of neighbors; but as wise when they can form their first idea or opinion on any subject, as they ever get, no matter how old they might become, because they imagin it would be an unpardonable disgrace if they ever found they had once been on the wrong side of any subject during their lives.

Now, while things do not suit me politically, as you can see, yet, when I go to vote, I shall be sure to think of those Methodist preachers who sent their memorial to Governor Oglesby in favor of hanging those Chicago Anarchists, who were proved about as guilty as myself or any other innocent person, also of Governor Oglesby and his party, and be sure not to cast my vote for a side-show candidate, but to hav my vote tell in opposition to theirs, and hope that every poor laboring man will do likewise.

I place those martyrs for the cause of the poor man side by side with John Brown of Abolition fame. They were only the fore-runners showing up capitalists, monopolies, and trusts, the drones in our national hive who won't labor, and through their dishonest methods reduce all common laborers to a worse condition than our former negro-slavery. How many in this land of plenty hav been starved and how many frozen to death through the heartless acts of these extorting monopolies? Are such indirect deaths not murder in the nineteenth century?

It makes me shudder when I think that when injustice has been suffered to continue too long in the past, it has been invariably wiped out in blood, and that we are every day nearing the terrible day of retribution. Above all things, let us be merciful and honest toward all mankind.

Yours respectfully, JNO. M. GROH.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Lines Written on the Death of Allen Butler Gleason.

We hav put the little dresses,
Shoes, and stockings all away—
Empty are the cot and cradle,
Baby left at dawn of day.
Left us when our hearts were breaking,
Heeding not our tears and cries,
But gently breathed his life away,
Gently closed his dark brown eyes,
And floated off to fairer skies.

Oh, how short the time has seemed
Since he came to bless our home!
His life was like a summer dream,
But now a cold and gleaming stone
Will tell where lie our buried hopes,
Underneath the sunny skies.
While gentle dews are falling down,
Our thoughts will wander to the spot
Where he lies, still unforgot.

Though brief, his life was full of joy,
Sparkling like a crystal stream.
Sweetly lisping, "Mamma!" "Papa!"
He held our hearts with love supreme.
His memory we shall ever cherish,
As onward flies each fleeting hour;
Our tender love can never perish,
But lingers round that little bower,
Blooming with many a lovely flower.

ALICE M. SANDERS.

A Little Woman.

She stood at the bar of justice,
A creature wan and wild,
In form too small for a woman,
In features too old for a child;
For a look so worn and pathetic
Was stamped on her pale young face,
It seemed long years of suffering
Must hav left that silent trace.

"Your name," said the judge, as he eyed her,
With kindly look, yet keen,
"Is ——?" "Mary Maguire, if you please, sir."
"And your age?" "I am turned fifteen."
"Well, Mary," and then from a paper
He slowly and gravely read—
"You are charged here—I am sorry to say—
With stealing three loaves of bread."

"You look not like an offender,
And I hope that you can show
The charge to be false. Now, tell me,
Are you guilty of this or no?"
A passionate burst of weeping
Was at first her sole reply,
But she dried her tears in a moment,
And looked in the judge's eye.

"I will tell you just how it was, sir;
My father and mother are dead,
And my little brothers and sisters
Were hungry and asked me for bread.
At first I earned it for them,
By working hard all day,
But somehow the times were hard, sir,
And the work all fell away.

"I could get no more employment;
The weather was bitter cold;
The young ones cried and shivered—
Little Johnnie's but four years old—
So what was I to do, sir?
I am guilty, but do not condemn.
I took—oh, was it stealing?—
The bread to giv to them!"

Every man in the court-room,
Gray-beard and thoughtless youth,
Knew, as he looked upon her,
That the prisoner spake the truth.
Out from their pockets came kerchiefs,
Out from their eyes sprung tears,
And out from old, faded wallets,
Treasures hoarded for years.

The judge's face was a study,
The strangest you ever saw,
As he cleared his throat and murmured
Something about the law.
For one so learned in such matters,
So wise in dealing with men,
He seemed, on a simple question,
Sorely puzzled just then.

But no one blamed him or wondered,
When at last these words were heard:
"The sentence of this young prisoner
Is for the present deferred!"
And no one blamed him, or wondered,
When he went to her and smiled,
And tenderly led from the court-room,
Himself, the "guilty" child.

What the Little Ones are Saying.

Josie and Lawrence on their return from Sunday-school were questioned as to their lessons. Josie said her teacher told the children that Jesus swept! Lawrence declared that his teacher had a good word for the dressmakers. "What was it?" inquired his mamma. "Well, the lesson was all about the Beatitudes, and the teacher read, 'Blessed are the dressmakers, for they shall inherit the earth.'" Lawrence had evidently got the dressmakers and peacemakers somewhat mixed.

A Worthy Deed.

An old and feeble man, in the winter of his existence, with silver hair and furrowed brow, trembling frame and ill, on Tuesday, Sept. 11, 1888, stood leaning his aged form against the walls in the Union depot at Kansas City, Mo., a friendless, homeless wanderer. No seat was empty for him in which to rest his aching bones, and nobody cared. All but one of the surging throng about him passed on—here, there, and everywhere—and heeded not this aged pilgrim. This one exception was a young, and, withal, beautiful young woman. She saw his searching eyes as they hopelessly gazed about the room for the face of some old acquaintance of years gone by, and, beholding the old man's dreary situation at one glance, asked him, "Are you looking for somebody?" The reply was: "No;" and then she said: "You look ill; won't you eat a bit?" He was too ill to eat, but, more to gratify the wish of his benefactor than to appease hunger, he partook of a cup of coffee at the depot lunch-counter. She paid for it with a piece of silver and bade the old man keep the change. She plied him with questions. "Where are you going? Hav you come far?" He had a ticket for Leavenworth purchased with the last of a meager purse of money. "Hav you friends there?" He had no friends there. He was homeless indeed. This young woman therefore gave him her address, and bade him be sure to write and let her know if he should not fare well in his destination and she would aid him; she had enough to spare and would be only too glad to tender him what help she could. And with an encouraging smile she vanished in the crowd to escape his thanks.

The foregoing is an incident of virtue that is not fiction, and I giv it to the Corner for the special benefit of the young men and women "of the period." It matters not whether this young woman was Jew, Christian, or pagan, her deed was noble, and I wish to pay a tribute to her virtue. Such deeds as these bear the stamp of sincerity on their face and do not seem to hav for their aim the printing of a given name before so many dollars; and they are to a better purpose than the building of costly church edifices with sky-reaching towers. Such deeds as these—and I sincerely believe that there are many more of them than ever gain publicity—urge me to scorn the doctrin of the total depravity of man, and inspire me with an ardent belief in a glorious future of better men and women.

The old man has fallen into the hands of kind and generous people, and if the young lady from Kansas City should read this, she may be glad to hav the assurance that the old man is doing well under embarrassing circumstances. HERMAN TIEDJENS.

Benj. Franklin's Youthful Struggle.

Benjamin Franklin was born in Boston, Mass., Jan. 17, 1706. His father was a soap maker and tallow chandler. At the age of ten young Benjamin began work in his father's shop, but being unpleased with the routine of this trade, he desired to go to sea. Fearing the lad would carry out his desire, his father placed him in care of his brother James, who was a printer, and it was from him that Benjamin learned the printer's trade. While at this business he commenced writing for the paper which his brother published, and his productions were always bright and interesting, although he had no education. He was fond of books, but as his parents were very poor, they were unable to furnish him with them. Young Benjamin resolved to save what little money he could earn, so as to purchase a few books. By hard work, and by abstaining from meat, he finally managed to buy a few books, which he studied diligently day and night. And this is the way he got a start. His brother was very severe with him, so he ran away from Boston without informing any of the family. He stopped in New York awhile, but finally landed in Philadelphia, where he obtained employment in a printing-office. His ambition was to engage in the business alone. He went to England to purchase printing material, but being disappointed in his view, he was compelled to remain in England over a year. But he was industrious and ambitious, and he went to work making a good living and many friends. He returned to Philadelphia in 1826, and in 1829, aided by friends, he started the printing business once more. Benj. Franklin's early life was one of hardships, yet he was very ambitious. He had a strong desire to make something of himself, and by brave endeavor he did it. His youthful struggle should be an inspiration to all young folks, for "a strong desire, backed by brave endeavor, ever leads to grand achievement."

GEO. J. REMSBURG.

A Good Dog Story.

Among the early arrivals this season at Block Island was a large black dog named Rover, the property of Bishop Brothers, of New London. He came on the steamer Block Island, and liked the trip so well that the next day he ran away and came on his own responsibility. Temptation increased with indulgence, and since then he has not missed a trip. When the boat touched the wharf here he would jump off, being always the first to land, and would made a rapid tour of the immediate vicinity and exchange New London for Block Island news with all the dog gossips he met, when he would hurry back to the boat, usually getting on board about the time the last of the passengers had landed.

On a recent trip, however, he did not get back until the steamer was fully two hundred feet away. He seemed to comprehend the situation and did not waste any strength in barking, but stood on the very edge of the wharf, gazing wistfully at the retreating vessel until she disappeared around Clay Head. He then climbed the bank, and after looking at the hotels before him, went straight to the Ocean View, where the porter explained his presence. The daughter and daughter-in-law of the proprietor took pity on him, and for twenty-four hours he fared like a prince, sleeping in the private office. The next morning, when the steamer Danielson blew her whistle, he hurried down, but saw it was not his boat, and did not try to go on board. Later, when the Mount Hope came, he was on her decks before the gang-plank was out. A hasty inspection, however, showed him his mistake, and he went ashore. When the Block Island came, a half hour later, his delight could not be restrained, and he was not satisfied until he had seen every officer and man belonging to the steamer.—Providence Journal.

Correspondence.

DORA, Coos Co., ORE., Sept. 13, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav never before written any in the Children's Corner. I am a little boy ten years old. I hav a pony, and I ride him three miles every day after the cows. I liv in Brewster valley. There is no school here, but I study my books at home. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I think the pictures very funny.

Fearing to tire your patience, I will close. Hoping to see my letter in the paper, I remain, Yours truly, JOSEPH LANE LAIRD.

SHERIDAN, MICH., Sept. 20, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I send you a poem for publication written on the death of a very bright and beautiful baby ten months old. His parents are earnest, zealous, independent advocates of Freethought, and the funeral services were purely Agnostic. I hope you can find a place for the poem.

MRS. A. M. SANDERS.

[The dear little baby boy has escaped many trials and sorrows. We trust his parents may find true consolation in the thought that nothing can harm him evermore. The little bud has entered into the perfect peace that passeth understanding, and the parents are better and nobler for the love that was born with him. All the readers of the Corner, we are sure, sympathize with them in their loss. —ED. C. C.]

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Sept. 20, 1888.

MISS WIXON: I was made acquainted with the facts related in the inclosed letter to the Corner by the old man mentioned, and thinking the story might be a source of pleasure to the children of the Corner, decided to forward it to you. The story is beautiful to me for the reason that it is clad in the garb of truth, and has lost nothing by passing through the hands of fiction-mongers.

Also, permit me to compliment you on the able management of the Corner; but I hope you will forgiv me if I suggest that the Corner has lost much by the continued absence of the puzzles. Respectfully,

HERMAN TIEDJENS.

[We thank our friend for the beautiful incident illustrating the power of human kindness and sympathy. In regard to the puzzles, we are quite ready to open the Puzzle Box whenever our wide-awake puzzlers are ready to furnish it with the wealth of their activ brains.—Ed. C. C.]

VERSAILLES, IND., Sept. 23, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I again take the liberty of writing to you and the other dear friends of the Corner, after seeing you were kind enough to publish my first letter. I would be very happy indeed if I could open the dear TRUTH SEEKER and find in the Corner about twelve letters from about as many of my orthodox friends here. I would feel as if I was some relation to them all. If some enthusiastic Infidel lecturer would come here and lecture for a week or so, then I think I would begin to see letters from this Christian town.

There is a vast amount of difference between living in a town and living in a city. In a town everything is monotonous and lonely, and consequently the majority of the people rush to church merely for a change, or, in plainer language, to hav some place to go, while in a large city you hav so many other entertainments, etc., that you don't think or wish to attend church, except those who desire and hunger for those doleful meetings or really something doleful. But no! the doleful meetings I never attend. In the first place, they are too doleful and hypocritic. In the second place, my views on the same subject do not agree with theirs, and in the third place, because I am an Infidel and read THE TRUTH SEEKER, which they so many times hav regarded as a "lie paper."

Young folks like myself desire something livelier than such doleful meetings, where one cannot hav the pleasure of even smiling, unless it be at the parson.

The other day one of my friends came in to see me, and I was reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, when she took it out of my hands and inquired what paper it was. Then she read the headings and expressed her opinion that it was a "lie paper." She then asked me, "What would the world come to if it were not for the churches?" Then I asked her to please tell me what benefit they ever did our country. She left my question unanswered by informing me that she must go home.

Well, I wish to thank all the writers of the Corner for their good and entertaining letters, especially Nettie A. Olds and Laura Price Stewart for their instructiv compositions. I wish they would write to me and also oftener to the Corner. I wish they would all write about some travel, describing everything they witnessed, no matter how brief. It would interest and benefit us all, old as well as young. Whenever my mind is worried, I go to THE TRUTH SEEKER and read the letters from various pens, until my mind is refreshed and invigorated; then I feel well. I will bring my letter to a close for fear it will be too long to find a place in the Corner.

Hoping you will long continue your good work, I remain, Your true Infidel friend,

ANNIE H. STOCKINGER.

[If all girls possessed as bright, inquiring minds as Annie Stockinger, the world would be the better, and church edifices would soon be changed into something more useful and elevating.—ED. C. C.]

Paine Vindicated!

A thorough and overwhelming reply to the New York Observer's slanderous attacks upon the Author-Hero of the American Revolution. Containing both the slanders and their refutation.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this they will probably do so at once.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by Religious Problems.

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

"Let the Christian be held to facts, and obliged to tell the truth, and his lips would be dumb. There never was such a place as the Garden of Eden; never such an individual as the devil. There is no such place as hell. There never was a Christ, and no atonement made, for there was no necessity of any being made. If there was no such thing as faith, Christianity could not make a convert on earth. If ministers were obliged to furnish the proof of their statements, there would be no preaching."

Poetry.

A Case of Conscience.

"Once for all, it cannot be done; lest more innovations should follow."
An orthodox priest of an orthodox school was the Reverend Maximus Swallow,
Pluralist he, in inverted degree, small cure but abundance of pay;
Rector of Peter, canon of Paul, and also vicar of Bray.
"It cannot be done, nor will I consent from primitiv custom to vary,
And as for my reason, this must suffice—'Nolumus lex Anoliæ mutari;'
For a breach condoned of immutable law, you in vain for a precedent search."
(By England's immutable law, of course he meant the law of the church.)
"I grant that in other respects your client has led an exemplary life,
But she willfully broke that law to become her deceased sister's husband's wife.
By which reprehensible act she forfeits all hope of eternal salvation,
Except through a course prescribed by the church of penance and mortification:
Which course I hav urged, that her soul might be purged, when speaking a kind word in season.
But she laughed in my face, and said, in her case 'for repentance there was not a reason,'
And rather than part from her partner in sin, the ban of the church she defied,
And, whilst she had breath, in contumacy lived, and thus excommunicate died.
It cannot be done. My conscience forbids, in so grave a case of defection,
To promis a 'sure and certain hope of a joyful resurrection,'
To perform the rite of our holy church o'er one unlawfully mated,
Or mingle the dust, defiled by lust, with dust that is consecrated;
It would alter the case had she died in a place where her history was unknown;
And deeply it pains me the rite to refuse, but by me it cannot be done."

The family lawyer gravely bowed—the obstacle plainly saw—
(And none than he more versed could be in the subtleties of the law),
And gravely smiled the man of law (he had gained his point no doubt),
As from a blue-laid envelope he drew the document out.

"To set the matter quite at rest, I hav brought my client's will,
To which a year before her death she added a codicil,
Bequeathing (with certain conditions that in due rotation follow)
A hundred pounds, from duty free, to the Reverend Maximus Swallow,
Provided that he, in peace and love, shall lay my bones to rest,
And leave the judgment of my case to those who know me best,
Acknowledging, to end the strife, and heal an open sore,
That I was a true and lawful wife to him that's gone before.
But, if so be he should refuse that justice to render me,
The hundred pounds hereby devised, from legacy duty free,
I bequeath to mine executor (he may charge it in his bill), Provided he succeeds in finding somebody else that will."

The parson muttered between his teeth (an unclerical oath he swore),
"God bless me! what the —— ! you should hav told me of that before,
Or otherwise how was I to know, and claim my due,
That your late lamented client died of the church a daughter true?"

"Excuse me, sir," the lawyer said, "I thought you must hav known,
For thrice, in most emphatic terms, you said 'it can't be done.'"

The parson drew the lawyer aside, and low was his reply,
As with his finger he pressed his nose and closed his dexter eye.
"'Tis true, my friend, that in mine haste I said it can't be done;
But, then, you see—an emergency—there are more ways than one.
'Tis true that, by my sacred duty, I am strictly bound
To bury none who die in sin in consecrated ground;
But then—we may contrive a grave twelve feet below the flat—
The holy ground extends to ten—and so get under that.
And then the service? well, the undertaker must provide
A pauper's funeral for the nonce, and lay them side by side;
I thus perform a double cure, nor violate mine oath,
And read the service over one, and benefit them both."

To meet the case, you must confess, a most ingenious way,
But whether or not it was carried out, my informant did not say. OUTIS.

CITIZEN: "I see, Uncle Rastus, that you wear a Cleveland button on one side and a Harrison button on the other." Uncle Rastus: "Yes, sah, dem is my politicks up ter date. I'm kinder on de fence, Mister Smif, an' which button comes off fust, sah, depen's on de pa'ty what has de greates' 'mount ob—ob patriotism. Wow, wow, wow!"—Sun.

What Must We Do to Be Saved?

Whosoever desires to be hopelessly confused, it is necessary only that he should study and try to understand the orthodox creed, which creed, unless we profess to believe, all orthodox believers believe that we shall perish everlastingly.

And the orthodox creed is this: that we worship after some orthodox form, as approved by some orthodox body of worshipers.

Neither "confounding" the formality, or questioning the utility of such form of worship.

For there is one parson who wears a miter, and another parson who wears a surplice, and a great number of persons who wear neither the one nor the other.

But the understanding of the parson who wears the miter, and the other parson who wears the surplice, and the great number of persons who wear neither the one nor the other, is as one. Their ignorance is equal, and their bigotry deplorable.

Such as the bishop is, such is the parson, and such also is the congregation.

The bishop is created, the parson is created, and the congregation is created—somehow.

The bishop incomprehensible, the parson incomprehensible, and the congregation uncomprehending.

Yet their form is eternal, their pretense eternal, and their ignorance is eternal.

And yet they are not exactly eternal, but subject to modifications and synods.

And also the three estates are not represented in the synods; but the bishop (who is created) creates a creed, and the creed is incomprehensible.

And the synod is, as it were, almighty, and the bishop almighty, and the parson almighty.

And yet the congregation is not almighty, but only the parson.

So, likewise, the synod is fallible, the bishop is fallible, and the pastor is fallible.

And not only is one of them fallible, but all are fallible.

So also the bishop is a fool, the pastor is a fool, and each member of the congregation is a fool. And not only is one of them a fool, but all of them are fools.

For like as we are compelled by Christian conformity to acknowledge every parson to be of himself a representativ of God amongst men.

So, likewise, are we forbidden by Christian humility to say that there be any representativs of God outside the pale of conformity.

The bishop is appointed by the crown—neither born a bishop, nor fitted for a bishop, but created a bishop.

The parson is ordained by the bishop—neither born a parson, nor fitted for a parson, but ordained by the bishop.

The synod is composed of bishops and parsons, who settle among themselvs what men ought to believe, and how, in ecclesiastical matters, they ought to act.

So there is not one synod, but many synods; not one orthodox conclusion, but many orthodox conclusions; not one form of belief, but many forms of belief.

And in these diversities of opinion, not one opinion is wiser or preferable to others—not one is more reasonable or logical than another.

But all creeds which hav been founded on or compiled from the doctrin of Christianity, are alike unmeaning and unintelligible.

So that in all things as aforesaid men are supposed to worship that which they do not see, and to believe in that which they do not understand.

He, therefore, that would be saved (according to this creed) must not think anything about the matter.

Furthermore, it is necessary to everlasting salvation to believe in the historical account of the incarnation of Jesus Christ, although it is contrary to the usual course of nature.

For the orthodox faith is, that we profess and believe in the incredible and to follow the unapproachable, although we do neither the one nor the other.

Perfect fools and perfect hypocrits, of a darkened understanding and unreasoning mind subsisting.

Equal to the brutes as touching our ignorance, and inferior to the brutes as touching our superstition.

For as pretense and arrogance make one parson, so superstition and ignorance make one orthodox Christian.

A Christian, not by assimilation of virtues, but by confusion and misapprehension of terms.

Such is the orthodox creed, which unless a man professes to believe he is reckoned an Infidel.

Glory be to the father, etc.

As it was in the days of the prophets and apostles, is now, and, to all appearance, ever will be, world without end.

Books that The Truth Seeker Sells.

ELMINA'S BOOKS.

"Little Lessons" is one of the most useful works for children ever published.—SUSIE H. WIXON.

I hav just finished reading "The Infidel School-teacher," and "John's Way." I think they are just splendid.—M. C. HEBERLING, Warrensburg, Mo.

I received "Studying the Bible" all right, and hav read it through—pronounced it excellent.—Yours, in favor of U. M. L., WM. L. WILSON, M.D., Baker's Corner, Ind.

I like "John's Way" very much. I think his way was a very good one. I read so much of the romance and I was not at all disappointed in it.—DARLINA BELL, Elberton, Ga.

Everybody should read "John's Way" and "The Darwins." The many good things said of these books are really and truly so. Every child and young person should read "Little Lessons on Science." I shall try and get all the orders for them I can.—JENNIE S. AKERS, Leadville, Col.

"Little Lessons for Little Folks" is science put in plain, simple language for children. It is full of interesting information, and no grown persons can read it without getting new ideas. It is a valuable little volume, neatly gotten up, and should serve as a juvenil text-book in schools. Price, 40 cents. Address the author, Mrs. E. D. Slenker, Snowville, Pulaski county, Va.—Thought of the Times.

There is no better or more instructiv book that you can put into the hands of your children than Mrs. Slenker's "Little Lessons." Every page contains valuable information that will remain with the children as long as they liv. Her other books are good and instructiv. "John's Way," "The Handsomest Woman," "The Darwins," are all excellent reading. For sale at this office.—Record of the Times.

I never can tell which is sweetest, the children or flowers. My little granddaughter is here now, and I am truly happy. She can tell me so many of the stories in "Little Lessons." She shed tears when her mother read her the story of your own little girl. One of the chief things about the book is that it is interesting to people all the way from five years old to fifty. We were also much pleased with "John's Way."—MARY BAIRD FINOH, Frenchtown, Nebraska.

I read "The Darwins and found it superior to what I expected after reading "The Infidel School-teacher" and "John's Way," though I was so pleased with the latter. We had a friend visiting us, who, after reading "John's Way," told me it looked as though the Bible was not true. I told him I had great doubt about it before. I read this book, and I am glad that I am not the only one. The number is getting larger every day The reason that there are not many readers of Liberal papers in this part of Minnesota is because the county is too poor.—V. HENRIONNET, Minnesota.

We think you all know about Aunt Elmina by this time; that is, you know she loves children, and is always ready with pen and voice to teach them the truths of life, and add to their knowledge some fact that will help make life better, and so bless the world in which we liv. Aunt Elmina has written a book entitled: "Little Lessons for Little Folks," and the good lady has sent us a copy, and we are so very much pleased with it that we shall make several extracts for this department from time to time. This little work of a hundred pages is neatly bound in board covers, and some twenty subjects are treated in the author's pleasant style, so attractiv to the hearts of the young. Aunt Elmina talks of Stars, Monkeys, Fishes, Fresh Air, Books, Clover, Water, Stones, Leaves, Nerves, Animals, etc., and so much rich knowledge is presented in an attractiv form that the book should be in every household. Our little ones cannot learn too much about Life and her Children, and this handy volume is just what they want.—The Children's Half Hour.

AMERICAN FREETHOUGHT.

We hav received from the Truth Seeker Co., 28 Lafayette place, New York, a packet of their publications, including both bound books and pamphlets. All are excellently printed, and the books are tastefully and substantially bound in uniform style. Perhaps the most important is "The Secret of the East," by Felix L. Oswald. Mr. Oswald holds that Christianity really arose in India, and that it is but the Western counterpart of oriental Buddhism. To the anti-natural tendency of the Christian religion was due the long night of the Middle Ages. Mr. Oswald asks: "Did the apostle of Galilee ever speak one word in favor of industry, rational education, the love and study of nature, physical and intellectual culture? Not one. Has his mission promoted our progress in the paths of science and freedom? Not one step. His doctrin in all its tendencies is wholly unearthly, and, therefore, wholly unavailable for secular purposes." "The Secret of the East" is full of such vigorous writing. Every page has some telling fact or argument. There are a few marks of hasty writing. Thus, one might think from an expression on page 25 that the Socinians were a sect of early Christians. But these are blemishes easily removed. The book, as a whole, is well worth the attention of anyone grappling with the problem of Christianity.

"The Secret of the East" is dedicated to the memory of Bruno. "The Bible of Nature," by the same author, is dedicated to the memory of Spinoza. The first exhibits the destructiv, the second the constructiv side of American Freethought. It is a concise, systematic exposition of the applications of Materialistic Secularism to physical, mental, and moral well-being. The first is classed under the heads of health, strength, chastity, temperance, and skill, the second under knowledge, independence, prudence, perseverance, and Freethought, the third under the heads of justice, truth, humanity, friendship. In each case Mr. Oswald givs first the lessons of instinct, then the rewards of conformity, perversion, the penalties of neglect, and finally the method of reform. It is a book of sterling sense, and its teachings are calculated to beneficially displace the nonsense which still forms so large a part of early training.

"Try-Square, or the Church of Practical Religion," by Reporter, is an interesting account of how "Uncle Job Sawyer" sets up the Church of Practical Religion in Pinville. Sometimes in the form of narrativ and sometimes as reported speech or dialog, it deals with many phases of American political and social life. A Communist solution is more than hinted at. Uncle Job's favorit phrase is, "Demonetise money and depropertise property." A curious American mixture of shrewdness and Utopianism pervades the book, which may be taken as one of the many signs that attention in America, as elsewhere, is being largely diverted from lunar politics to questions of well-being in this world.

"Materialism: Its History and Influence upon Society," by Dr. Louis Büchner, 15 cents. A spirited lecture by the eminent German Atheist. Will gratify all readers of "Force and Matter." Dr. Büchner writes with an expert's authority.

"Miracles and Miracle-Workers," by John Peck. 10 cents. This author is one of the liveliest of the Freethought writers in America. The pamphlet is logical and racy, and plays havoc with the supernatural basis of Christianity

"Christian Absurdities," by John Peck. 20 cents. A rattling essay. Sterling thought served up with genial wit. The dogmas and pretensions of Christianity are mercilessly criticised.

"Religious Problems," by L. K. Washburn. 10 cents. Mr. Washburn's style is a good deal influenced by Colonel Ingersoll. Still, he is not a mere copyist. He is, indeed, one of the best pen-soldiers in the American Freethought army. He is vigorous and epigrammatic, and this essay should do much good among readers with heads as well as eyes.—The Freethinker, London, Eng.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights an powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

TRY-SQUARE;

OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

BALAAM HAS A DISTINGUISHED VISITOR.

And he said unto them, Lodge here this night, and I will bring you word again, as the Lord shall speak unto me: And the princes of Moab abode with Balaam. And God came unto Balaam, and said, What men are these with thee?—Num. xxii, 8, 9.

Gems of Thought.

ONE situation only of the married state is excluded from pleasure, and that is a state of indifference; but as many of my readers, I hope, know what an exquisit delight there is in conveying pleasure to a beloved object, so some few, I am afraid, may hav experienced the satisfaction of tormenting one we hate. It is, I apprehend, to come at this latter pleasure, that we see both sexes often giv up that ease in marriage which they might otherwise possess, though their mate was never so disagreeable to them: hence the wife often puts on fits of love and jealousy; nay, even denies herself any pleasure, to disturb and prevent those of her husband; and he again, in return, puts frequent restraints on himself, and stays at home in company which he dislikes, in order to confine his wife to what she equally detests: hence, too, must flow those tears which a widow sometimes so plentifully sheds over the ashes of a husband with whom she led a life of constant disquiet and turbulency, and whom now she can never hope to torment any more.—Fielding.

IF there is any man I detest, it is the man who thinks he is the head of a family—the man who thinks he is "boss." . . . I hate above all things a cross man. What right has he to murder the sunshine of a day? What right has he to assassinate the joy of life? When you go home you ought to go like a ray of light—so that it will, even in the night, burst out of the doors and windows and illuminate the darkness.—Ingersoll.

THE doctrin of salvation by grace had substituted favor and caprice for the rights of natural justice, and for a series of centuries the consequences of its teachings were seen in the treatment of nearly every benefactor of mankind. The prince who devoted the fruits of his conquests to the feeding of countless convent drones, let scholars starve and loaded the discoverer of a New World with chains. His successors who lavished the treasures of their vast empire on pimps and clerical mountebanks, let Cervantes perish in penury. The sovereign protector of a thousand stall-fed prelates refused to relieve the last distress of John Kepler. The moralists who thought it a grievance that the church should be denied the right of tithing the lands of southern Spain, had no pity for the sufferings of the men whose labor had made those lands blossom like the gardens of paradise, and who were exiled by thousands for the crime of preferring the unitary god of the Koran to the trinitary Gods of the New Testament.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in The Bible of Nature.

For his religion, it was fit
To match his learning and his wit.
'Twas Presbyterian true blue;
For he was of that stubborn crew
Of errant saints, whom all men grant
To be the true church militant;
Such as do build their faith upon
The holy text of pike and gun,
Decide all controversies by
Infallible artillery;
And prove their doctrin orthodox
By apostolic blows and knocks;
Call fire, and sword, and desolation,
A godly, thorough reformation,
Which always must be carried on,
And still be doing, never done;
As if religion were intended
For nothing else but to be mended—
A sect whose chief devotion lies
In odd, perverse antipathies;
In falling out with that or this,
And finding somewhat still amiss;
More peevish, cross, splenetic,
Than dog distract or monkey sick;
That with more care keep holiday
The wrong, than others the right way;
Compound for sins they are inclined to,
By damning those they hav no mind to;
Still so perverse and opposit,
As if they worshiped God for spite;
The self-same thing they will abhor
One way, and long another for. —Butler.

INFIDELS are the intellectual discoverers. They sail the unknown seas, and in the realms of thought they touch the shores of other worlds. An Infidel is the finder of a new fact—one who in the mental sky has seen another star.—Ingersoll.

A TRUE man belongs to no other time or place, but is the center of things. Ordinarily, everybody in society reminds us of somewhat else, or of some other person. Character, reality, reminds you of nothing else; it takes place of the whole creation.—Emerson.

THERE is no man more pusillanimous than I, when I make a military plan. I magnify all the dangers, and all the possible mischances. I am in an agitation utterly painful. . . . When my resolution is taken, all is forgot, except whatever can make it succeed.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

THE domestic industry of a people cannot be hurt by the greatest prosperity of their neighbors.—Hume.

"HAS the campaign opened in your neighborhood yet?" asked a citizen yesterday of a farmer from one of the Western townships. "Oh, yes," was the reply. "Much enthusiasm?" "Heaps of it. It has got so that no Democrat can borrow a drawing of tea from a Republican, and no Republican could get a bar of soap from a Democrat if he was dying for it. Oh, yes, the campaign has opened."

A STRANGER with a sad, tired look and a manner indicating that he wished to escape general observation, came wearily into a little Western town the other day. He stopped at the town well to slake his thirst and bathe his flushed face and brow, and while he drank a denizen of the town drew near to quaff of the cooling water. He, too, had a careworn face and an air of general discouragement. "Stranger here, ain't you?" he asked of the wayfarer. "Yep, stranger now, but I used to liv round here." "No, did you? Lately?" "No; it's nigh onto ten years since I left." "And you ain't been back since?" "No. There's been a good many changes since then, and I don't reckon there's many left I uster know." "Mebbe not. Who'd you know?" "Well, lemme see—there was a woman named Watts I uster know—Sally Watts." "Did you know Sally Watts?" asked the denizen of the town. "Knowed her well. I—I—did you ever hear of Sally?" "Yes, I——" "Do you know Sally Watts?" "Yes, I—I——" The wayfarer looked carefully around, lowered his voice and said cautiously: "See here, mister; I've a favor to ask. It ain't much. Would you mind not mentionin' to Sally Watts that a stranger was round astin' fer her? She'd know it was me, and I'd ruther hav a hyener on my trail than Sally Watts. She's an idee I'm dead, an' I want her to cling to that idee. If you know Sally Watts, mister, mebbe you know how nigh she comes to bein' kin to the devil. If she ain't a Zantippy, I never see one. Lookee here, stranger; you've got a sympathetic kind of a face, an' I b'leeve you'd knew how to feel fer a feller that's went through what I've went through with, an' I feel as if I'd like to confide in you. Stranger, I uster be married to Sally Watts!" The recipient of this confidence gave a little gasp, and wrung the hand of the poor wayfarer, saying with deep fervor: "Pity me, man; I'm married to her now!"

THE property of the Y. M. C. A. in this country has increased in value from $3,000,000 in 1884 to $7,000,000 in 1887.

WHAT Englishmen say is the most powerful arc light in the world is in a light-house on the Isle of Wight. It is of 60,000 candle-power, increased by concentrating lenses to 6,000,000 candle-power.

MME. DE VALSAYRE has become notorious in France because she yearly presents a petition to the chamber of deputies that women be allowed to wear any costume they like. This year she received a reply, saying "that the law did not prevent women from wearing men's attire, but that the police did."

THE modern faith healer does not hav any trouble to explain difficulties. At a meeting a day or two ago a brother claimed to hav been entirely healed of paralysis. Said a person, "Are you entirely well now?" "Yes," was the reply, "all but a little lameness in my side." Whereupon a sister cried, "Praise the Lord, brother. God left that spot there so that it would remind you of what he has done for you! Glory to God, I say!"

THE martial example set by the young emperor of Germany has caused unusual activity in all the war offices in Europe. More orders are issued, more inspections held, and more investigations undertaken than ever before. All through Europe great bodies of troops are incessantly drilled. The continent appears to be a fortified camp. The troops are kept in motion from morning to night.

THE expenditure for war in all the European states exceeds that for education. In England the proportion is about 6 to 1; in Prussia, 4 to 1; in Russia, 80 to 1; in Denmark, 2 to 1. In Switzerland alone is almost as much spent for education as for war. The state of Pennsylvania expends $50 for education to $1 for militia maintenance. This is about the average of the whole country, and so long as it is so, the Americans at least stand some chance of remaining a free people.

THE London Telegraph, which started the marriage discussion, concludes: "It is clear to our mind that the law of divorce must be enlarged to permit dissolution of marriage for desertion, for lunacy, for confirmed inebriety, for conviction of disgraceful crimes, as likewise for established incompatibility of temper and temperament, such as a just and prudent judge would admit to be adequate. That the marriage service as it stands calls also for alteration has been abundantly demonstrated by these letters, and the sooner his grace the primate finishes with the Athanasian creed and turns his attention to passages in that service which shock young minds and disconcert older ones the better."

IT was Voltaire who, in his "Reign of Louis XIV.," began the now universally followed historical method of subordinating the accounts of kings and queens, battles and sieges, to the history of the people, their progress in the arts and sciences, literature, and social manners. Green's "Histories of the English People" and Buckle's "History of Civilization" are nothing but amplifications of this idea.

THE following message has been received by Bishop Crowther of the Niger mission from the Mohammedan emir of Nupe, west Africa: "It is not a long matter; it is about barasa [rum]. Barasa, barasa, barasa! It has ruined our country; it has ruined our people very much; it has made our people mad. I beg you, Malam Kipo, don't forget this writing, because we all beg that he should beg the great priests that they should beg the English queen to prevent bringing barasa into this land."

THE Jersey City faith curists are certainly interesting folks. One of them is a policeman, who says that he found he had leased a house swarming with croton bugs, cockroaches, and other nuisances. He at once prayed for them to go elsewhere. Having plenty of faith, he was rewarded by seeing them scamper out like an army overwhelmed by its foe. Another member of the church was plagued by musketoes, and, summoning up faith enough, prayed that they might go. Away they all went, and now they pester his neighbors while his family sit out of doors in peace.

CIVILIZATION is a thing of which many varying definitions hav been given. In a Forum article, "What Shall the Public Schools Teach?" Prof. Lester Ward givs the seemingly very good definition that civilization consists in "the utilization of the materials and forces of nature;" that so far as the improvement of man's estate is concerned we know only in order to do, that knowledge unapplied is steril, and is only fruitful when it makes two blades of grass grow where only one grew before.

THE motiv force of the world, as officially summarized by the bureau of statistics, Berlin, presents some remarkable facts, together with the interesting general statement that four-fifths of the engins now working in the world hav been constructed during the last twenty-five years. In round numbers, France has 50,000 stationary or portable boilers, 7,000 locomotivs, and 1,900 boats' boilers; Germany has 59,000 boilers, 10,000 locomotivs, and 1,700 ships' boilers; Austria, 12,000 boilers and 2,800 locomotivs. The force equivalent to the working steam-engins represents in the United States 7,500 000 horse-power—4,500,000 in Germany, 3,000,000 in France, and 1,500,000 in Austria. In these enumerations the motiv power of the locomotivs is not included, whose number in all the world amounts to 105,000, representing a total of 3,000,000 horse-power, which amount, added to the other powers, givs a total of 46,000,000 horse-power. As a steam horse-power is equal to three actual horses' power, and a living horse is equal to seven men, the steam-engins of the world may be said to represent, therefore, approximately, the work of 1,000,000,000 men.

Rome, or Reason?—A Reply to Cardinal Manning.

From the North American Review.

Superstition "has ears more deaf than adders to the voice of any true decision."

PART I.

Cardinal Manning has stated the claims of the Roman Catholic church with great clearness, and apparently without reserve. The age, position, and learning of this man giv a certain weight to his words, apart from their worth. He represents the oldest of the Christian churches. The questions involved are among the most important that can engage the human mind. No one having the slightest regard for that superb thing known as intellectual honesty, will avoid the issues tendered, or seek in any way to gain a victory over truth.

. . . . . .

The proposition is that "The church itself, by its marvelous propagation, its eminent sanctity, its inexhaustible fruitfulness in all good things, its catholic unity and invincible stability, is a vast and perpetual motiv of credibility, and an irrefragable witness of its own divine legation."

The reasons given as supporting this proposition are:

That the Catholic church interpenetrates all the nations of the civilized world; that it is extranational and independent in a supernational unity; that it is the same in every place; that it speaks all languages in the civilized world; that it is obedient to one head; that as many as seven hundred bishops hav knelt before the pope; that pilgrims from all nations hav brought gifts to Rome, and that all these things set forth in the most self-evident way the unity and universality of the Roman church.

It is also asserted that "men see the head of the church year by year speaking to the nations of the world, treating with empires, republics, and governments;" that "there is no other man on earth that can so bear himself," and that "neither from Canterbury nor from Constantinople can such a voice go forth to which rulers and people listen."

It is also claimed that the Catholic church has enlightened and purified the world; that it has given us the peace and purity of domestic life; that it has destroyed idolatry and demonology; that it gave us a body of law from a higher source than man; that it has produced the civilization of Christendom; that the popes were the greatest of statesmen and rulers; that celibacy is better than marriage, and that the revolutions and reformations of the last three hundred years hav been destructiv and calamitous.

We will examin these assertions as well as some others.

No one will dispute that the Catholic church is the best witness of its own existence. The same is true of everything that exists—of every church, great and small, of every man, and of every insect.

But it is contended that the marvelous growth or propagation of the church is evidence of its divine origin. Can it be said that success is supernatural? All success in this world is relativ. Majorities are not necessarily right. If anything is known—if anything can be known—we are sure that very large bodies of men hav frequently been wrong. We believe in what is called the progress of mankind. Progress, for the most part, consists in finding new truths and getting rid of old errors—that is to say, getting nearer and nearer in harmony with the facts of nature, seeing with greater clearness the conditions of well-being.

We know, if we know anything, that wisdom has often been trampled beneath the feet of the multitude. We know that the torch of science has been blown out by the breath of the hydra-headed. We know that the whole intellectual heaven has been darkened again and again. The truth or falsity of a proposition cannot be determined by ascertaining the number of those who assert, or of those who deny.

If the marvelous propagation of the Catholic church proves its divine origin, what shall we say of the marvelous propagation of Mohammedanism?

Nothing can be clearer than that Christianity arose out of the ruins of the Roman empire—that is to say, the ruins of paganism. And it is equally clear that Mohammedanism arose out of the wreck and ruin of Catholicism.

. . . . . .

It may be interesting in this connection to say that the Mohammedan now proves the divine mission of his apostle by appealing to the marvelous propagation of the faith. If the argument is good in the mouth of a Catholic, is it not good in the mouth of a Moslem? Let us see if it is not better.

According to Cardinal Manning, the Catholic church triumphed only over the institutions of men—triumphed only over religions that had been established by men—by wicked and ignorant men. But Mohammed triumphed not only over the religions of men, but over the religion of God. This ignorant driver of camels, this poor, unknown, unlettered boy, unassisted by God, unenlightened by supernatural means, drove the armies of the true cross before him as the winter's storm drives withered leaves. At his name, priests, bishops, and cardinals fled with white faces—popes trembled, and the armies of God, fighting for the true faith, were conquered on a thousand fields.

If the success of a church proves its divinity, and after that another church arises and defeats the first, what does that prove?

Let us put this question in a milder form. Suppose the second church livs and flourishes in spite of the first, what does that prove?

As a matter of fact, however, no church rises with everything against it. Something is favorable to it, or it could not exist. If it succeeds and grows, it is absolutely certain that the conditions are favorable. If it spreads rapidly, it simply shows that the conditions are exceedingly favorable, and that the forces in opposition are weak and easily overcome.

Here, in my own country, within a few years, has arisen a new religion. Its foundations were laid in an intelligent community, having had the advantages of what is known as modern civilization. Yet this new faith—founded on the grossest absurdities, as gross as we find in the scriptures—in spite of all opposition began to grow, and kept growing. It was subjected to persecution, and the persecution increased its strength. It was driven from state to state by the believers in universal love, until it left what was called civilization, crossed the wide plains, and took up its abode on the shores of the Great Salt Lake. It continued to grow. Its founder, as he declared, had frequent conversations with God, and received directions from that source. Hundreds of miracles were performed—multitudes upon the desert were miraculously fed—the sick were cured—the dead were raised, and the Mormon church continued to grow until now, less than a half a century after the death of its founder, there are several hundred thousand believers in the new faith.

Do you think that men enough could join this church to prove the truth of its creed?

Questions of fact or philosophy cannot be settled simply by numbers. There was a time when the Copernican system of astronomy had but few supporters—the multitude being on the other side. There was a time when the rotation of the earth was not believed by the majority.

Let us press this idea further. There was a time when Christianity was not in the majority anywhere. Let us suppose that the first Christian missionary had met a prelate of the pagan faith, and suppose this prelate had used against the Christian missionary the cardinal's argument—how could the missionary hav answered if the cardinal's argument is good?

But, after all, is the success of the Catholic church a marvel? If this church is of divine origin, if it has been under the especial care, protection, and guidance of an infinit being, is not its failure far more wonderful than its success? For eighteen centuries it has persecuted and preached, and the salvation of the world is still remote. This is the result, and it may be asked whether it is worth while to try to convert the world to Catholicism.

Are Catholics better than Protestants? Are they nearer honest, nearer just, more charitable? Are Catholic nations better than Protestant? Do the Catholic nations move in the van of progress? Within their jurisdiction are life, liberty, and property safer than anywhere else? Is Spain the first nation of the world?

Let me ask another question: Are Catholics or Protestants better than Freethinkers? Has the Catholic church produced a greater man than Humboldt? Has the Protestant produced a greater than Darwin? Was not Emerson, so far as purity of life is concerned, the equal of any true believer? Was Pius IX., or any other vicar of Christ, superior to Abraham Lincoln?

But it is claimed that the Catholic church is universal, and that its universality demonstrates its divine origin.

According to the Bible, the apostles were ordered to go into all the world and preach the gospel—yet not one of them, nor one of their converts at any time, nor one of the vicars of God for fifteen hundred years afterward, knew of the existence of the western hemisphere. During all that time can it be said that the Catholic church was universal? At the close of the fifteenth century there was one-half of the world in which the Catholic faith had never been preached, and in the other half not one person in ten had ever heard of it, and of those who had heard of it, not one in ten believed it. Certainly the Catholic church was not then universal.

Is it universal now? What impression has Catholicism made upon the many millions of China, of Japan, of India, of Africa? Can it truthfully be said that the Catholic church is now universal? When any church becomes universal, it will be the only church. There cannot be two universal churches, neither can there be one universal church and any other.

The cardinal next tries to prove that the Catholic church is divine, "by its eminent sanctity and its inexhaustible fruitfulness in all good things."

And here let me admit that there are many millions of good Catholics—that is, of good men and women who are Catholics. It is unnecessary to charge universal dishonesty or hypocrisy, for the reason that this would be only a kind of personality. Many thousands of heroes hav died in defense of the faith, and millions of Catholics hav killed and been killed for the sake of their religion.

And here it may be well enough to say that martyrdom does not even tend to prove the truth of a religion. The man who dies in flames, standing by what he believes to be true, establishes, not the truth of what he believes, but his sincerity.

Without calling in question the intentions of the Catholic church, we can ascertain whether it has been "inexhaustibly fruitful in all good things," and whether it has been "eminent for its sanctity."

In the first place, nothing can be better than goodness. Nothing is more sacred, or can be more sacred, than the well-being of man. All things that tend to increase or preserve the happiness of the human race are good—that is to say, they are sacred. All things that tend to the destruction of man's well-being, that tend to his unhappiness, are bad, no matter by whom they are taught or done.

It is perfectly certain that the Catholic church has taught, and still teaches, that intellectual liberty is dangerous—that it should not be allowed. It was driven to take this position because it had taken another. It taught, and still teaches, that a certain belief is necessary to salvation. It has always known that investigation and inquiry led, or might lead, to doubt; that doubt leads, or may lead, to heresy, and that heresy leads to hell. In other words, the Catholic church has something more important than this world, more important than the well-being of man here. It regards this life as an opportunity for joining that church, for accepting that creed, and for the saving of your soul.

If the Catholic church is right in its premises, it is right in its conclusion. If it is necessary to believe the Catholic creed in order to obtain eternal joy, then, of course, nothing else in this world is, comparativly speaking, of the slightest importance. Consequently, the Catholic church has been, and still is, the enemy of intellectual freedom, of investigation, of inquiry—in other words, the enemy of progress in secular things.

The result of this was an effort to compel all men to accept the belief necessary to salvation. This effort naturally divided itself into persuasion and persecution.

When one speaks of the "inexhaustible fruitfulness in all good things" of the Catholic church, we remember the horrors and atrocities of the Inquisition—the rewards offered by the Roman church for the capture and murder of honest men. We remember the Dominican order, the members of which, upheld by the vicar of Christ, pursued the heretics like sleuth-hounds through many centuries.

The church, "inexhaustible in fruitfulness in all good things," not only imprisoned and branded and burnt the living, but violated the dead. It robbed graves, to the end that it might convict corpses of heresy—to the end that it might take from widows their portions and from orphans their patrimony.

We remember the millions in the darkness of dungeons—the millions who perished by the sword—the vast multitude destroyed in flames—those who were flayed alive—those who were blinded—those whose tongues were cut out—those into whose ears was poured molten lead—those whose eyes were deprived of their lids—those who were tortured and tormented in every way by which pain could be inflicted and human nature overcome.

And we remember, too, the exultant cry of the church over the bodies of her victims: "Their bodies were burnt here, but their souls are now tortured in hell."

We remember that the church, by treachery, bribery, perjury, and the commission of every possible crime, got possession and control of Christendom, and we know the use that was made of this power—that it was used to brutalize, degrade, stupefy, and "sanctify" the children of men. We know also that the vicars of Christ were persecutors for opinion's sake—that they sought to destroy the liberty of thought through fear—that they endeavored to make every brain a bastile in which the mind should be a convict—that they endeavored to make every tongue a prisoner, watched by a familiar of the Inquisition—and that they threatened punishment here, imprisonment here, burnings here, and, in the name of their God, eternal imprisonment and eternal burnings hereafter.

We know, too, that the Catholic church was, during all the years of its power, the enemy of every science. It preferred magic to medicin, relics to remedies, priests to physicians. It thought more of astrologers than of astronomers. It hated geologists—it persecuted the chemist, and imprisoned the naturalist, and opposed every discovery calculated to improve the condition of mankind.

It is impossible to forget the persecutions of the Cathari, the Albigenses, the Waldenses, the Hussites, the Huguenots, and of every sect that had the courage to think just a little for itself. Think of a woman—the mother of a family—taken from her children and burnt, on account of her view as to the three natures of Jesus Christ. Think of the Catholic church—an institution with a divine founder, presided over by the agent of God—punishing a woman for giving a cup of cold water to a fellow-being who had been anathematized. Think of this church, "fruitful in all good things," launching its curse at an honest man—not only cursing him from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet with a fiendish particularity, but having at the same time the impudence to call on God, and the Holy Ghost, and Jesus Christ, and the Virgin Mary, to join in the curse; and to curse him not only here, but forever hereafter—calling upon all the saints and upon all the redeemed to join in a hallelujah of curses, so that earth and heaven should reverberate with countless curses launched at a human being simply for having expressed an honest thought.

This church, so "fruitful in all good things," invented crimes that it might punish. This church tried men for a "suspicion of heresy"—imprisoned them for the vice of being suspected—stripped them of all they had on earth and allowed them to rot in dungeons, because they were guilty of the crime of having been suspected. This was a part of the canon law.

It is too late to talk about the "invincible stability" of the Catholic church.

It was not invincible in the seventh, or in the eighth, or in the ninth century. It was not invincible in Germany in Luther's day. It was not invincible in the Low Countries. It was not invincible in Scotland, or in England. It was not invincible in France. It is not invincible in Italy. It is not supreme in any intellectual center of the world. It does not triumph in Paris, or Berlin; it is not dominant in London, in England; neither is it triumphant in the United States. It has not within its fold the philosophers, the statesmen, and the thinkers, who are the leaders of the human race.

It is claimed that Catholicism "interpenetrates all the nations of the civilized world," and that "in some it holds the whole nation in its unity."

I suppose the Catholic church is more powerful in Spain than in any other nation. The history of this nation demonstrates the result of Catholic supremacy, the result of an acknowledgment by a people that a certain religion is too sacred to be examined.

Without attempting in an article of this character to point out the many causes that contributed to the adoption of Catholicism by the Spanish people, it is enough to say that Spain, of all nations, has been and is the most thoroughly Catholic, and the most thoroughly interpenetrated and dominated by the spirit of the church of Rome.

Spain used the sword of the church. In the name of religion it endeavored to conquer the Infidel world. It drove from its territory the Moors, not because they were bad, not because they were idle and dishonest, but because they were Infidels. It expelled the Jews, not because they were ignorant or vicious, but because they were unbelievers. It drove out the Moriscoes, and deliberately made outcasts of the intelligent, the industrious, the honest, and the useful, because they were not Catholics. It leaped like a wild beast upon the Low Countries, for the destruction of Protestantism. It covered the seas with its fleets, to destroy the intellectual liberty of man. And not only so—it established the Inquisition within its borders. It imprisoned the honest, it burnt the noble, and succeeded after many years of devotion to the true faith, in destroying the industry, the intelligence, the usefulness, the genius, the nobility, and the wealth of a nation. It became a wreck, a jest of the conquered, and excited the pity of its former victims.

In this period of degradation, the Catholic church held "the whole nation in its unity."

At last Spain began to deviate from the path of the church. It made a treaty with an Infidel power. In 1782 it became humbled enough, and wise enough, to be friends with Turkey. It made treaties with Tripoli and Algiers and the Barbary states. It had become too poor to ransom the prisoners taken by these powers. It began to appreciate the fact that it could neither conquer nor convert the world by the sword.

Spain has progressed in the arts and sciences, in all that tends to enrich and ennoble a nation, in the precise proportion that she has lost faith in the Catholic church. This may be said of every other nation in Christendom. Torquemada is dead; Castelar is alive. The dungeons of the Inquisition are empty, and a little light has penetrated the clouds and mists—not much, but a little, Spain is not yet clothed and in her right mind. A few years ago the cholera visited Madrid and other cities. Physicians were mobbed. Processions of saints carried the host through the streets for the purpose of staying the plague. The streets were not cleaned; the sewers were filled. Filth and faith, old partners, reigned supreme. The church, "eminent for its sanctity," stood in the light and cast its shadow on the ignorant and the prostrate. The church, in its "inexhaustible fruitfulness in all good things," allowed its children to perish through ignorance, and used the diseases it had produced as an instrumentality to further enslave its votaries and its victims.

It is stated that the Catholic church is immutable, and that its immutability establishes its claim to divine origin. Was it immutable when its unity, internal and external, was broken? Was it precisely the same after its unity was broken that it was before? Was it precisely the same after its unity was divinely restored that it was while broken? Was it universal while it was without unity? Which of the fragments was universal—which was immutable?

The fact that the Catholic church is obedient to the pope, establishes, not the supernatural origin of the church, but the mental slavery of its members. It establishes the fact that it is a successful organization; that it is cunningly devised; that it destroys the mental independence, and that whoever absolutely submits to its authority loses the jewel of his soul.

The fact that Catholics are, to a great extent, obedient to the pope, establishes nothing except the thoroughness of the organization.

Does the fact that millions of the faithful visit Mecca establish the truth of the Koran? Is it a scene for congratulation when the bishops of thirty nations kneel before a man? Is it not humiliating to know that man is willing to kneel at the feet of man? Could a noble man demand, or joyfully receive, the humiliation of his fellows?

As a rule, arrogance and humility go together. He who in power compels his fellow-men to kneel will himself kneel when weak. The tyrant is a cringer in power; a cringer is a tyrant out of power. Great men stand face to face. They meet on equal terms. The cardinal who kneels in the presence of the pope wants the bishop to kneel in his presence; and the bishop who kneels demands that the priest shall kneel to him; and the priest who kneels demands that they in lower orders shall kneel; and all, from pope to the lowest—that is to say, from pope to exorcist, from pope to the one in charge of the bones of saints—all demand that the people, the laymen, those upon whom they liv, shall kneel to them.

The man of free and noble spirit will not kneel. Courage has no knees. Fear kneels, or falls upon its ashen face.

The cardinal insists that the pope is the vicar of Christ, and that all popes hav been. What is a vicar of Jesus Christ? He is a substitute in office. He stands in the place, or occupies the position in relation to the church, in relation to the world, that Jesus Christ would occupy were he the pope at Rome. In other words, he takes Christ's place; so that, according to the doctrin of the Catholic church, Jesus Christ himself is present in the person of the pope.

We all know that a good man may employ a bad agent. A good king might leave his realm and put in his place a tyrant and wretch. The good man, and the good king, cannot certainly know what manner of man the agent is—what kind of person the vicar is—consequently the bad may be chosen. But if the king appointed a bad vicar, knowing him to be bad, knowing that he would oppress the people, knowing that he would imprison and burn the noble and generous, what excuse can be imagined for such a king?

Now, if the church is of divine origin, and if each pope is the vicar of Jesus Christ, he must hav been chosen by Jesus Christ; and when he was chosen, Christ must hav known exactly what his vicar would do. Can we believe that an infinitly wise and good being would choose immoral, dishonest, ignorant, malicious, heartless, fiendish, and inhuman vicars?

The cardinal admits that "the history of Christianity is the history of the church, and that the history of the church is the history of the pontiffs," and he then declares that "the greatest statesmen and rulers that the world has ever seen are the popes of Rome."

Let me call attention to a few passages in Draper's "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe."

Constantine was one of the vicars of Christ. Afterward, Stephen V. was chosen. The eyes of Constantine were then put out by Stephen, acting in Christ's place. The tongue of the Bishop Theodorus was amputated by the man who had been substituted for God. This bishop was left in a dungeon to perish of thirst. Pope Leo III. was seized in the street and forced into a church, where the nephews of Pope Adrian attempted to put out his eyes and cut off his tongue. His successor, Stephen V., was driven ignominiously from Rome. His successor, Paschal I., was accused of blinding and murdering two ecclesiastics in the Lateran Palace. John VIII., unable to resist the Mohammedans, was compelled to pay them tribute.

At this time, the bishop of Naples was in secret alliance with the Mohammedans, and they divided with this Catholic bishop the plunder they collected from other Catholics. This bishop was excommunicated by the pope; afterward he gave him absolution because he betrayed the chief Mohammedans, and assassinated others. There was an ecclesiastical conspiracy to murder the pope, and some of the treasures of the church were seized, and the gate of St. Pancrazia was opened with false keys to admit the Saracens. Formosus, who had been engaged in these transactions, who had been excommunicated as a conspirator for the murder of Pope John, was himself elected pope in 891. Boniface VI. was his successor. He had been deposed from the diaconate and from the priesthood for his immoral and lewd life. Stephen VII. was the next pope, and he had the dead body of Formosus taken from the grave, clothed in papal habiliments, propped up in a chair, and tried before a council. The corpse was found guilty, three fingers were cut off and the body cast into the Tiber. Afterward Stephen VII., this vicar of Christ, was thrown into prison and strangled.

From 896 to 900, five popes were consecrated. Leo V., in less than two months after he became pope, was cast into prison by Christopher, one of his chaplains. This Christopher usurped his place, and in a little while was expelled from Rome by Sergius III., who became pope in 905. This pope lived in criminal intercourse with the celebrated Theodora, who with her daughters Marozia and Theodora, both prostitutes, exercised an extraordinary control over him. The love of Theodora was also shared by John X. She gave him the archbishopric of Ravenna, and made him pope in 915. The daughter of Theodora overthrew this pope. She surprised him in the Lateran Palace. His brother, Peter, was killed; the pope was thrown into prison, where he was afterward murdered. Afterward, this Marozia, daughter of Theodora, made her own son pope, John XI. Many affirmed that Pope Sergius was his father, but his mother inclined to attribute him to her husband Alberic, whose brother Guido she afterward married. Another of her sons, Alberic, jealous of his brother John, the pope, cast him and their mother into prison. Alberic's son was then elected pope as John XII.

John was nineteen years old when he became the vicar of Christ. His reign was characterized by the most shocking immoralities, so that the emperor Otho I. was compelled by the German clergy to interfere. He was tried. It appeared that John had received bribes for the consecration of bishops; that he had ordained one who was only ten years old; that he was charged with incest, and with so many adulteries that the Lateran Palace had become a brothel. He put out the eyes of one ecclesiastic; he maimed another—both dying in consequence of their injuries. He was given to drunkenness and to gambling. He was deposed at last, and Leo VII. elected in his stead. Subsequently he got the upper hand. He seized his antagonists; he cut off the hand of one, the nose, the finger, and the tongue of others. His life was eventually brought to an end by the vengeance of a man whose wife he had seduced.

And yet I admit that the most infamous popes, the most heartless and fiendish bishops, friars, and priests, were models of mercy, charity, and justice when compared with the orthodox God—with the God they worshiped. These popes, these bishops, these priests, could persecute only for a few years—they could burn only for a few moments—but their God threatened to imprison and burn forever; and their God is as much worse than they were, as hell is worse than the Inquisition.

John XIII. was strangled in prison. Boniface VII. imprisoned Benedict VII., and starved him to death. John XIV. was secretly put to death in the dungeons of the castle of St. Angelo. The corpse of Boniface was dragged by the populace through the streets.

It must be remembered that the popes were assassinated by Catholics—murdered by the faithful—that one vicar of Christ strangled another vicar of Christ, and that these men were "the greatest rulers and the greatest statesmen of the earth."

Pope John XVI. was seized, his eyes put out, his nose cut off, his tongue torn from his mouth, and he was sent through the streets mounted on an ass, with his face to the tail. Benedict IX., a boy less than twelve years of age, was raised to the apostolic throne. One of his successors, Victor III., declared that the life of Benedict was so shameful, so foul, so execrable, that he shuddered to describe it. He ruled like a captain of banditti. The people, unable to bear longer his adulteries, his homicides, and his abominations, rose against him, and in despair of maintaining his position, he put up the papacy to auction, and it was bought by a presbyter named John, who became Gregory VI., in the year of grace 1045. Well may we ask, Were these the vicegerents of God upon earth—these, who had truly reached that goal beyond which the last effort of human wickedness cannot pass?

It may be sufficient to say that there is no crime that man can commit that has not been committed by the vicars of Christ. They hav inflicted every possible torture, violated every natural right. Greater monsters the human race has not produced.

Among the "some two hundred and fifty-eight vicars of Christ there were probably some good men. This would hav happened even if the intention had been to get all bad men, for the reason that man reaches perfection neither in good nor in evil; but if they were selected by Christ himself, if they were selected by a church with a divine origin and under divine guidance, then there is no way to account for the selection of a bad one. If one hypocrit was duly elected pope—one murderer, one strangler, one starver—this demonstrates that all the popes were selected by men, and by men only, and that the claim of divine guidance is born of zeal and uttered without knowledge.

But who were the vicars of Christ? How many hav there been? Cardinal Manning himself does not know. He is not sure. He says: "Starting from St. Peter to Leo XIII., there hav been some two hundred and fifty-eight pontiffs claiming to be recognized by the whole Catholic unity as successors of St. Peter and vicars of Jesus Christ." Why did he use the word "some?" Why "claiming?" Does he not positivly know? Is it possible that the present vicar of Christ is not certain as to the number of his predecessors? Is he infallible in faith and fallible in fact?

The Secular Union Congress.

It was one day last week along toward evening that Lucy Colman sauntered into THE TRUTH SEEKER office and told the Editorial Reporter that if he wished to hav safe escort to the Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held at Pittsburgh, Pa., October 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th, he would do well to pack his paper and pencils quickly, as she always wanted to be in good time for the trains. When the Editorial Reporter jumped out of a lofty berth on a Pennsylvania palace sleeping-car, just clearing by great athletic effort the race characteristic of a child of Abraham which protruded from the lower berth into the aisle, he found Mrs. Colman talking to Mrs. Barney, the gentle woman's rights advocate who is traveling from city to city to urge the appointment by the various municipalities of female policemen. Standing in the aisle, brushing the lint from a comfortable traveling shawl, was a determined-looking lady, whom the porter pointed out as Belva Lockwood, remarking aside that he supposed she had to make a living somehow. This triflingly irrelevant remark was interpreted by the Reporter to mean that the compassionate child of Africa was somewhat sorry for the only woman who has been admitted to the Bar of the United States Supreme Court, and is now stumping the country in behalf of female suffrage. Mrs. Colman, who is acquainted with about all the Reformers in the country, left the female police advocate and presented the Reporter to the seventh or eighth (there are eleven) candidate for the presidency. Mrs. Lockwood avowed her firm conviction that she would reside in Washington for the next four years. She owned a house there, she explained, and that was her place of abode. She also thought that Mr. G. Cleveland would be a neighbor of hers for the same period. She is speaking at county fairs, and did not contradict the remark that she was certainly a great attraction. She finds the men ready to listen and be convinced, but the women are incredulous as to the benefits to be derived from voting. But the campaign is a good means of waking up the country on the question, and she is working for the Cause. The women, she thought, are outgrowing the church, and will not very much longer be bound by superstition. Mrs. Lockwood is a strong, bright, quick woman, who might make an uncomfortable mother-in-law, but who certainly is an admirably energetic advocate of the rights of her sex. She spoke of the adverse decision of the judges of Washington territory in the woman's rights case, and said she would, if asked, gratuitously argue the appeal before the Supreme Court at Washington.

If you ask a Pittsburgher what the industries are that hav given Pittsburgh and Allegheny City (the two are really one) their population of three hundred thousand people without souls, he will answer, NATURAL GAS and the steel, iron, and glass works. If you asked a Pittsburgh Liberal what the most important work of Liberalism was at that date, he would say, Elect Harry Hoover secretary of the American Secular Union. Pittsburgh is proud of her natural gas, and the Liberals of the place hav a great admiration for Mr. Hoover. The two prides kept the delegates warm, the one glowing in the grates around fire-brick, the other in the groups which gathered to discuss the affairs of Liberalism. These discussions were not always good-natured, for between the Pittsburgher and the outside delegate there speedily grew up a coldness which the natural gas and heated discussions could but partially dispel. The delegates from the portions of the country lying beyond Pittsburgh boundaries were, with one or two notable exceptions, in favor of retaining the services of Mr. E. A. Stevens, who had, they alleged, been remarkably activ, self-sacrificing, and efficient. The Pittsburghers, reinforced by Brother Bell and Miss Voltairine de Cleyre, thought that Chicago was trying to run the universe, helped along by New York, and abetted by San Francisco, and that the time had come for Pittsburgh to take charge. Others had different reasons, but these are too contemptible to catalog. Mr. Staley's bookstore was the headquarters of Mr. Hoover and his friends, and Mr. Stevens's rooms the gathering-place for the outside clans, who made occasional aggressiv raids on the territory of Harry. Without reflecting upon any particular person, it was as evident as the New Court House which Pittsburgh is building, and in her admiration for which she is almost lost, that a good deal of backbiting and lying had been done. This was a source of great grief to the older workers in the cause, but the fact was there. Up to 2 P.M. Friday, the day the Congress opened, this was the state of affairs.

Lafayette Hall is a moderate-sized place, which, with its two galleries, will accommodate a thousand persons. The Pittsburgh Union had decorated it profusely with flags and state banners and festoons of colors. The stage was covered with plants, and the walls with the names of the dead and living exponents of Freethought. Three pieces of music—a piano, violin, and cornet—had been engaged, and when they played the first selection there were nineteen persons in the hall. When President Putnam called the meeting to order there were something like forty. During the session a dozen or twenty visiting Freethinkers arrived. President Putnam made the opening address of welcome. Mr. Putnam's year of hard work has not made him thin, but it has made him a more graceful orator, though on this occasion he read what he had to say to the assembled delegates. He said:

We hav come together as comrades. We are few against the many. Our cause is not popular. To educate the world in freedom, in equal rights, is our supreme purpose. For this we labor, for this we sacrifice, for this we hope. In the manifold life of civilization no one organization can meet all the needs of the hour. To endeavor to do so is weakness and not strength. Our work as an organization is special, not general. We hav a particular task, and to that we must concentrate the efforts of the organization. The task is both great and necessary. Unless we and those who come after us succeed, the American republic will be destroyed. We stand by the Declaration of Independence.

The Demands of Liberalism represent an immense work. There must be immense agitation, a vast struggle, and strenuous effort for the enthronement of these Demands in the state, and until that is done there is no true liberty, no true republic.

Mr. Putnam then touched upon the question of church taxation, the public schools, and the Sunday laws. Continuing he said:

The importance of our work is thus manifest. Other work is to be done, other reforms are to be carried. Labor must win its rights; woman must hav her equality; monopolies must be overthrown; the reign of the people must be established, but the absolutely necessary step to all these is the total separation of church and state. To destroy class legislation we must first of all obliterate this church legislation. To overthrow monopolies we must attack the ecclesiastical monopoly. To make the administration of all the laws of this land non-Christian is the next step to universal rights.

The sphere of the lecturer must be broader than that of the organization. He must deal with life and the philosophy of life. He must deal with political secularism mainly through philosophical secularism. The Freethought movement includes all there is in civilization. It can publish books on all subjects; it can concern itself with all subjects. The lecturer must do this, but in doing this general work he should, wherever possible, emphasize the Nine Demands, and the particular work of the American Secular Union.

The Secular Union is not a machine for authority. It can not be run on the old ecclesiastical methods. Red tape is of very little value in the Liberal movement. The power of the Union is the power of attraction, of good service, of fellowship. Every Liberal is forever free, and at heart a rebel to every kind of domination. He believes in fair play. There are no leaders except by natural choice. We are comrades and we are equals, all of us. There should be no factions, no axes to grind, no petty partisan policy. We cannot afford to be divided. If the Union does not stand for honor, for generosity, for good will, for courtesy, then it should be buried out of sight. If we among ourselvs are suspicious, quarrelsome, jealous, partial, then let us adjourn without date. The organization is worse than worthless. But I can not believe that such is the case. I cannot believe but that in every respect this Congress will represent the nobleness of our work, and thus create a grander impulse and enthusiasm than ever. There are no spoils of office. There is nothing to scramble for. Truth, justice, fellowship, honor—these are all we hav, these are all we can giv.

At the conclusion of his address President Putnam announced the committee on credentials as follows: E. A. Stevens, F. A. Pierce, Wm. Redfield. While the committee were receiving credentials, Mrs. Freeman read her report as head of the Finance Committee. She said:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: My report as Chairman of the Finance Committee must be somewhat meager, as I was not elected to the office until about six months after the last Congress, and that election became necessary on account of the resignation of Edgar C. Beall, of Cincinnati, who had been duly elected Chairman of the Finance Committee. However inefficient my work, the responses from Liberals hav been appreciativ and generous. Mr. Putnam, President of the Union, has unceasingly advocated during the past year from one end of the country to the other the necessity of organization and action with the same untiring energy that he evinced as Secretary. Mr. Stevens, the present Secretary, Mr. Putnam's able successor, has worked early and late with energy and enthusiasm to enhance the work of Liberalism.

Mr. Putnam, and the Chairman of your Finance Committee, sent to the Liberals of the different states a circular letter—an appeal for aid. In this reference was made to Girard College—action which the secretary has had in contemplation since THE TRUTH SEEKER article published last February.

The generous, enthusiastic response in reply to these letters shows that only live questions are needed to awaken the people—that the spirit that animated the fathers of the republic is not dead. From the various localities throughout the country there was an expression of confidence in the Union, and an approval of its officers and their work. The cost of mailing the circulars to Liberals was $18 90. Fifty thousand leaflets were also sent out; two thousand Constitutions; one thousand copies of Bacon's "Paradoxes;" nearly one thousand "Museums in the Park: Why They Should be Open on Sunday." This pamphlet was issued by Brother Putnam, as was also a plea for impartial taxation, four hundred copies of which were sent out, as well as six hundred copies of "God in the State," which were furnished by Messrs. Putnam and Macdonald at cost to the Union. Much more missionary work would hav been done in the way of the distribution of Liberal literature had the Union been possessed of sufficient funds for the purpose.

Several of the local societies throughout the states, more especially in the West, hav sent aid to the Union for the next year. The society of Chicago has done nobly. With the secretary in Chicago, and the "Forum" the headquarters of the Union, the local society has evinced a more lively interest in the national organization and its work. During the last year it has paid its pledge of $100, adding to that amount an additional hundred paid into the Campaign Fund. It should also be remembered that the expenses of the last Congress were largely borne by the Liberals of Chicago. The Forum—the Secular Union Hall—has been leased and refitted at several hundred dollars' expense to the Liberals. The possession of this building, on one of the most fashionable boulevards in the city, has given the society a standing it had heretofore, with all its work, failed to secure. The national organization is making itself felt as a power. Already, in the supreme court of Illinois, a decision has been given which, if followed up, furnishes a precedent for wresting thousands of dollars from ecclesiastical power, and this work was instigated by members of the Chicago Union.

It is work, then, that is needed—united, energetic action. It is not alone Girard College that is to be rescued from the hands of the enemy; it is not alone to right this dead Freethinker, whose generous trust has been so cruelly betrayed, that the American Secular Union has an existence. From that resplendent past, made glorious by the struggle of victorious heroes, comes the watchword of alarm, "Eternal Vigilance is the price of Liberty."

The American Secular Union is demanding that that old will left by the fathers of this nation be enforced—that on no corner-stone of this great Republic shall be written the word "Religion."

Mr. Stevens then reported the following persons as entitled to votes in the Congress:

OFFICERS.

President.—S. P. Putnam.
Secretary.—E. A. Stevens.
Chairman Finance Committee.—Mrs. M. A. Freeman.
Chairman Executiv Committee.—E. B. Foote, Jr., M D.
Vice-Presidents.—Charles Watts, Harry Hoover, Roman Staley, William Redfield, W. S Bell.
Charter members.—Lucy N. Colman, Harry Hoover, Simeon Nixon.
Life members.—Leonard Geiger, Mrs. Geiger, W. L. Willis, G. F. A. de Lespinasse, R. G. Smith.
Delegates.—David H. Smith, Mrs. S. S. Rockhill, John Bonner, Alliance, O.
R. H. Railston, Mrs. M. H. Lyndall, William Seville, Columbus, O.
George L. Robinson, M. A. Freeman, H. B. Marlett, Chicago, Ill.
William Redfield, Emery Frost, Alexander Risk, Fayette county, O.
Mary Smith, Cleveland, O.
Marius Heighton, A. D. Swan, Kent, O.
E. B. Foote, Jr., M.D., Mr. Manahan, E. M. Macdonald, Mrs. Cynthia Leonard, New York city.
F. A. Pierce, A Cutshell, G. W. Canfield, Simeon Nixon, A. Cuthbert, Pennsylvania state League.
A. Barker, R. Staley, Geo. Dorey, G. C. Schade, Thomas Grundy, Pittsburgh Secular Union.
C. B. Brooks, Linesville, Pa.

The report was accepted as far as it went, but as many more delegates were expected, the Committee was directed to continue in session.

The following Committee on Rules and Resolutions was appointed: Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., Judge R. B. Westbrook, Lucy N. Colman, J. H. Burnham, E. A. Stevens.

Mrs. Severance wanted to know if annual members could vote. The Constitution was read, and it was decided that they could not.

The following Committee on Nominations was then submitted to the Congress: E. M. Macdonald, Wm. Redfield, Leonard Geiger, Geo. Robertson, Roman Staley. Mr. Anthony Barker opposed the Committee, but it was appointed by a vote of thirteen to seven.

An Auditing Committee, composed of Mrs. M. A. Freeman, F. A. Pierce, and R. G. Smith, was then appointed.

Harry Hoover read Treasurer Eckhard's report, which showed a receipt of $1 272 15; expenditures, $1,225 73; cash on hand, $46 42. Report referred to Auditing Committee. The names of the donors to the Union hav already appeared in these columns, but for the satisfaction of all parties, the Editorial Reporter will use his influence with the Editor to print the report in full in the next TRUTH SEEKER.

President Putnam rose to a question of privilege. Charges had been made against his action as Secretary by Mr. Eckhard, and he wanted them proved or withdrawn. If anyone had anything to say about him he wanted it said to his face. This matter was also referred to the Auditing Committee.

Secretary Stevens then read his report:

ANNUAL REPORT OF SECRETARY OF AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

To the Officers, Members, and Delegates of the Twelfth Annual Congress.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: In response to demands from co-workers, and in gratitude for the manifestation of confidence which an unsought and unanimous election conferred, I rather reluctantly accepted the position of Secretary one year ago, fearing that my friends had placed too high an estimate on my capabilities, and had perhaps mistaken zeal for capacity. Although such cultivated and brilliant writers as Professor Rawson, the witty and genial Leland, and the poet-laureate of Liberalism, S. P. Putnam, had previously held this post, nevertheless, I determined that, so far as lay in my power, the organization should hav nothing to regret by the selection, and I hav labored as faithfully for the upbuilding of the American Secular Union as the meager financial assistance afforded and the many obstacles in my path would allow.

As you are aware, I was not wholly new to the work, for my hope and effort for years has been to help make this a national representativ organization which shall eventually become, throughout the length and breadth of the land, an intellectual, social, and political power. Alas! unlooked-for complications hav largely tended to thwart the realization of my desire, and I regret that those stumbling-blocks were not from without but within; but in spite of opposition we hav progressed.

After reporting the proceedings of the Chicago Congress for the Liberal press, forwarding certificates of membership, drafting the Congratulatory ordered by the Eleventh Annual Congress to C. Palmer, I outlined, in brief, a plan of campaign, laying particular stress on the issuing and distribution of leaflets and literature, in an article entitled, "A Word to Liberals Everywhere." supplementing that by another on "Unity, Harmony, Action."

Shortly after this an old feud was reopened, relating to past matters, having no possible bearing, except injuriously, on the organization at the present time, and it seemed as though every effort was being made to strangle the life out of the American Secular Union to gratify personal animosity, from which it has doubtless suffered ever since.

Feeling that many of our Freethought lecturers were disaffected and indifferent toward the Union, I endeavored to inaugurate a plan which would enlist their activ support, so this organization should be what the American Secular Union was intended—a source of help and revenue to workers for Secularization of state. That plan and others, which received the indorsement of the Board of Directors, will be submitted to the proper committee, who will accept, amend, or reject them.

Some feature of this year's work has been the distribution of thousands of leaflets, constitutions, pamphlets, bearing on tax exemption, the injustice of Sunday closing of the museums, etc., to nearly every person who made a contribution to the Campaign Fund, and often distributed among earnest workers who had not sent a donation, but who we felt would use them to the best advantage.

The Union has twenty electrotypes of leaflets Nos. 1 and 2. The amount of leaflets and literature printed or distributed (some of which was left from former administrations) was about fifty-five thousand copies; and while I consider this a limited showing, it is a commencement, and it has been fairly scattered along President Putnam's return route, as far as it would go, and by his energy nearly every town in Oregon, Washington territory, and Utah he has visited has been brought into activ sympathy with the American Secular Union, and several hav taken out charters.

Some organizations which hav been slumbering for years hav been revived, notably in Cleveland, Alliance, St. Louis, centers of intelligence and population where the chances for their permanence is greater. Correspondence with a view to organization is being had with Detroit and Minneapolis. Charters hav been issued to Fresno, Anaheim, San José Cal.; Stayton, McMinnville, Ore.; Quincy, Ill.; St. Louis, Mo.; West Union, O; Fairmount, Minn., and Locust Dale, Pa.

A larger list of life members—who always hav formed the sinew, intellect, and vertebræ of our Secular cause—hav been added this year. Their names are: Leonard Geiger, of Hudson, N Y.; Dr. W. L. Willis, of Kokomo Ind.; J. A. Smith, Hudson, N. Y; Jas A. Greenhill, Clinton, Ill; Hugo Schmidt, Chicago, Ill.; N. C. Dahl, Chicago, Ill; A. K. Olds, McMinnville. Ore.; E. Chope, Detroit, Mich.; Owen Thomas Davies, Brighton, Cal.; Photius Fisk, Boston, Mass; Jas. Tuttle, Atlantic, Ill; Dr. G. F. de Lespinasse, Orange City, Ia; N. F Griswold, Meriden, Conn.; Mrs. M. J. Olds, McMinnville. Ore; Maj. W. H. Forward. surgeon of the United States army at Fort Snelling, Minn.; Hon. M. M. Secor, mayor of Racine, Wis. Many of these life members hav aided financially in addition to their membership fee. The roll of annual members is also unusually large and shows an increased interest in the Nine Demands, despite the distracting influences of a presidential campaign year.

Official friends in Detroit and Chicago hav been quietly doing valuable service for Secularization. In the former city resolutions were introduced in the common council to tax church property, as well as other exemptions. The portion relativ to churches was, of course, defeated, but several religious and educational institutions, which heretofore escaped taxation, will hav to pay their share of the public burden. Among them is the Hibernian Hall, owned by an Irish Catholic order, which has always had a thriving saloon in it. Lafayette Hall, a popular dance-house, run under a pretended "benevolent association," also will be under the necessity of paying taxes, as well as several private schools. But the most encouraging feature is that the immense structure which the Young Men's Christian Association hav just finished will hav to pay taxes, with one of the most flourishing barber-shops, run by this institution, which is always after the nimble penny.

My former co-worker and friend—brother to Detroit's highest-salaried pastor—Hon. Judson Grenell, a leading journalist of Detroit, has been doing splendid work for Secularization in the legislature of Michigan, and the American Secular Union, as well as its Secretary, are under great obligations to him for furnishing complete official returns of untaxed church property for not only the city of Detroit, but the following cities of Michigan: Alpena, Battle Creek, Coldwater, Charlotte, Cadillac, Dowagiac. Flint. Greenville, Hillsdale, Holland, Ishpeming. Kalamazoo, Ludington, Manistee, Marshall, Marquette, Niles, Negaunee, Owosso, and Saginaw, all of which hav appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER Of the $13 000 000 of exempt property of the city of Detroit, some $4 000 000 was church property, according to the assessments of 1887. The total assessments were $142 000,000, so it follows that the assessed property had to pay about eleven per cent more to make good this deficit.

Through friends in the Cook county board, the Secretary has been instrumental in bringing into the courts of Chicago a monstrous swindle which the Catholics hav been perpetrating on our citizens. This subject cannot be gone into in detail, as it might at this juncture be the means of defeating friends who can still be useful in ventilating similar rascalities. The principal points of one case I will very briefly summarize:

For years the maintenance of "dependent children" has been a bugbear of the county board, until an arrangement was entered into so that all vagrant children not under proper care, or who committed some misdemeanor, should be sentenced to Feehanville or the Evanston Industrial school. The former was erected by Archbishop Feehan, and presided over by the Christian Brothers, for the non-sectarian instruction of boys, and the latter was a Protestant institution for girls. A special act was omnibused through our legislature making the county liable for the children committed there, which was a plain violation of our constitution. But as the two great Christian wings, Catholic and Protestant, were apparently satisfied, there were few to protest and it mattered little if they did. Never satisfied, the Catholics hit upon a happy expedient to get the girls, or a portion of them, also, and, as they control our courts, hav thus far succeeded admirably. Recently some friends were elected to the county board when the "boodle" element was landed out, and these matters privately brought before them. It just happened that a bill for $19.500 was pending their action, and these friends agreed to fight its payment if we could furnish the facts that could not be controverted in open court. So into the court it went, and we were enabled, by the aid of other friends, to furnish sufficient points to show that a mammoth fraud only needed an archbishop to make it eminently respectable.

The incarceration of little Ellen Thomas in the House of the Good Shepherd and her rescue by friends of our Union, proves the good work which organized Secularists can accomplish.

Not wishing to point too much to personal work, but desirous of showing what an activ band of Secularists can do, I will refer you to the response of Secretary Marius Heighton to my question, What has the Kent Society done in its existence?—which, of course, is only a part:

It has organized a Secular library of one hundred volumes.
It has introduced THE TRUTH SEEKER into more than one hundred families, and maintained a standing subscription of some seventy names.
It has organized and maintained seven lecture courses at a cost of $3 6 04. all of which, save Dr York's, yielded a small profit after paying expenses. All hav been free, and the surplus put into the library.
It maintains a circulating tract library to the number of four hundred.
It has conducted a three days' debate, and by it spiked the guns of the bombastic Catholics.
It has regular fortnightly meetings; has challenged the local clergy to meet it in debate.
It takes higher moral stand than the churches.
It is negotiating for a lot upon which to build a hall, and it has a charter and yet it is younger than Cleveland's administration.
It can keep bigots out of the school board, and is feared and respected by the politicians. That is a glorious record surely, and if every chartered society had done half as much, politicians would not need to crawl after priests and preachers.

The correspondence has been quite voluminous, and the secretary has been requested to perform some very peculiar missions by Liberals in distant points. Then the pamphlets and leaflets were to be wrapped, directed, and forwarded, besides writing an average of three articles a week for the press. You can rest assured that the secretaryship of the American Secular Union is not a sinecure.

The Chicago society takes a great deal of time and attention, but as I consider that an activ branch of the American Secular Union, work done for that is always either indirectly or directly for the welfare of the American Secular Union.

President Putnam has labored early and late, devoted a large portion of his paper to its interest, rolled up a splendid list of newly chartered organizations, secured pledges of large sums of money, been burdened with a large amount of correspondence, on which he has spent his time, labor, and postage, and has worked as indefatigably and assiduously for the American Secular Union this year as though in receipt of a sa ary, but has been repaid by slanders.

On the matter of a Liberal lecture bureau I hav done nothing but gather information, which satisfies me that unless the lecturers would consent to remain in certain territory a specified time, and not enter into the country assigned to others, from which they might rotate every year or so, the lecture bureau would be of little consequence, as the former advantages in reference to reduced railroad rates no longer obtain under the interstate commerce law.

SUGGESTIONS.

Now for a few suggestions upon which to base legislation at this Congress for the future:

1. Some definit plan and understanding must be made with every lecturer who wishes to be considered as one of and a worker with the American Secular Union. To the proper committee I respectfully recommend the adoption or modification of the agreement previously mentioned.

2. The organization, having elected officers to represent it, must consider that any person attacking the officers without preferring definit charges of official misconduct is thereby attacking the organization, and such person must be summarily dealt with. That the Board of Directors select a sub committee on grievances, to whom all charges must be referred. That the report of this committee, when it receives the sanction of a majority of the Board of Directors, shall be implicitly obeyed until the meeting of the next annual Congress, when, by consent, the matter may be finally dealt with. When every president, from Ingersoll down, has been maligned by some malcontent, it is high time that the American Secular Union asserts its dignity; if not, that sort of thing will soon make it so that no person will ever accept the office.

3. It is to be hoped that the meager receipts of the treasury this year do not mark the measure of the liberality of its members and friends, and I hope that if we show some activ, aggressiv work, Liberals will gladly respond.

4 I am in favor of action being taken by this Congress whereby a committee of legal gentlemen, upon which I would suggest Dr. Westbrook be placed, should be appointed, for the purpose of ascertaining whether we could possibly make a legal fight on the management of Girard College with any chance of winning, and that a sum be set aside by this Congress to procure such a report. Since the edition of THE TRUTH SEEKER last February appeared I hav calculated on this.

5. It has been suggested by some that it would be a good plan for each local organization to require its members to pay $1 annually into the national treasury, as a monthly or quarterly per capita tax is seldom satisfactorily collected unless the organization is of a benevolent character. The Secretary of the American Secular Union ought to be saved the humiliation of playing the role of a howling mendicant in some way, and the Finance Committee it is hoped will be able to meet the emergency. I would suggest that each organization should be required to pledge some sum annually to be paid to the Campaign Fund. If, in every community, the Secularists would stand up to be counted, we should soon become a social and political power. If possible, let them come together and each present a plan to gather statistics, and adopt the most feasible. There is also a great deal of work that we could accomplish as Secularists, to defeat the schemes of bigots, that can be done by the united, intelligent work of half a dozen Liberals without any public meeting or lectures. Everyone can, if willing, do something. If they could not engage a hall, they could meet in a parlor. If they cannot procure a lecturer, read, to those who do not subscribe, some of the articles or pamphlets of the American Secular Union If you cannot meet each week, meet bimonthly or monthly, only let the meetings be held regularly. If you hav not the money, let work or thought be supplied instead. Money is not the only thing needed in our cause, but it is an important one. Canvass your neighborhood for funds; induce those who cannot afford to giv $100 to giv $25, and those who cannot spare $25 should contribute $5 as proudly as though it were five times that amount. Above all, do not giv grudgingly, but from the deep conviction that comes of an honest purpose to do your duty. If you cannot organize, try to pay in $1, and collect a like sum from your Freethought neighbors in order to assist those who can organize, for every Secular Union, though distant, stands as a help to each individual Secularist in the entire nation. You say there are no Freethinkers in your neighborhood! Then that is your fault! What are you doing? You can make Freethinkers without shouting your opinions from the house-tops.

Let us approach the work of this Congress with the determination and gravity which the situation demands, for the business before us is not only fraught with greatest import to the American Secular Union, but to the welfare and future of the race. Let us so act that Pittsburgh may be proud that it has held this Congress.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

Dr. Foote moved that the Secretary's report be adopted. Mr. A. B. Bradford wanted it discussed, and moved that it be laid on the table, saying that perhaps all is not gold that glitters. Mr. Stevens replied, and the report was adopted.

Friday evening Vice-President Watts presided. D. G. Crow, of the Indian Territory, and Dr. Juliet Severance made speeches, followed by a few words from Lucy N. Colman. Mr. Crow is a new comer on the lecture platform, and, suffering from the embarrassment of that circumstance, did not do justice to himself. He has a good presence and voice, is witty and learned, and when he learns how to build a lecture with a spinal column running through it, will be an extremely interesting speaker. Dr. Severance's subject was, "Dangers to American Liberty." The doctor is always brilliant, forcible, and charming, and almost converted the audience to her rather pessimistic views. Mrs. Colman, however, who has been in the thick of the Reform warfare for a generation and a half, reassured us by affirming that things were better now than forty-five years ago, and would probably be better still in a few years more. Mrs. Colman is a wonder. Over seventy years of age, she preserves much of her youthful strength and all of her mid-life mental vigor. She is the center of attraction at the hotel, and around her in the parlors is always a group of eager listeners. The reporters follow her and the Congress gives heed to her words. She is an Elizur Wright of the other sex, and the delegates referred to her as the Mother of Liberalism. Chairman Watts also made a brief address at the close of Mrs. Colman's remarks.

Saturday morning the Committee on Rules and Resolutions reported the following:

Your Committee on Rules beg leave to report that they concur in the hours for assembling in business and public sessions as printed in the program. That the morning sessions shall adjourn at 1 P.M., if not sooner. That when several topics are set down for discussion the time shall be so divided as to include each subject, so that all business shall receive attention. Five minutes should be allowed each speaker in the discussion, and previous to the expiration of the time the chair shall announce that in ten minutes the final vote must be taken.

Your committee also recommend that all resolutions be referred to the proper committee without debate.

The rules were adopted. The Committee also reported the following, after remarks by Mr. Anthony Barker, Dr. Severance, Professor Crow, Charles Watts, Mrs. Colman, Simeon Nixon, Mr. Silver, A. Cuthbert, Dr. Foote, Jr., and J. A. Spence:

Resolved, That the best means to further the agitation for the taxation of church property is to secure the correct figures in every community as a solid basis for agitation, so that the public may know the extent of this outrage, and we earnestly urge upon all Secularists, individually and collectivly, to see that, through their personal influence on officials in their neighborhood, this information is obtained and forwarded to the Secretary.

After Anthony Barker, E. A. Stevens, Simeon Nixon, and Mr. Silver had spoken to the subjoined resolution, it also was passed:

Resolved, That as a means to prevent the paying of money to educational institutions of a sectarian character, we utilize the public press in protest against it, and the courts in such states where it is done in defiance of the laws.

On the Girard College question the Congress adopted this resolution, after hearing brief speeches by Messrs. Bradford, Bell, Foote, Cuthbert, Stevens, Nixon, and Mesdames Colman and Freeman:

Resolved, That we request our fellow-member Judge Westbrook to make to the Board of Directors of the American Secular Union a brief report on the status of affairs as to Girard College, and to suggest, if possible, a practical method that might be made use of to reform the abuse of Christian domination, and to restore this institution to conformity with the expressed purposes and wishes of the founder, Stephen Girard.

In relation to the proposed memorial to the late Courtlandt Palmer, the following was adopted:

Resolved, That the Board of Directors are hereby instructed to endeavor to secure for publication by the Union the late Courtlandt Palmer's "Aristocracy of Freethought," Ingersoll's Oration, and such other tributes as hav been given in memory of our lamented President, to form a memorial pamphlet.

The Committee on Credentials reported a few additional names. The Auditing Committee, to whom was referred the charges made by Charles Eckhard against President Putnam, reported this, which was adopted unanimously and enthusiastically:

The auditing committee, appointed by this Congress to examin Samuel P. Putnam's report. 1885 and 1886, of the finances of the American Secular Union, are unable to find, after close examination of said report as published in the New York TRUTH SEEKER of December 4, 1886, anything wrong or irregular about it. We find that said report was adopted by the Board of Directors and signed by Daniel E. Ryan, Chairman of the Auditing Committee. As Mr. Putnam has been accused of misappropriating certain funds belonging to the Union at the time, or about the time, his report was made, it seems to us that that was the proper

The Ten Commandments.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: If the Ten Commandments read in Christian churches every Sunday are in any degree obligatory because the Lord spoke them unto Moses, are not the following ten commandments equally obligatory, for precisely the same reason?

1. "I am the Lord thy God" (Ex. xx, 2), "a consuming fire, even a jealous God" (Deut. iv, 24). "I change not" (Mal. iii, 6). "I make peace and I create evil" (Isa. xlv, 7), "visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation" (Ex. xx, 5). "I kill and I make alive; I wound and I heal: neither is there any can deliver out of my hand. . . . If I whet my glittering sword and mine hand takes hold on judgment, I will render vengeance to mine enemies and will reward them that hate me. I will make mine arrows drunk with blood and my sword shall devour flesh" (Deut. xxxii, 39). "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might" (Deut. vi, 5).

2. "The first of the first-fruits of thy land thou shalt bring into the house of the Lord thy God" (Ex. xxiii, 18). "He that sacrificeth unto any god save unto the Lord only, he shall be utterly destroyed" (Ex. xxii, 20).

3. "No devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the Lord, of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be redeemed; every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord. None devoted which shall be devoted of men shall be redeemed, but shall surely be put to death" (Lev. xxvii, 28, 29).

4. "If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers; thou shalt not consent unto him nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare him, neither shalt thou conceal him; but thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hand of all the people. And thou shalt stone him with stones that he die" (Deut. xiii, 6, 10).

5. "A man, also, or woman, that hath a familiar spirit, or that is a wizard, shall surely be put to death. They shall stone them with stones; their blood shall be upon them" (Lev. xx, 27).

6. "And he that blasphemeth the name of the Lord, he shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him, as well the stranger as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the Lord, shall be put to death" (Lev. xxiv, 16).

7. "Both thy bondmen, and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt hav, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy and of their families that are with you, . . . and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen forever" (Lev. xxv, 44, 46).

8. "And if a man hav a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, and that, when they hav chastened him, will not hearken unto them; then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city, and unto the gates of his place; and all the men of that city shall stone him with stones that he die" (Deut. xxi, 18, 19, 21).

9. "Ye shall keep the Sabbath; for it is holy unto you; every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death: for whosoever doeth any work therein that soul shall be cut off from among his people. Six days may work be done; but in the Sabbath is the Sabbath of rest, holy to the Lord; whosoever doeth any work in the Sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death" (Ex. xxxi, 14, 15).

10. "The Lord thy God hath commanded thee to do these statutes and judgments; thou shalt therefore keep and do them with all thine heart and with all thy soul" (Deut. xxvi, 16). "But it shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all his commandments; that all these curses shall come upon thee and overtake thee. Cursed shalt thou be in the city, and cursed shalt thou be in the field. Cursed shall be thy basket and thy store. Cursed shall be the fruit of thy body and the fruit of thy land. Cursed shalt thou be when thou comest in, and cursed shalt thou be when thou goest out. The Lord shall make the pestilence cleave unto thee until he hav consumed thee. The Lord shall smite thee with a consumption, and with a fever, and with an inflammation, and with an extreme burning, and with the sword, and with blasting, and with mildew; and they shall pursue thee until thou perish. And thy heaven that is over thy head shall be brass, and the earth that is under thee shall be iron. The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust; from heaven shall it come down upon thee until thou be destroyed. And thy carcass shall be meat unto all fowls of the air, and unto the beasts of the earth, and no man shall fray them away. Thou shalt betroth a wife, and another shall marry her. Thy sons and thy daughters shall be given unto another people, and thine eyes shall look and fail with longing for them all the day long, for they shall go into captivity. Thou shalt serve thine enemies which the Lord shall send against thee in hunger, and in thirst, and in nakedness, and in want of all things; and he shall put a yoke of iron upon thy neck, until he hav destroyed thee. And the Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, and he shall besiege in thy gates, throughout all thy land which the Lord thy God hath given thee. And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons and of thy daughters which the Lord thy God hath given thee, in the siege and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee, so that the man that is tender among you and very delicate, his eye shall be evil toward his brother, and toward the wife of his bosom, and toward the remnant of his children, which he shall leave; so that he shall not giv to any of them of the flesh of his children, whom he shall eat. The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not venture to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness, her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her bosom, and toward her daughter, and toward her son, and toward her young children; for she shall eat them secretly, for want of all things. In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even! and at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning! for the fear of thine heart wherewith thou shalt fear, and for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see. If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of the law that are written in this book that thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, The Lord Thy God" (Deut. xxviii).

McArthur to Mrs. Slenker.

It is said that "an open confession is good for the soul," and as Mrs. Slenker admits that from "inheritance and environment" she may hav become "rather dogmatic and dictatorial in speech," peace once more reigns supreme.

She acquiesces in all I claimed. I am the most peaceful fellow in the world, when I hav my own way.

I plead guilty to having used the term "no possibility" instead of "no probability." There is no excuse for my blunder. The article was written in pencil, on a Sunday immediately after a long and exhausting ride from New York, and I did not hav time to review it.

So, if it be pleasant news for the lady, she is readmitted as a contestant.

But to be serious. There is nothing in Mrs. Slenker's letter, nor in fact in any article I hav seen since this controversy began, that requires consideration.

There are doubts. But everyone is entitled to doubt that which seems improbable.

But it should be remembered that, all else being equal, the evidence of one who has seen has more weight than the evidences of a thousand who hav not seen.

The question is still open for discussion, not to combat doubts, not to confirm preëxisting beliefs or disbeliefs, but to determin from a scientific and philosophic standpoint the truth or falsity of the Spiritual phenomena.

And now that Mrs. Slenker has set herself right on the question between us, I regret seeing her take another misstep, one, if possible, far less excusable than the other. I refer to the matter of Dr. J. B. Bouton—Dr. Bouton, the self-confessed trickster.

Mrs. Slenker, in her review of his book, The Truth Seeker, page 606, says:

> While I cannot approve of the deception practiced by the doctor and his confederates, yet in accordance with the theory of making the most and the best of what is, I believe in utilizing to the utmost the information and record of experience thus given to the world.

Pshaw! Mrs. Slenker, how can you utilize the information of a liar? What value to you or anyone is the experience of a trickster? What is the difference between a self-confessed smircher of character, the godly Lambert, and the self-confessed trickster, the ungodly Bouton?

You hav admitted that a small part of the phenomena are real, are genuin, and yet you commend a trickster, if not for his method itself, at least by an open declaration of an intention to utilize his admissions.

Is this fair? Is it honest? Is it just to yourself and your correspondents?

I am in receipt of a letter from San Francisco. It is from a pronounced Materialist, but one who is at least as honest as he expects his source of information to be. In it he says:

> I am getting interested in this question (Spiritual phenomena), and would like to bring it to the test. When I was at ——'s house, I met an old lady just leaving and in tears. She had had a séance, and had received a message, so she believed, from a dear daughter. I could not help feeling that if mediumship were a humbug, a man who would work on the emotions in that way deserved the execration of everybody.

So, my dear Mrs. Slenker, never mind this Dr. Bouton, nor the note-shaver either. Their experiences, the result of trickery, can hav no weight with honest people—with people looking for an honest solution for honest doubts.

Come out openly on your own platform, and if I cannot, another and more competent Spiritualist will meet you.

McArthur.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

Pasco, Wash. Terr., Sept. 2, 3.—This is a railroad junction in the midst of a sandy, sagebrush desert—the most dreary, forlorn place to a new-comer conceivable. Yet with plenty of water vegetation will doubtless become luxuriant. I was made welcome by J. W. O'Keefe, the auditor of the county, who is full of hope and enthusiasm as to the great merits and possible future of the town. He is a genial, kindly-hearted, manly man. His home is the abode of love, with the only real trinity, husband, wife, and child. Even in this wretched sand desert, with the thermometer declaring it 110° in the shade, and the only relief a sandstorm, which comes up suddenly and ruthlessly smothers everything with fine sand, love makes all roseate.

It was too dreadfully sultry to attempt an afternoon lecture. The people would not venture out. In the evening we repaired to the school-house, standing in solitary dignity alone about half a mile from the depot. It is a large, commodious building, and was filled with eager listeners. The intolerable heat necessitated opening doors and windows, and all the big bugs of the prairie came to interview the lecturer. They crawled down my neck, flew into my ears, burrowed into my hair; they came in swarms, attracted by the lamp on the desk. When making an impressiv gesture, the grace and poetry of motion is somewhat marred by sudden dives between neck and shirt-collar after a big, black, hard-shelled bug with long prickly legs who is trying to dig a hole in one's diaphragm. It does not conduce to serenity while exposing the fallacies of theology to hav to make frantic endeavors to disentangle the legs of bugs twisted in one's hair or foil their mad attempts to enter one's ears. But I did not mind a little thing like that, for I had a very large and intelligent audience who were deeply interested in my subject and oblivious of my sufferings. At the second lecture the intense heat had somewhat abated, but the bugs put in their appearance just the same; despite the great slaughter of the night before, there seemed no decrease of their numbers.

There are some really good and intelligent Liberals in Pasco, who keep good Brother O'Keefe in countenance, and I hav no fears but that their efforts will insure Liberalism's keeping pace with the future rapid growth of the town.

North Yakima, Wash. Terr., Sept. 4, 5, 6.—This is a railroad-made town, situated between Cascade mountains and Columbia river. Three years ago this was a dreary sagebrush prairie without a hut or a dwelling of any kind; to-day it is a thriving little city. It has been fostered by the Northern Pacific Railroad. The old town of Yakima, three miles and a half south, was flourishing grandly, the adjacent land owned by actual settlers. This left no chance for the railroad officials to make a stake, so they laid out a new town, in which they offered free lots to the business men of Yakima, equal in value and desirability of location to those in the old town, if they would remove buildings. The result was a stampede. The larger stores were cut in two, and then, with the smaller ones, were mounted on rollers and drawn across the prairie by teams of twenty mules. The Bartholet House, quite a large hotel, was moved without interruption of business. Meals were cooked, and all the boarders ate and slept in the building, during its transit. The bank building, with its heavy stone vault and huge iron safes, made the journey with the bank open and all its business transacted as usual during banking hours. Within three months the desolate sand prairie became a thriving town with over one hundred houses, besides its handsome railroad depot, stores, church, etc. Only in the great West do conditions exist that render such things possible. Those who remained in the old town saw it rapidly melt away, and to-day but very little of old Yakima remains. They are now suing the railroad for a promised depot, and are sanguin that should they win they can yet revive the drooping fortunes of the old town.

North Yakima is dreadfully pious, but there are enough of intelligent, enterprising Liberals to leaven the lump. A good impetus was given by the delivery of the three lectures. Though the attendance was not large, the Opera House being only half to two-thirds filled, the lectures started a spirit of investigation, and desire to read Liberal literature, that cannot fail of good results. I obtained a number of new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and sold a large quantity of Liberal pamphlets.

C. B. REYNOLDS

Lecturing in the Lake States.

When at Fairmont, Minn., I received word that the Liberals of Janesville and vicinity had concluded to postpone the lectures, owing to lack of financial help from lukewarm friends. But having a call from the friends of Waterville, I stopped on my route at Smith's Mills, when those stanch Liberals and friends of intellectual liberty, Mr. and Mrs. Crow, and Mr. Mertons, immediately arranged for a lecture Sunday night. Mr. Adams and family, Mr. Twing and family, came from Elysian, and Mr. Richards and others, from Janesville, favored us with their presence, and upon the whole we had a fair audience, considering the size of the place, and that the good deacon of the church called the faithful to prayers that night. At the close of the lecture, the friends of Elysian arranged for a lecture at that place Wednesday, after the close of our engagement at Waterville, Monday and Tuesday nights. The friends of Waterville thought enough of my first lecture to engage me for a series of lectures, so I lectured again Tuesday night; went to Elysian Wednesday; back to Waterville Thursday and Friday nights. At Waterville I find many stanch and true friends. There is Orange Durand and wife, who can tell what Christian liberty in Arkansas means; the Messrs. Brossards, whose hospitality I am now enjoying; then there is Mr. Cowles and wife, Mr. and Mrs. DeForest, Mr. Reynolds, and many others whose names I can not recall. It is needless to say that, as I was the first Liberal lecturer in the place, an intense excitement has been aroused. Christian ire was aroused; prayer-meetings were held hoping to draw the people away from the wicked Infidel lectures, but somehow there seemed to be such a charm about the religion of humanity that a good audience of intelligent, respectable, attentiv people listened to me for four nights. The Christians suggested egging the blasphemer out of town, and the talk savored so strongly of orthodox vengeance that, to save me trouble and danger, my friends, the last two nights, escorted me to and from the hall.

I hav received every courtesy from the Liberals of Minnesota, and much flattering encouragement, and they hav shown a willingness to assist all in their power financially. Upon the whole, my trip into Minnesota has been a pleasant and successful one.

It is with much regret that I leave this beautiful state with its charming lakes scattered promiscuously over the country. But I hav completed my work at present in Minnesota, so start Wednesday, October 3d, for Hannibal, Mo., where I am engaged to speak Friday, October 5th. I am also engaged to speak at Bethany, Mo., and Leon, Iowa. I should like to hav the Liberals of Missouri, Iowa, and Kansas, wishing lectures, address me at Bethany, Mo.

GEO. H. DAWES.

Waterville, Minn., Sept. 29, 1888.

Mr. Underwood On Protection.

Mr. B. F. Underwood, who is well known, not only as a Liberal lecturer, but as recent editor of the Open Court and the Index, has just published a pamphlet entitled, "Sophisms of Protection, and the Importance of Tariff Reduction."

Our high duties are often said to protect labor; but Mr. Underwood shows that only one laborer in thirteen is employed in protected industries, and that for every dollar which is earned by these favored few, their employers make $3 of extra profit out of the tariff. In other words, our tariff does not protect labor, but capital, and this fact was plainly acknowledged when the system was introduced. Mr. Underwood refutes the plea that tariff reduction would bring down wages by bringing up such facts as that labor is paid four times as much in Oregon as in South Carolina, under the same tariff; that wages continue much higher in "free trade England" than in protected Germany; and that the condition of the British laborer has improved greatly since the adoption of a tariff for revenue only. So far as danger of competition by employers of pauper labor in Europe is concerned, we should remember that Mr. Sargent, who makes fifty tons a day of hardware at New Haven, says he could send out four times as much, and sell it anywhere, if he could get free raw material, for more money is really paid in Europe than here for the same quantity and quality of work.

The argument that the tariff has brought down prices for us is shown to be a sophism, by the fact that a similar decline has taken place in Great Britain. Those who would hav our government buy bonds, rather than reduce duties, are reminded that the premium is now exorbitant. The importance of diversifying our industries is acknowledged; but it is argued, from the fact that this has been done successfully in the West, in spite of having no protection against the East, which had many great establishments and much lower wages, that our whole country would be just as well able to dispense with protection against Europe. This conclusion is further justified by the increase of our export of manufactured goods to the Sandwich Islands under ten years of reciprocity, from $450,000 to $3,000,000. It may also be mentioned that Mr. Blaine acknowledges in his "Twenty Years in Congress," the general prosperity of our country under the low tariff of 1846.

Mr. Underwood is particularly successful in showing that, from 1789 to 1816, our tariff was framed with a view to revenue rather than protection; so that Webster was able, in 1824, to ascribe the progress of our manufactures, which had been far more rapid than that of any other nation, to our adherence to the peculiarly American system of low tariffs.

The pamphlet concludes with an appeal "from the standpoint of the highest ethics" for "freedom of labor, untaxed for the enrichment of the employers," and "free exchange of all the products of labor, unshackled by a tariff levied to keep up prices." The style is plain and earnest, and, at the same time, thoroughly dignified and scholarly. The arguments are peculiarly worthy of attention, in view of the warning, given by Mr. David A. Wells, in the New York Weekly Post for September 13th, that if the policy of restricting our manufacturers by the duties on raw materials to the home market, be not speedily abandoned, our power of production will soon increase so far beyond our power of domestic consumption, as to cause suspension of industrial activity and reduction of wages.

The undersigned will take great pleasure in mailing copies of Mr. Underwood's "Address," the "Mills Bill," and similar literature, to any address.

It Is Rotten Authority.

A correspondent in the Kansas City Times one day last week inquires: "What effect hav the research and discovery of the nineteenth century had upon the Bible as an authority?"

To which the Times editor replies: "As an authority on right living its code of morals is unimpaired."

From the very vagueness of the reply it will be seen that this pious editor does not propose to tell the truth, even at the expense of not answering the inquirer at all. But he inadvertently makes an admission, which is that the Bible, as an authority on astronomy, for instance, has played out. Now, here is my point: If the Bible has been found to be incorrect as an authority on astronomy and everything else, except morality, is there not reason for Christians to fear that it may prove incorrect on the all-important subject of morality also?

If a history whose infallibility has been insisted upon for eighteen hundred years has been proved to be false in a single instance, it has somehow lost its infallibility, and how, then, do we know that we are not following a phantom in our morality?

These few queries I leave for Christians to answer, for, as to myself, I hav always contended that he who follows the Bible in his morality is very apt in the near future to precede the sheriff into the county jail.

To giv Freethinkers an idea of the impenetrableness of this pious editor's faith, let me state that to the inquiry as to where Cain obtained his wife, he affirmed to the effect that "her origin had not yet been definitly ascertained." HERMAN TIEDJENS.

The National Establishment of the Christian Religion.

From the American Sentinel.

That amendment to the national Constitution that has been offered by Senator Blair, and which is now pending in Congress, is a singular sort of a document, though hardly any more so than was to be expected in the promotion of the scheme which underlies it, i.e., the establishment of a national religion. The proposed amendment is just about as flatly self-contradictory as any proposition could be. Section 1 reads as follows:

> No state shall ever make or maintain any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

The first sentence of Section 2 reads as follows:

> Each state in this union shall establish and maintain a system of free public schools adequate to the education of all the children living therein, between the ages of six and sixteen years, inclusiv, in the common branches of knowledge, and in virtue, morality, and the principles of the Christian religion.

That is to say, No state shall ever make or maintain a law respecting an establishment of religion; but every state in this Union shall make and maintain laws establishing the principles of the Christian religion. And to make assurance doubly sure, Section 3 declares that—

> The United States shall guaranty to every state, and to the people of every state and of the United States, the support and maintenance of such a system of free public schools as is herein provided.

And that is to say that the United States government pledges itself that every state shall establish and maintain the principles of the Christian religion. This proposed amendment, therefore, at one stroke, establishes Christianity as the national religion, because it declares that every state shall maintain the principles of the Christian religion in the public schools, and the nation is pledged to see that this is done. Therefore there must be a national decision of some kind declaring just what are the principles of the Christian religion. Then when that decision shall hav been made, every state will hav to receive from the nation just those principles of religion which the nation shall hav declared to be the principles of the Christian religion, and which the nation will hav pledged itself shall be taught in the public schools of every state. In other words, the people of the United States will then hav to receive their religion from the government of the United States. Therefore, if Senator Blair's proposed amendment to the national Constitution does not provide for the establishment and maintenance of a national religion, then no religion was ever established or maintained in this world.

But how shall this national decision be made as to what are the principles of the Christian religion? It would seem that the second sentence of Section 2 makes provision for this. It declares that no "instruction or training shall be given in the doctrins, tenets, belief, ceremonials, or observances peculiar to any sect, denomination, organization, or society, being, or claiming to be, religious in its character; nor shall such peculiar doctrins, tenets, belief, ceremonials, or observances, be taught or inculcated in the free public schools."

As therefore no religious tenets, doctrins, or beliefs can be taught in the schools, except such as are common to all denominations of the Christian religion, it will follow inevitably that there shall be officially called a national council of the churches to decide what are the principles common to all, and to establish a national creed, which shall be enforced and inculcated by national power in all the public schools in the United States. And that will be but the establishment of a national religion. And that is exactly what Senator Blair's constitutional amendment assures, so surely as it or anything similar to it shall ever be adopted. And that is what the National Reformers intend shall be.

It was in this way precisely that the thing was worked in the fourth century. Constantine made Christianity the recognized religion of the Roman empire. Then it became at once necessary that there should be an imperial decision as to what form of Christianity should be the imperial religion. To effect this an imperial council was necessary to formulate that phase of Christianity which was common to all. The Council of Nice was convened by imperial command, and an imperial creed was established, which was inforced by imperial power. That establishment of an imperial religion ended only in the imperious despotism of the papacy.

As surely as the complete establishment of the papacy followed and grew out of that imperial recognition of Christianity in the fourth century, just so surely will the complete establishment of a religious despotism after the living likeness of the papacy, follow and grow out of this national recognition of Christianity provided for in the constitutional amendment proposed by Senator Blair, and which is now pending in Congress. Professor Proctor.

B. F. Underwood in the Investigator.

The daily papers which contain columns about the late Prof. Richard A. Proctor are generally silent as to his religious belief. They say that he abandoned "Catholicism," but fail to state the entire truth. Professor Proctor was a Radical Freethinker, an Agnostic. I was acquainted with him personally. I had conversations with him, one fully two hours in length, and corresponded with him from the spring of 1887 until a short time before his death. He had no belief in a personal deity, and none in personal immortality. He regarded the whole system of Christianity in its theological aspects as a system of superstition. He regarded Herbert Spencer as the greatest philosophic thinker of any age. Some time I will giv to the public valued letters from him now in my possession.

The death of Professor Proctor is a calamity which will be felt over a very wide area. He was not only a great astronomer, but a popularizer of science in general. What he saw in the heavens above and in the earth beneath him, he presented in language adapted to the common understanding.

He was personally one of the most companionable men I ever met—strong and sensible, yet amiable, genial, witty, always the perfect gentleman.

From the Independent.

Professor Proctor was one of that very numerous class of men brought up in the Roman Catholic faith, whom the erroneous demands of that church upon the faith of its members hav driven into Infidelity. France and Italy hav more Infidels than Germany, England, or America, for no other reason than that in those countries modern scholarship has had to meet the claims of the predominant Catholic church.

It is hard to make Mr. Underwood's facts agree with the Independent's conclusions. Professor Proctor had no more respect for Protestantism than for Catholicism. In his eyes, both systems were false.

time for his accuser or accusers to bring said charges of misappropriation, and not at this late day. In the absence of any specific or formulated charges, and as his accuser or accusers hav not met him face to face to prove their charges, as he challenged them to do, it seems to us that it would be an act of justice for this Congress to exonerate President Putnam and declare such charges unworthy of belief.

Pittsburgh, Oct. 6, 1888. Auditing Committee. {F. A. Pierce. Mattie A. Freeman. R. G. Smith.

The Saturday afternoon session began by the reading of letters. Charles Bradlaugh wrote:

20 Circus Road, St. John's Wood, London, N. W., Sept. 11, 1888.

E. A. Stevens, Esq., American Secular Union, Dear Sir: It is, unfortunately, quite impossible for me to attend your Twelfth Annual Congress at Pittsburgh. I shall be glad, however, if you will giv my most earnest assurance to the Freethinkers there assembled of my heartiest wishes for the success of their work. I desire to be permitted to tender to the friends of the late Courtlandt Palmer my expression of deep regret and condolence.

It is pleasant to me to be able to think that in the present session of Parliament I hav done something to promote No. 6 in the "Demands" of your platform. I hav been for the last three or four years intending to again visit America, but my work grows each year. In default of seeing you face to face I send you my very warmest greeting across the ocean both in my own name and on behalf of the National Secular Society of which I am the president.

Yours very sincerely, C. Bradlaugh.

James Parton wrote:

Newburyport, Mass., Sept. 16, 1888.

My Dear Secretary: I trust you will hav a full, harmonious, and business-like meeting at Pittsburgh in October. As the present presidential campaign calls our attention to the subject of taxation, I hav thought much of late upon the infinit wrong of taxing a good workingman's home to its full value and letting a ten-million-dollar cathedral go tax-free. That workingman's home is the most sacred and holy thing in the universe. It is also the most important element in the strength and stability of the nation. What is the cathedral? It is the toy of a handful of rich men, contributing nothing to the power of the nation, and nothing to the moral elevation of the people. It can be demonstrated that the cathedrals of Europe, from St. Peter's to York Minster, are a cause of moral injury and mental torpor.

I hope the Congress will discuss carefully the project of suing the Girard College trustees for breach of trust. Where is the money to come from? Are you prepared to spend half a million dollars upon lawyers and court expenses? You will find nearly the whole of Pennsylvania behind those trustees, and Pennsylvania is a large-sized antagonist. It is well to count the cost.

Health and happiness to all the members.

Very truly yours, James Parton.

Horace Seaver wrote for himself and Mr. Mendum:

Paine Memorial, Boston, Oct. 3, 1888.

Friend Stevens: It would be a great satisfaction to my friend Mendum and myself if we were able to attend the Secular Congress which meets next Friday, but I am sorry to say that feeble health and the infirmities of age must prevent. We hope, however, there may be a large attendance, and as you will hav some of our best speakers to assist in presenting important subjects, you will no doubt hav interesting meetings, in which we would be very glad to take part if our circumstances were more favorable. Old soldiers though we are of upward of half a century's warfare in the Secular or Liberal ranks, yet we hav never for a moment lost our interest in the great and good cause of Freedom and Humanity, nor failed to defend and promote it as well as we know how, and our only regret is that we may not be able to work for it much longer, but while we do liv we are sure that we shall not "fly the track." Please read this brief note to the friends present, all of whom we would be glad to take by the hand; but as we may never hav this satisfaction, we send them our best wishes for their health, happiness, prosperity, and long lives. May they always be united, harmonious, and vigilant, and never surrender.

Fraternally, H. Seaver and J. P. Mendum.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton wrote:

To the Officers of the American Secular Union in Convention Assembled, Gentlemen: I regret that it is not in my power to accept an invitation to speak before your association. But the distance between Omaha, where I am for the winter, and Pittsburgh, is too great for such an undertaking.

There are no convocations, however, in which I feel greater interest than in those striving to free the human mind from theological superstitions, more especially as through these woman finds her most grievous bondage.

A gentleman recently asked me the question at a suffrage meeting, "What I thought the greatest barrier in the way of woman's elevation and enfranchisment?" I replied: "The perversion of the religious element in her nature." We know that the religious emotions—reverence for the authority of the unknown and the unknowable—are stronger in the human soul than love of country—than natural affection for family and kindred—than even life itself. And as conscience is a matter of latitude and education, these religious emotions are equally available for unwise as wise purposes.

The history of the race is one long record of individual sacrifice at the supposed pleasure of some invisible powers. And as all forms of religion in all ages and countries hav taught the depravity and subordination of woman, it is not remarkable that in the nineteenth century, under the Jewish and Christian religion, she should believe herself to be what the holy books and the priesthood teach, namely, an afterthought in the creation, the author of sin, who, in collusion with the devil, effected the fall of man, and hence cursed of God. Marriage was made for her a condition of slavery, and maternity a period of torment and peril. "In sorrow shalt thou bring forth thy children. Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee."

"Thus saith the Lord" has ever been a talisman by which tyrants hav held the masses in subjection, and woman in her unbounded faith has ever been the surest victim. The Jew in his ritual on each returning Sabbath day thanks the Lord that he was not born a woman, while the woman says: "I thank thee, O Lord, that I am what I am according to thy holy will!"

We cannot estimate the insidious influence of these words on the character of Jewish womanhood. The Pentateuch abounds with similar sentiments; a contempt is continually expressed for everything female in animal life, woman being considered too unclean to take part in the religious feasts and sacrifices.

In binding up all these Jewish records with the New Testament under the title, holy scriptures, Christianity indorses the Jewish idea of womanhood. In fact, in Paul's epistles on marriage and the duties of wives, the position of woman in the new dispensation is still one of subjection.

As all these scriptural lessons teaching the slavery of woman are echoed and reëchoed in every pulpit in our land, and as ecclesiastical law and church disciplin are all based on the idea of woman's divinely ordained subjection to man, how can she, believing such fallacies, hav sufficient self-respect to demand an equal share in all the blessings and opportunities of life?

The church having made woman a bondslave through the strongest feelings of her nature, I hope no members of the American Secular Union propose to keep her in her present condition lest if enfranchised she should place barriers in the way of man's religious freedom.

Do not lose sight, gentlemen, of the fact that the influence of the vast majority of women is in this direction now. It guards every cradle and fireside, and the prejudices of early education cling to us through life. It is this influence that limits the numbers in your association, the readers of your journals, and the audiences in your conventions. Do you hope to change all this by holding woman in her present position, concentrating all her enthusiasm, outside the family, on the church, the blind victim of a morbid conscience and confused speculations of the unknown and the unknowable? Surely not. If you would realize a higher form of religion, you must first broaden the horizon of woman's thought, and giv her an activ interest in all the practical affairs of life. Open to her all advantages for thorough education, and inspire her with some self-respect by recognizing woman as an equal factor in the civilization of the nineteenth century.

You cannot, for your own personal love of power, hold woman as a lawful subject, and then require her, in the emergencies of life, to assume the responsibilities of a sovereign.

It is pusillanimous, to the last degree, after all the oppression woman has endured through the centuries, for Liberal thinkers in the free religious associations of this day to deny her one liberty, lest she should use it to their disadvantage. Religious freedom, for the handful of men who ask it, is not of a tithe of the importance that political freedom is for half the people of the nation.

As to the Secular character of our government, that can only be fully established and preserved through the education and elevation of woman. Hence the policy of those interested in the triumph of more Liberal religious ideas lies in the direction of the political emancipation of woman.

The more time and thought she givs to all the great questions involved in the science of government, and to the imperativ duties of this life, the less she will giv to the church and speculations about the future.

Sincerely yours, Elizabeth Cady Stanton.

A great many other letters were also read—from W. F. Jamieson, Mr. Olds, Locust Dale Secular Union, L. K. Washburn, B. F. Underwood, and many others.

These were all congratulatory and cheering, but the sad news also came by letter that J. D Shaw's father lay at the point of death, and consequently the place of his distinguished and splendid son was at his bedside, and not with the Congress in Pittsburgh.

After the reading of the letters, Mr. Marlett spoke of the work of the Young People's Union of Chicago, of which he is president. Following him was W. S. Bell, who addressed the Congress on "Common Sense vs. Superstition." Mr. Bell is the same solid speaker as of old, though he has remained most of the past few years in Chicago, and his lecture, interspersed with witty anecdotes, was received with a good deal of approbation. After the Congress, Mr. Bell started on a lecture tour through Ohio back to Chicago.

Saturday evening the first lecture was by J. H. Burnham on "Organization." Some of the many sensible things that Mr. Burnham said are:

Organization—whatever that is—is the source of all results, whether psychical, physical, social, ethical, or commercial. What the Christian church has done is evidence of the effectivness of organization. Under the potency of its well-organized forces, it has stood with drawn sword, thumbscrews, racks, and fagots, and has frightened hopeful and promising civilization back into the night of despair. By organization its bony fingers hav throttled the hopes of millions, who would hav given the world civilization such as we now hav a thousand years ago, had it not been for the effectiv organization of ecclesiastical, autocratic despotism. It put out every civilizing ray of light which glimmered in the portentous gloom of ignorance, religion, and superstition. These checks applied to human genius and progress by ecclesiastical organization hav turned the hand on the dial-plate of time back many centuries. The pontiff at Rome, with his well-organized millions, has bid defiance to the world a thousand times, and can do it to-day with impunity. There are no nations whom it can be said are civilized who are not in fear of this one man's power, backed as he is by the most effectiv organization in the world. There is no man living having the same amount of influence in politics, even in this country, as the pontifical desperado who commands two hundred millions of Roman Catholics. It is counter-organization alone of the freemen of modern civilization that contains a promis that the bloody hand of ecclesiastical despotism shall be paralyzed, that freedom of thought shall no longer be throttled. The advocates of human liberty and equal rights may to-day be counted by millions—many millions of the best and bravest of the entire race—and yet these millions are subject to indignities and insult, such as make the blood of civilization boil, from the intellectual paupers who rule over the sacred hosts of imbecility. We may well ask, Why these indignities and insults? Why is it that the friends of the race—the benefactors of all ages—those who hav given us our civilization in spite of the dungeons and the snapping crack of the fagots—why are those so persistently insulted by the baptized and consecrated-bloody-wafer host? The answer is known to friend and foe. We lack in effectiv organization.

The organized hosts of superstition, ignorance, and religion are well-drilled battalions, and organization of the freemen of this republic is the only way to hold at bay or checkmate their despotic forces. Secular and political organization alone can successfully meet these foes of the world's civilization. In 1878 a convention was called to meet at Cincinnati by Robert G. Ingersoll. It met, and was composed of delegates, men and women, in point of ability not paralleled by any convention ever held in the history of this country. When this convention adjourned, the understanding was that another convention would be called in 1880. However, greatly to be regretted, it was not called, and I fear that this mistake allowed the opportunity of twenty-five years, if not more, to slip through our fingers. We cannot be too soon in correcting this blunder. I see no way to carry on this fight for universal mental liberty successfully except through this method—Secular and political organization. Had this convention been called and such action taken, we to-day would not need to ask for recognition—we would be in a position to command it and the votes of three millions of American citizens. I think that such action is the pressing need of the hour, and that it is the imperativ duty of the American Secular Union to inaugurate this movement as soon as possible. With these weapons we can fight this enemy of the world's civilization.

We hav the material out of which to create an army of freemen that will do the needed work. Our workers are divided into three classes: First, agitators—those that work up out of the mines of awakening public feeling the thought, the crude material upon which all depends. The second class are the organizers. They, with skilled hands, take up this immense wealth, the result of the labor of the first class, and put the parts together in their proper shape, so that the third class, administrators, come along and take the material thus well organized and run the organization in the interest indicated.

Let our organization be made effectiv in the way that we hav suggested. Let the Liberal public understand that we hav come to stay, that we mean business, and that we are the persistent foes of this despotic ecclesiastical power for all time. The Liberal public will lend us its aid in financial support and in advancing our cause at the polls as soon as we hav redeemed the mistakes which we hav made. Organize every state as soon and as fast as possible, and then when we meet in convention with a thousand delegates we shall not need to ask for recognition; our position will command it.

Mr. Burnham was followed by Mrs. Freeman on "Cross and Crown." Mrs. Freeman has a musical ring to her voice—is a kind of an L. K. Washburn in soprano—and she takes her audiences up many flights of poetic and pathetic stairways—stairways trimmed and decorated and fretted and beautiful, but landing at last in a solid superstructure of common sense and fact. She is one of the most graceful of our female orators in the presentation of subjects.

SUNDAY.

Sunday morning, when the delegates assembled, they did not know but that nightfall might see all the speakers in Pittsburgh's jail. The Press of the previous evening contained this:

The utterances of speakers at the Secularists' Congress hav become so freighted with language that is in gross violation of the laws of the land and abhorrently blasphemous in the ears of the masses, that it has become a question whether the authorities should interfere to compel the representativs of the National Union here to confine themselvs to what is even commonly considered decency of speech, or bring their proceedings to a summary close. The matter was brought to the attention of the Law and Order Society yesterday afternoon in the following manner, the note being addressed to Captain Wishart:

Saturday, Noon.

Captain: Mr. Dean telephones me that a blasphemous meeting is reported as being in progress in Lafayette Hall. Will you proceed to investigate, and if the law is violated act accordingly?

J. H. W.

The Captain Wishart to whom this belligerent note was sent is the head of the Law and Order Society, an organization of Protestants who hav united to make Sunday in Pittsburgh the most miserable of all days in the week. Nothing can be legally sold—not even grocery, candy, or cigar stores can be kept open. Everybody must lay in on Saturday night the solid and liquid refreshment for the following day. The improvident man who neglects to provide his spiritual food from the saloon on Saturday must take it on Sunday from the churches, or not at all. One of the delegates who likes a good cigar, and came originally from a country where Sunday is not much of a day, and has lived ever since near New York, was the most disgusted person in the city. The Editorial Reporter met him on Sunday morning walking up and down in front of the hotel, and swearing earnestly. He had had his breakfast but not his cigar. He approached the Editorial Reporter and unbosomed himself. His language will not do to print. All at once a thought hit him, and he went plunging upstairs to his room, and punched the button of the electric bell till it went out of sight. When the bellboy made his appearance he shouted: "Bring me a cigar!" It came at once. And thus did ingenuity on the part of the guest and hypocrisy on the part of the hotelkeeper triumph over Pittsburgh puritanism. When Mr. Putnam was asking the audience for a Campaign Fund, that man's name went down for $50, and he wants it all applied to repealing Sunday laws.

This state of affairs is due to the Law and Order Society of Pittsburgh. Pennsylvania has a splendid blasphemy law whereby any person "who shall willfully, premeditatedly, and despitefully blaspheme or speak loosely and profanely of Almighty God, Christ Jesus, the Holy Spirit, or the scriptures of truth," may be made to pay one hundred dollars, and be confined three months in jail. Profane swearing in Pennsylvania costs anybody over sixteen years of age sixty-seven cents per swear. The tariff is intended to be prohibitory, but it is not, and if the constable could hav heard the delegates who wanted cigars on Sunday morning he might hav captured cash enough to pay the bills of the state for several years. The Sunday laws are voluminous, rigorous, and all-inclusiv. The penalties range from ten shillings to three hundred dollars and the stocks. The phraseology of the law indicates its colonial origin, when the ministers ran things generally. But the Pittsburgh clergy are not much behind their ancestors, and are enforcing these laws with a rigidity that would hav made Cotton Mather rejoice, though Wm. Penn would hav protested with all the force of his gentle Quaker nature. In fact, the Pittsburgh reverends drive the knife clear up to the hilt into the ungodly who want to waste money on Sunday, and their success in enforcing the Sunday law probably induced the Christian crank "J. H. W." to appeal to Captain Wishart to suppress the blasphemers. But Captain W. failed to materialize at Lafayette Hall, and the delegates slept in peace at their various hotels instead of wrestling with the vermin of a police station-house.

This Sunday terrorization will probably not last longer than a year or two. When the legislature next assembles at Harrisburg a vigorous attempt will be made to modify the law. It ought to be repealed, but probably the Christians will prevent things going as far as that. But this year, on Sundays, the denizens of Pennsylvania cities are slaves of the Protestant church.

The first business before the Union, Sunday morning, was the final report of the Committee on Credentials, as the program contemplated the election of officers. The Committee reported the additional names of G. Babson, of Seward, Neb., N. Eggleston, of Aurora, O., J. O. Bentley, of Philadelphia, and two or three others whose names were not heard by the Reporter. Altogether, fifty-two persons were reported as entitled to vote. The decision regarding annual members had simplified matters, and a motion from the Pittsburghers to admit proxies was voted down. Both sides had proxies, but neither knew just how many the other side had, though it is probable that the Pittsburghers had the most, as their campaign had been quietly going on for several months, and they had resorted to the usual political methods. No delegates were pledged to Mr. Stevens for secretary, but quite a number were for Mr. Hoover. Delegates on arriving at Pittsburgh were presented with cards like this:

For Secretary
AMERICAN SECULAR UNION,
HARRY HOOVER,
Pittsburgh.

Mr. Hoover's ballots had been prepared at a printing office, and the most of the delegates had received at their homes letters asking them to vote for Mr. Hoover. Mr. Stevens's advocate was a silent one—his Record, and the unwritten law that a tried officer should not be displaced without good cause. His friends also bestirred themselvs, and on Friday and Saturday the war was a merry one. It is to be regretted that it was not a better-natured one.

Incidentally the presidency of the Union was dragged into the controversy. Mr. Putnam had positivly declined to be reëlected, though he could hav won the prize with ease, and with the exception of the friends of Mr. Hoover, scarcely a delegate knew who he really desired for the office. Mr. Hoover's friends had decided to run J. E. Remsburg, hoping, as the other side alleged, that his popularity would pull Mr. Hoover through. At any rate, they offered to throw him over, and vote for Mr. Stevens for President if the others would vote for Mr. Hoover. The proposition was declined.

The nominating committee made a majority report as follows:

For President:
JUDGE R. B. WESTBROOK, of Philadelphia.

A minority report was read, substituting the names of J. E. Remsburg and Harry Hoover for President and Secretary respectivly. The Secretary was instructed by the Congress to cast a ballot electing all officers who were not opposed. A motion to postpone the election of President and Secretary was lost. The first ballot resulted as follows:

R. B. Westbrook.....22
J. E. Remsburg.....21
J. H. Burnham.....5
S. P. Putnam.....2

No election. The two lowest candidates were then dropped and a second vote was taken. Result:

R. B. Westbrook.....26
J. E. Remsburg.....22

Judge Westbrook was declared elected, and on motion of one of his opponents the election was made unanimous. It was a peculiar vote for this office. Under other circumstances either gentleman would hav had every vote in the Congress, and the applause which followed Judge Westbrook's unanimous election was as hearty and sincere as though no one had voted any other way. There was really no one opposed to him except because of the disputed secretaryship, and no one opposed to Mr. Remsburg except for the same reason, and the further one that it was deemed best by the nominating committee to put no lecturers or people connected with Liberal papers in office, in order that the jealousy existing between some of these might hav no meat to feed upon.

Judge Westbrook, who was at home unconscious of the honor done him, was notified by telegraph. Later in the affairs of the Congress his acceptance was telegraphed, as follows:

THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION: Regarding the American Secular Union as an organization for the protection and promotion of the principle implied in its name, and not for the advancement of any dogma of religious belief or disbelief, I cordially accept its presidency unanimously tendered to me, and pledge myself to resist all encroachments of sacerdotalism, whether papal or puritan. R. B. WESTBROOK.

The election of Judge Westbrook had practically decided the secretaryship, and before the vote for that office was taken Charles Watts gave Mr. Hoover an opportunity to gracefully withdraw by asking the candidates whether in the event of their election they would serve. The opportunity was not embraced, and a ballot was ordered. Following some remarks from the platform by the presiding officer an acrimonious discussion sprung up, cut short, however, by a demand from the delegates for the voting to proceed. The first ballot resulted as follows:

E. A. Stevens.....29
Harry Hoover.....18

Mr. Stevens was declared elected, and the people set about the work of restoring harmony. Nothing was said by the victors to hurt the feelings of the other side, and the Pittsburghers magnanimously forgave their opponents.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Chairman of the Committee on Rules and Resolutions, submitted his report:

RESOLUTIONS OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION, AT ANNUAL CONGRESS OF OCT. 5-8, 1888, AT PITTSBURGH, PA.

The American Secular Union, in Congress assembled, reaffirms its inflexible determination to practicalize that priceless boon, mental freedom, which the framers of our Constitution established as the radical principle of our republic, and hereby declares itself the unalterable foe of all theological schemes to subvert our liberties, which are now not only insidiously sapping away our freedom, but defiantly plundering the taxpayers.

The American Secular Union stands as the solitary representativ of the plain, bold, simple declaration of Abraham Lincoln, "A government of the people, by the people, and for the people," as against a government ruled by a relentless God—in short, it stands as the representativ of the American Idea.

WHEREAS, We view with alarm the persistent reactionary and revolutionary attitude of the various ecclesiastical bodies to gain greater control of the state and to sweep away the very corner-stone of American independence by advocating the recognition of God in our form of government, which would practically put an end to religious freedom; and

WHEREAS, Lands and monev are annually granted to sectarian institutions; public offices in many states are open only to those who will, by oath, acknowledge the reigning superstition; Sunday laws are being "religiously" enforced in nearly every state; Bible-reading, prayer, and other religious exercises are carried on in the public schools; Congress and legislatures are consecrated to plunder by hypocritical prayers which cost the country at least $50,000 a year; fast days and thanksgivings are ordained by governments, state and federal; Indians are parceled out to religious sects for instruction; prisoners in jails and children in Houses of Refuge are delivered to the various denominations to be paid for from state funds and guarded by state and municipal police; postal laws are enacted, at the suggestion of church coteries, limiting the liberty of the people and the press and enforced by agents who are in no way responsible to the public at large: therefore,

Resolved, That as Freethinkers we hav reason to feel ourselvs direct heirs of the heroic fathers who fought to overthrow the iniquities of a "God's anointed" ruler, and veritable heritors of those who founded a state without a church; that as our Constitution aimed at complete secularization, the American Secular Union should be careful to preserve and eager to extend that principle, so that the foundations of our national welfare mav be fully assured.

Resolved, That we call upon every man and woman who believes in intellectual freedom to aid in breaking mental chains; everyone who aspires to establish happiness here should assist in overthrowing the power of bigotry and superstition in the state, which the adoption of our Nine Demands only can accomplish.

Resolved, That we pledge ourselvs during the coming year to endeavor to gather into harmonious relations the Liberals of every shade; to disregard past differences, and determin that one grand, inspiring purpose shall animate us—the advancement of our second Declaration of Independence, nor will we falter in carrying out the desire of President Grant to "keep the church and state forever separate" till our efforts are crowned with complete success.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Convention that woman is the peer of man, and no invidious distinctions shall be made which deny to her the right to be man's competitor for any position to which he is eligible.

Resolved, That we recognize in the prosecution of Messrs. Walker and Harman, of Valley Falls, Kan., under the United States postal laws, on a "constructiv charge" of mailing obscene literature, another instance of an attempt to pervert the laws to the purposes of Christian persecution; that we renew our protests against this method of assault upon the Liberal press; that we cannot believe that those who hav been instrumental in instituting this and similar persecutions hav any honest desire to suppress real obscenity, but that their object is to cripple Freethought and destroy its press by misconstruction of a law which they hav heretofore more than once prostituted to their service.

Resolved, That free speech, free press, and free mails must be protected against such insidious attacks; that we should contest every inch of ground in this field and take up the battle whenever and wherever the issue is forced upon us; and that, therefore, we tender Messrs. Walker and Harman our sympathy and support, and urge all friends of freedom to aid substantially in their defense against an outrageously unjust and "constructiv" charge of misdemeanor.

Resolved, That we accept the congratulations and hearty sympathy expressed by the Secularists of Canada in convention assembled at Toronto, Sept. 16, 1888, conveyed to us by Mr. Charles Watts. That we highly esteem the value of this gentleman's services in the United States, and assure our Canadian comrades that we rejoice in their good work in behalf of the cause of Secularism, for we are sure that the achievements of either organization are bound to extend over the border and forward the purposes of both.

Resolved, That we tender England's Freethought champion, Charles Bradlaugh, our hearty congratulations on his final triumph in the adoption of the Oaths bill by the British Parliament, and gratefully acknowledge his words of cheer to the American Secular Union.

Mrs. Colman spoke to the Harman and Walker resolution, after which the report was adopted and the committee continued. Mr. Hoover offered a resolution censuring a newspaper of Pittsburgh which had printed a most ridiculous editorial about the Freethinkers. It was referred to Committee on Resolutions.

Miss Voltairine de Cleyre was expected to speak Sunday afternoon, but a sore throat contracted by exposure (it rained about all the time during the Congress) prevented. The audience assembled early, and the session was marked by harmony. The factions had had their fight, the defeated were not sullen, the victors concealed, if they felt, any jubilant spirit, and brotherly affection seemed to take the place of the previous bitter determination of all to hav their own way. The illness of Miss De Cleyre was very deeply regretted, as an audience of four or five hundred had assembled to hear her poetic and witty sentiments. Mr Stevens, however, proved as good a substitute as a man can be for a woman, and his speech on "Romish Rubbish" was attentivly and appreciativly listened to. The fight going on in Pittsburgh over the public school question gave the exposer of Romanism a great advantage with the audience. Romanism is not popular with the average Pittsburgher just at present, though the city is permeated and surrounded with Romish churches, church members, and church institutions. Mr. Stevens's catalog of the relics of Romanism was received with laughter, and the exposure of the idolatrous theology of Rome was heartily enjoyed.

After the address, Dr. Foote as Chairman of the Committee on Resolutions offered this:

Resolved, That we indorse the work and methods of our Secretary during the past year, Mr. E. A. Stevens, and that we can only recommend him to continue boldly and persistently in the same paths, while we urge the members of the Union and its well-wishers everywhere to furnish the sinews of war, that our coming year may record even more practical work and success than the past year.

Resolved, That we call upon the Liberal public or Secularists of the United States to subscribe the sum of three thousand dollars for the next year's work; one thousand for our Secretary, and two thousand for running expenses, literary propaganda, and aggressiv operations, such as an effort to restore Girard College to the standard indicated by the will of its founder.

The resolutions were adopted, and Mr. Putnam came forward and asked the people to contribute for the next year's Campaign Fund. The appeal was responded to generously. Postal cards from all over the country, sent out by the secretary before the Congress, were read, and the total contributions footed up over $1,700. Mr. Stevens will acknowledge the same next week in his "Roll of Honor." Some $262 cash was paid in.

After this collection the audience called loudly for Juliet Severance, who was forced to come forward and make a speech. She said that reforms must go through three stages—ridicule, discussion, and adoption. Our cause in some places was in the first and FOSSIL, ORE., Sept. 18, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $5 for two new subscribers that I hav got for the best paper I hav ever seen printed—THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will do the best I can for your paper. I hav very little time to run around to hunt up subscribers, for I hav lots of work to do, but I read my paper and pass it around, and find plenty that will read it. Yours for truth and liberty, W. N. PUTNAM.

TYNGSBORO, MASS., Sept. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2, which has got to go because THE TRUTH SEEKER has got to come. There must hav been something mighty good in those late back numbers I hav missed, or they would not hav gone so soon out of print. Print more hereafter.

Herewith is also another of my contributions for you, "Guild's Dream." Hope you will not find it too dreary. The dream was real, though it was really a dream.

JOHN P. GUILD.

ONONDAGA HILL, N. Y., Sept. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for four months. I am a man who has felt an antipathy for religion since earliest childhood. If a man has that feeling he is sure to grow wiser as he livs, for he looks to no one to lift him into a heaven, therefore he must work to lift himself, and to do this he must become athletic in limb, body, and brain. Therefore in the gymnasiums of muscular activity I hav done so. Yours heart and brain in the war against every superstition that fetters the mind of man,

CHARLES E. BOYNTON, B.S., M.D.,
Medical Superintendent of Onondaga County-house and Insane Asylum.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., Sept. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Is it not disgusting to hear the credulous Christian trying to sustain the erroneous idea that Christianity is the only goodness, justice, moral virtue, science, and all prosperity, and that we are indebted to Christianity as the only safeguard to our welfare and happiness in this and the next world? Is there no righteousness, justice, or moral virtue without Christianity? I pity those under the delusion. The Christians hav denied all discoveries, and the author has invariably been burnt alive, and when they could not suppress an invention any longer, then they claimed it as of their own invention if they could. But history speaks of their deeds, and a long list of roasted victims. I also believe in a trinity—God, the father, Voltaire; the Son, Paine, and the Holy Ghost, Robert G. Ingersoll. J. P. MULLER.

JOPLIN, MO., Sept. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav carefully read Col. J. R. Kelso's last work, "The Universe Analyzed," sent me from your office, and look upon it as the most fascinating, as well as the most philosophical, of all his works.

His reasoning to disprove the necessity of a creator, as well as to show the absurdity of that hypothesis, seems unanswerable. In his lecture on the "Formation and Dissolution of Worlds," without mentioning the nebular hypothesis by name, he givs the clearest exposition of it that it has ever been my good fortune to read by any author.

His lecture on the "Origin, Evolution, and Destiny of Man," though equally interesting, is not, perhaps, equally conclusiv, and if our highest ideal of a philosophical writer is that he shall "hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may," we may feel a regret that the colonel occasionally throws a chip at some particularly offensiv object.

Considering the size of the book, it contains a vast amount of fresh and vigorous thought; it explores fields not marked by the footprints of any predecessor, and its style renders it in the highest degree entertaining. R. S. KELSO, M.D.

LINCOLN, NEB., Sept. 10, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. S. P. Putnam delivered two very interesting lectures here yesterday. Despite the "heroic" efforts of the Christians to prevent us having the lecture at all, and the nefarious methods used by them to induce people not to attend the lecture, we had an audience of two hundred in the afternoon and two hundred and fifty in the evening; and I believe there was more intellect in our audience than in all the churches in the city combined. The afternoon theme was, "The American Republic," and a masterly effort it was. In the evening he spoke of "Universal Mental Liberty," and he handled the subject in such a manner that even the most hidebound orthodox deacon could not help being impressed with the beautiful gospel of Freethought. Mr. J. E. Remsburg follows Mr. Putnam in a few weeks, and Mr. Putnam speaks here again October 21st. We now hav about sixty members, and the prospect is good for a regular "boom" this fall and winter, as we hav several influential men interested in the cause, among them the acting mayor of the city.

In the sincere hope that every Liberal society in the country has as bright an outlook as the Lincoln Secular Union, I remain, Fraterna'ly, A. T. GOWE.

VAN BUREN, ARK., Sept. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Slowly, but surely, your valuable paper and publications are gaining a wider publication in this region. We hav just passed through our state election excitement, Monday, the 3d, being election day. Eagle, the nominee of the glorious old Democratic party, is a sky-pilot of the Baptist stripe. In his canvass of the state he opposed every measure that the people need, and hoped to fly into office on the wings of votes whipped into line by the party lash. Dr. Nonvod, an intelligent farmer and physician, who gained his education by the light of a pine-knot, is fairly elected, but the Democratic machine politicians, being in power, hav duly counted him out and Eagle in, and the devout pietymonger will thank God that the state is saved from the rule of the party that dared to oppose the G. O. D. party.

One point which Dr. Nonvod (nominee of the Union Labor party) brought against the G. O. D. party was that the constitution of our state says that nothing shall be exempt from taxation (except, of course, state property), and that the G. O. D. party hav been exempting railroad cuts, embankments, bridges, and tunnels (two-thirds of the track in this part of the state), and church property. Fine property to exempt, to be sure, while the poor "cropper" is forced to pay taxes on the cotton-seed he feeds his cow and the potatoes he eats. Down with such sham government! I hope the coming Congress of the American Secular Union will draft a plank embodying their demands, and try and effect its adoption into the platform of the Union Labor party, the one party that is battling for the common people and not for any one class. I would that every person could be taught that labor is the sole source of wealth, and that the laborer ought to receive a just portion of the wealth produced by him. We need no sky-pilots, railroad kings, landlords, or other privileged classes. Down with all of them!

Yours for justice, HENRY ADDIS.

OXFORD, NOVA SCOTIA, Sept. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find post-office order to renew my subscription to your valuable paper; I cannot do without it.

I hav not seen any correspondence from Oxford lately, so I will giv you a little information regarding the state of affairs here at present. During the past summer God has not been very merciful toward his chosen here as regards weather, it having been the worst season for gathering hay and grain known for some years. In spite of this we hear the members of our three churches and the Salvation Army continually howling thanks for his mercy and loving-kindness.

While strolling round the street the other evening I stood a few moments to listen to the Salvation Army outdoor meeting. One soldier stepped out and said "he thanked God he was saved. That although some people were insuring their lives for $2,000 or $3,000, he had insured his soul and carried the policy with him." Another said, "Yes, and the company never fails." I could not get near enough to get him to show the policy or get the name of the company. But I do not suppose he could hav shown one or proved the existence of the other. A member of one of the churches who was standing by said that same soldier was too religious to be honest.

We had a visit a few weeks back from a Mr. Vaus, an evangelist who did a large business here in the converting line about two years ago. Although he held forth two or three times per day for about a week, this visit was not a great success, either spiritually or financially. Some of the ranting members of our churches and temperance societies are endeavoring to stop the sale of liquor here and hav a Christian law in their favor, but, strange to say, they prosecute the party selling, get him sentenced to jail for a month or two, and on his appeal against the magistrate's decision the same law lets him out in about a fortnight. Thus the saloonkeeper gets the best of it, comes back to sell again, and the Christians howl about it, and occasionally get fighting over it among themselvs, fathers and sons, deacons, etc., all for the glory of God.

There are about eight or ten Freethinkers here, and we hav the Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Secular Thought regularly, and a great number of Freethought books, which we keep continually in circulation.

I would like to see a communication from Brother F. W. Borden and hear how he is getting along, as he slipped away from among us almost as mysteriously as Moses, and we know not where to find him. Wishing you every success, I remain, Yours truly, E. H. SCHURMAN.

KENT, O., Sept. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to ask if there are books of song with both music and words adapted to Secular use? We now hav the one advertised in your columns, but we need a book with new melodies well arranged, with harmony; parts for four verses, with full chorus of animating strains, whereby words appropriate can be sung by the entire society, until the unity of thought and higher emotions of joy will enlarge the spirit of affection, until everyone will feel like the one saying of old, "It is good for me to be here." No new words to be applied to the stale old tunes of orthodoxy, but let "Old Hundred" and "Nearer, My God, to Thee" be laid on the shelf as relics of heathenisms. Our Kent Secular Union meet bi-monthly to recuperate our faculties in a social way, transact a little business, read a few poems, each speak a little piece as he or she may desire. We are glad to think that what is good for ourselvs is good for our wives, and we now hav nearly as many members of the "gentler sex" as of the more stern, and aside from their presence being a benefit socially, we find them of much real worth to our society. Many of them are educated readers and deep thinkers, who hav risen above the dictates of the wily priests, and can denounce superstition and advance the higher and more virtuous thoughts that will help to free their sex from the clutches of the deceiver and would-be destroyer of their liberties.

We hav violin duets, and our grand old pioneer in Freethought, the president, occasionally favors us with a song and violin accompaniment, which adds to the enjoyment of the occasion. Yet we need a book of songs, that all may join in and make the environments ring with joy and happiness. We need sound and appropriate words set to minor chords of song for funeral occasions, so that we shall not hav to borrow such as "Thou art Gone to the Grave," by which to sound the sympathetic chords of farewell to the dead. Every society should be in practice and ready to giv burial in a respectable way to any and all their members and friends of Freethought when such occasion shall require.

The principal attractions in our churches and the cause of good attendance are the beautiful flowers that decorate the rostrum, the well-trained voices in the choir, the nicely dressed audience, and the harmonious peals from the pipe organ that fill the souls of the listeners with such a feeling of satisfaction that, for the time, at least, all ill feelings and animosities of the inner being are forgotten. These, and not the myths and falsities uttered in a senatorial voice by the "administerer of the queer," are what fills our churches on Sundays. Let our Freethinkers organize and hold meetings as often as advisable, laying aside all little differences of opinions, and discuss the more solid and beneficial ideas of human progress in a friendly way, cultivating charity for those who differ from us in opinion, and work together for the good of all concerned. Recite poems, read essays, and unite in singing to the enjoyment of all. Hav a committee appointed to make out a program, giving to each one something to do in making the meetings enjoyable. Educate the children to take part in the exercises by singing and instrumental music, that they may gain confidence, and when more advanced take part in sustaining the higher principles of reform. Educate them in ancient and modern history, that they may be prepared to ward off the blows of paganism and superstition, and the future generations will be able to breathe the air of renovated nature in its purity.

A. D. SWAN.

MARSHFIELD, ORE., Aug. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. C. B. Reynolds has just been here and given us a series of lectures, and doubtless he will tell you how we all appeared to him. I hav often thought how wild and perhaps ignorant the people away in this West must appear to persons just from the East. Mr. Reynolds is very dramatic, Mr. Putnam very poetic, and perhaps they can see some beauties in our wild, weird coast that we fail to see; but the discrepancies in education and culture they can also see.

I cannot say which of these two gentlemen I like best, but rather think Mr. Putnam best for pioneer work and Mr. Reynolds good for advanced Liberals. Mr. Reynolds told me there was harmony now in the Liberal ranks, and that they expect good work at the coming Congress at Pittsburgh. I was glad to hear this, for my husband refused to read almost any paper that he found any fault-finding in—not that he believes that we can any of us be perfect yet awhile; but nothing in the form of organization can work without harmony.

My health has prevented me from reading much lately. I am hardly posted as regards the letters from friends in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I am firm in my Freethought, and do what little I can do to help it succeed. Since we first subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER and my little letter was published I received various Freethought publications, for which I wish here to thank the publishers. We could not subscribe for them all, much as we wished them to succeed. We take six papers, one for every day except Sunday. We hav only one Freethought neighbor in our immediate settlement. All of the publications that were sent to me I sent to some one else after reading them. It is six miles up the river from us to the nearest Freethinker, and about twelve to the settlement farthest up. Brother Reynolds went up on Sunday and gave two lectures and we had a jolly good time. I had heard Mr. Reynolds twice at Marshfield and up Coos river. I enjoyed the beaming faces of his congregation, many of them familiar to me. Some of them were listening to their first Freethought lecture, and I know they enjoyed it just as I enjoyed mine over a year ago. Do not let the coming Congress use money to send lecturers where there are not good, substantial Freethinkers, for I verily believe the result would be a winding-up of some of our lecturers. I hear since Mr. Reynolds left that they even talked of mobbing him at Marshfield; but there is no danger of mobs there. The strongest, best, and most influential men are Freethinkers, take the whole average of the county. Notwithstanding, Mr. Reynolds advised us at his first lecture at Marshfield to buy a copy of "Common Sense" and send to Coquelle City to our friends there. Now, Coquelle City is on a nice eminence above the river and looks nice and healthy. I do not know what is the matter with its people. Some of my not poor but well-to-do relations liv there, and I like them. A little over a year ago an Advent minister pitched his tent there and taught them to look for the second coming of Christ with the new Jerusalem promised Abraham's seed. And you see they are not ready yet for the Infidel's new heaven and God. They want the golden streets and pearly gates. When they see they don't get them maybe they will be willing to try and make a heaven here. MRS. E. A. HILBORN.

WALTHAM, MASS., Sept. 23, 288.

MR. EDITOR: The last time I wrote, my lines were penned in the City by the Sea, and at the time of writing I myself hardly thought that I should so soon again find myself in New England—but, with Proctor, "This is a world of changing plans and purpose."

As to such deaths as that of Professor Proctor, we stand aghast and with trembling fear; we do not know, we cannot comprehend, the why and wherefore. Why, we cry, did he, one of the noblest, purest, and most useful human beings, hav to leave us in the prime of his life, able and willing to do his best to make this world better?—why had Proctor to leave us and to be taken away by this dreadful disease, when there were countless millions of beings whose lives could so much better hav been spared—yea, whose death would hav been of benefit to mankind?

Some hope, and cherish the thought, that in another world there will be a new life, and we all meet again; while others cannot comprehend such an idea, and resign themselvs to the thought that the true immortality is the useful life that is remembered after it has left this sphere, and which by actions and words has gained an influence for the better over this multitude of human minds—a life that has not been in vain. Such a life was ended when our beloved Proctor breathed his last. He filled his mission, and all who knew him and understood him mourned the loss of a man who could least be spared.

Nature is governed by laws which, unlike human laws, know no exception. Obey or suffer the consequence, is the iron rule. Nature is not unjust; the trouble is that our limited knowledge will not permit us to understand the purpose and plans by which she is governed, these being mostly in opposition to human expectation and human desire. They therefore are often not to our satisfaction, and we mourn or weep or curse what, if seen in the light of supreme reason, would fully be justified. It had to be, it could not be different, and we must resign ourselvs to our fate. Ah! but it is so hard to think it just and right—these terrible plagues that with all their might are trying to ruin and to destroy what hard-working human beings hav been endeavoring to build up and to develop. The sweet, sunny South has earthquake and floods, forest fires, and last, the worst, yellow fever. Only those who hav lived in the South know what it means to see ruined and wrecked what was patiently built up with hard labor and self-denial—to see deserted and in ruin the garden of America. Ah, it does hurt, and well may there be cause for those who suffer to look up to heaven and with tearful eyes ask, Why?

Liberal-minded reader, are you and I not better off for not being in the chains of ignorance and superstition? Are we Freethinkers not happier beings because we see in all such suffering and trial but the consequence of natural necessities, instead of thinking that some supreme being, some trinity or duality, is experimenting upon the patience of human kind, and endeavoring its best to destroy the faith of its subordinates, for the sake of having cause to deliver them into the arms of his Satanic majesty, or to make a set of long-faced, lying revivalists of them? Oh, is it not better to hav no opinion of God at all than such a terrible idea—an idea that in this beautiful universe there could be such a monster as an almighty and all-powerful being that for the sake of punishment or its own amusement or pastime could inflict upon helpless and powerless human beings such suffering? I would rather think of the whole universe as without a ruler than believe in such a being. How human beings can be able to comprehend the idea of a loving, merciful, and kind father being the cause of their diseases and inflictions I can not understand.

God knows best, and he knows why, our Christian friends will tell us. If he does, then, as he is able in your opinion, my Christian friend, to alter things, as he is almighty and can change the laws that rule the universe, why does he not change them to the better? At least, my Christian friend, do not tell me that my moral obligation is to consider such a supreme being kind and merciful, for, believe me, on all the earth there is not a human being that would cause such suffering, or who, if he had caused such suffering unintentionally, would not do his best to rectify it. Should human beings be better than your almighty God? Would a human being hav taken the life of Mr. Proctor? Would a human being hav caused the ruin and destruction of lives and homes in Charleston, S. C.?

No, but human beings went into the houses of the sick; from far away physicians and nurses went to the plague-stricken city, and at the peril of their own lives attended to the wants of the suffering, buried those who perished, erected barracks to shelter the homeless, and handed supplies to those who were in want of food. From all over the Union kind-hearted human beings extended their helping hands, and offered money and supplies. In New York city a noble-hearted man gave $12,000 without making known his name—simply for the sake of humanity. Ah, how much better are these men and women, with limited power and means doing the best they can, than your almighty God, who could alter things if he only wanted to!

FRED. L. HOFFMAN.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Sept. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: One of your free trade correspondents invites attention to the somewhat remarkable prosperity with which this country was favored or afflicted from 1848 to 1860 inclusiv, when more factories was started, and more railroads constructed, than in any like term of years since. I met a man in those times who was educated in factory work, and could earn satisfactory wages at it until the advent of free trade prosperity; he then found it expedient to accept other employment at $15 per month and board, which was about $15 per month more than he could then earn in the factories. Hence, I infer that free trade did not giv profitable employment to factory operativs.

I remember reading an official report that $150,000,000 annually was required to pay the interest on money that was borrowed of foreign capitalists to inaugurate and sustain the free trade prosperity of this country in those times. It is notorious that the majority of the New York and Erie railroad stock was owned in Europe, and a German was sent over to manage, or mismanage, the road at a salary of $30,000 per year. Next, an Englishman was sent over to manage the road, and go pleasure-yachting, at a salary of $25,000 per year.

The tariff of 1861 enabled our manufacturing and railroad companies to extricate themselvs from the difficulties into which free trade had lured or forced them. It gave full and remunerativ employment to the factories and railroads we had in operation, and created a demand for additional manufacturing and transporting facilities that was promptly responded to without the aid of foreign capitalists. It also enabled our government to sustain the burden of the most expensiv and protracted internal war that ever afflicted a nation, and left our people more prosperous at the close than they were at the beginning of it. Such results are unparalleled in the history of nations, and could not hav been effected except by the agency of an ordinance that could hardly hav been called "a more ill tariff" except by those who desired the disruption of our nationality and the financial ruin of our country.

Another free trade correspondent in your last issue, under the caption of "Tariff Fallacy," givs quotations from Brougham's parliamentary speeches that prove England to hav been a protection nation, until her manufacturing industries were built up to such a hight that her agricultural resources could no longer support them, and foreign commerce and free trade had become an absolute necessity. American protectionists think it will be perfectly safe and judicious for us to follow that example of England; for when our manufacturing industries are developed to such an extent that our agricultural resources will no longer giv them adequate support, and "wages hav fallen to eighty-one cents per week," I think we should be prepared to beat England and all other nations in the market of the world. But that will take longer than free trade fanatics and lunatics are willing to wait; for they are evidently deluded by the subtle sophistries of importers and speculators, or their emissaries, who probably are well aware that when free trade has become universal, their universal harvest will begin; and they will reap and garner the wealth of the world; and one-hundred-thousand-million-aires will become as numerous as one-hundred-million-aires now are; hence their anxiety to force free trade upon us prematurely.

The advocates of free trade feign great hostility to millionaires and monopolies. Are they really ignorant of the fact that, except for war or commerce, millionaires and monopolies were impossible? That war and commerce are synonymous in principle and effect? That the difference between them is analogous to killing bees for their honey and robbing them of it with the patent beehive contrivance? The method last named may seem the most humane to superficial observers, but it robs them all the same, and leaves them but a scanty subsistence, and frequently not that. It then becomes a question whether it is not more humane to kill people outright than torture them to death with slow starvation. Therefore, I can see no good reason why people of average intelligence should permit themselvs to be deluded by the unmerited homage that commerce receives from fawning sycophants, who probably would not so degrade themselvs except in the hope, or assurance, of being well paid for such service. Therefore, though I hav nothing to offer in praise or commendation of either war or commerce, I will do them the justice to offer the apology for them that ownership of wealth has made them an economic necessity.

J. A. TUTTLE.

WORCESTER, MASS., Sept. 15, 1888.

MR. LANSING, Pastor, Dear Sir: I heard you say once that "there were some opinions you would deny men the right to entertain and propagate," but as that was early last winter and as you hav shown recently that you hav been studying church history more accurately than before, I believe that you hav outgrown the narrowness of the above-quoted sentiment; because all the evils of the Catholic system which you denounce hav grown from a similar idea or purpose on the part of the church.

If you are a man of honest intentions, willing to acknowledge a mistaken idea, as I truly believe you are, you will take kindly the things I am about to say, and not feel as though you would like to put into force the Catholic system of suppressing opinion.

In the first place, allow me to say that I think with you that Catholic control of our local governments would be in the highest degree harmful. I think with Thomas Jefferson that "the priest has been hostil to liberty in every age and country." I think your lectures are in the main right.

Thomas Jefferson, a Liberal, sounded the alarm more than three generations ago, and Liberal writers and speakers hav ever since then kept the truth of the great statesman's utterance before all who hav read and listened beyond the limit prescribed by John Calvin. Therefore you are merely stepping into the ranks of Liberal soldiers, and opening fire in an effectiv way upon the enemy we hav been fighting so long. Although you would probably object to being classed among and with men of such opinions, yet, as a matter of fact, you cannot help it. Liberals are glad to see you and other clergymen doing as you are—knowing that it will result in good to the people—hoping that the more you look into these matters the more Liberal you will grow, and that you will be benefited by your investigations. You are pursuing the only line of thought upon which men outgrow all so-called revealed religions.

Before our national government is in any danger from the Catholic or any other church, the Constitution must be changed. When President Cleveland sent a copy of the Constitution of the United States to the pope, he did it as a notice in the least offensiv way that priestly or other religious hands must not meddle with our government.

Our national Constitution has stood between liberty and the church for more than a hundred years; it will always so stand. Popes and Evangelical Alliances can hammer away at it until they tire—they and their hammers will wear out, but that great instrument of free government will stand unworn, and as grand as in the days of Paine, Jefferson, Washington, Adams, et al. So much for that. I shall not use harsh words regarding your scheme of religion, for should I say things about it as harsh, and by no means less truthful, as you apply to the papacy, you would feel as indignant as do Catholics at your words. Yet I cannot refrain from calling your attention to the fact that a branch of Protestantism has been the first religious organization to organize a crusade against the Constitution. They are trying to get religion into that document at the present time. Should they succeed—which they never will—where would they stop? Surely not until they had put in force the spirit of the quotation I make from you at the beginning of this letter. Truly, when we look about us, we find danger from more sources than one.

You hav ably set forth the evils of the church of Rome. I agree with you so far as the existence of the evil is concerned. What caused the evil to be? Hav you thought as far ahead as that, Mr. Lansing? You cannot say that dishonest motivs were the parents of all the evil and wrong embodied in the Catholic system of religion. On the contrary, you must acknowledge that the rules and laws of the church were made and provided by the so-called best men of the day with good intentions. You cannot deny that the best men of the times—men imbued with religion—were the men who conducted and took part in all the terrible persecutions in behalf of the church from which you draw such truthful lessons, and speak in terms of horror. These men were honest, moral, and pious, and thought God looked down with favor upon their work; they were acting under the inspiration of a religion that denied to men "the right to entertain or propagate opinions" not in keeping with that religion and the scriptures. Can we find it in our hearts to condemn men who were the victims of such a mistake? In our own country—on New England soil, you hav referred to the fact—religious persecutions took place. The Puritan fathers, the best men of the period, spurred by a sense of religious duty, a duty to God and the scriptures, enacted laws partaking of the spirit of crushing all opinions not of the approved style, and under those laws committed the most heart-rending deeds—hanged women, and subjected them to tortures more devilish than a savage would dream of. For what? For belonging to some particular sect, perhaps, but more likely because they were not and would not be orthodox. These are not the only outrages done by Protestant religionists—history records many others—but the fact remains that they one and all hav been done by men with far from wrong or evil intentions.

Now we see that persecutions hav occurred under the spirit of Catholicism and Protestantism alike, so it is clear that the cause of these acts are not peculiar to either branch of Christianity, but exist in both. So we must look to something pervading the entire system as the cause.

Mr. Lansing, I ask you again—and think before answering—What is that cause?

Trace all things to their origin. Now, I do not wish to say harsh things about a matter which you guard with such jealous care—a thing about which I know you are sensitiv, as all religionists are, by the nature of the complaint—but you say hard things, so don't wince when I speak the truth to you although it may sound cruel. I say to you that the foundation of your religion, and the creeds and dogmas erected thereon, contain within themselvs the cause of all the church crimes ever committed. Your Bible and religious faith in a gigantic error are responsible for all the rivers of blood that hav been coursing through the land for the last eighteen hundred years. The groans of the tortured and dying millions come echoing down the historic channels of time, testifying to the fact which I hav just stated. Through all these sorrow-laden centuries the fundamental doctrins of your religion hav been taught. The stronger the teaching and the faith, the more horrible the deeds of the church.

All these atrocities hav resulted from a divine religion, so called. Is it not time for us to abandon it and accept a human religion—one embracing all the good morals of the "divine religion," and rejecting the errors of eighteen hundred years ago, which were conceived in ignorance? I believe in doing away entirely with the divine element of religion. This at first would be a great step for you—too great, perhaps. If so, I would recommend you to enlarge your divinity a little, and giv him a little better reputation for human kindness, still keeping the divine attribute; a little progress is better than none. Now, the Bible is full of bloodthirsty deeds and commands, and a man fully possessed of the idea that God's grandeur and greatness were shown in them is not really blameable for committing like deeds—executing divine commands. It therefore follows that the ideas are to blame. Blame is due somewhere; you are obliged to admit that. Can you place it where it is most likely to belong? To the end that you may hav the truth at your command regarding this point, I most earnestly desire you to read the book Leviticus carefully, and I would call your special attention to chapter xxiv, verse 16, for therein you find the spirit that animated Christianity all through her history, and you know only too well that the spirit was complied with to the letter until the intelligence of the people got the upper hand of superstition, and religion was made the subject, not the master, of brains.

I do not know what you will think about this matter, but as you are engaged in the work it will fall to your lot to suggest some means of breaking down the power and evil of Catholicism, and from your stand I hardly see what you are to advise. The only way it can ever be done is to begin at the foundation and dig up the root of the evil. But, alas! what a dilemma for you! When you take away the foundation of Catholicism your own religion falls to the ground. Here, sir, is food for thought for you. It ought to lead you to the bright green pastures where Paine, Haeckel, Huxley, Darwin, Müller, Spencer, Ingersoll, and the hosts of Rationalists and scientists hav prepared the rich feasts of truth and reason which we are now enjoying. Oh, how beautiful this pasture compared with the old barren place where superstition still cultivates the soil and starves the people—stunts their brains on theology and belief! Men often go hunting for small game and bring in large game. Columbus did not start out to bag a new world, yet he did so. You can, if you will, see a point here.

MANLY A. BRIGHAM.

in others in the second stage. In no place that she knew of was it in the third. There is, she said, no stopping-place between despotic authority and absolute liberty. Authority was for the babyhood of the race, and perhaps necessary. Every sect in Christendom sets stakes and boundaries, and if a man outgrows the limits by a head, off goes that head. She did not want to destroy the churches, but would educate the people so they would not need a church. She would defend the rights of the Catholics as quickly as she would the rights of the American Secular Union. People, she said, must think as their mental organizations compel them to, but no man who would not pledge his life, his fortune. and his sacred honor should enter upon the work of reform. No one should go into the work who cares for his reputation. Reputation is what folks say of you; character is what you are. Command your own respect, possess character, and you will finally command the respect of the world. There are some folks, and some papers, she continued, "who if they spoke well of me. I should at once examin myself, and see wherein I had failed in my duty." Dr. Severance thought that it was difficult to get ahead of the times—very hard work, indeed, to keep up with them. And more difficult still is it to be really Liberal. She calls herself as Liberal as most folks, but sometimes even she harbored ill Liberal feelings. The only limit to liberty that she knows is the infringement of some one else's liberty. Her trinity is, Liberty, equality, fraternity.

The doctor was uproariously applauded. She has turned labor agitator lately in her own home, and her party wanted her to run for mayor of Milwaukee. The party carried the county, and if Mrs. Severance had not been too modest she might hav been mayoress of Milwaukee to-day.

At the conclusion of Mrs. Severance's speech, Mr. Anthony Barker invited the Pittsburgh Liberals to come to the meetings of the local Union. Dr. Foote spoke against the organizations which exercise tyranny over the people by means of narrow and special legislation. He cited the Medical Society of this state, which went to Albany to procure special legislation in its own interest. These medical and church organizations raise, he said, fifty thousand dollars where the heretics raise one thousand, but one dollar of our money goes much further than a dollar of theirs. An instance of this was the fact that while the Medical Society going to Albany raised a thousand dollars, the heretical opposition raised three hundred and defeated it. He wanted to encourage the people in the Secular Union who could giv only a dollar by these facts. Their one dollar would go about as far as a Christian's one hundred.

Sunday night the audience was a large one, completely filling the hall, and overflowing into the gallery. The program was modified to giv the audience the pleasure of hearing Mrs. Watts deliver the dialog between Sir Peter and Lady Teazle as it occurs in "The School for Scandal." Mrs. Watts is a thorough Secularist, her father training her from infancy in that philosophy, and she never was a Christian for a single minute. Applause brought her back upon the stage, and she gave "An Address to Men," which pleased the women mightily and made the lords of creation feel small. Mrs. Watts's beauty and elocutionary powers attracted the audience wonderfully, and they would hav kept her upon the stage had not the chairman introduced Mr. Putnam, who was to speak upon "The American Republic."

The substance of Mr. Putnam's lecture has appeared in these columns, and a reprint is unnecessary. He quoted from Garfield, Grant, and Spencer, the two former to the effect that churches must be made to pay their equal shares of the public burdens, and the latter as showing the indifference of the American people to ecclesiastical and political encroachments upon their liberties. Mr. Putnam took up each of the Nine Demands in turn, and urged the reasons for their adoption by the people. Mr. Putnam was rewarded by great applause as he made his points, and when he closed with "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" the audience was ready to vote that he was as good a speaker as they wanted to listen to.

After the speech this resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the war now being waged between two of the leading sects of Christianity, as exemplified in the first ward schools of this city, is a patent proof, not only of the wisdom and justice, but of the absolute necessity, of the Fourth Demand of Secularism, which reads: "We demand that . . . the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited."

Resolved, That we do not regard Protestant religion in our schools as any improvement on Catholic religion in our schools, and that we do not pay our school tax to hav either of them taught therein.

Mr. Watts then came forward and addressed the Convention on "Religion and Science: Their Relation to Civilization." Mr. Watts is a great favorit in Pittsburgh, and when he diverged from his subject long enough to whack the writer of the scurrilous article in the Pittsburgh Press he obtained great applause indeed. Before closing his lecture Mr. Watts spoke against monopolies and poverty, urging the Liberals to fight the former, and characterizing the latter as the curse of the century. Mr. Watts closed with the poem, "God of Nature, Giv Us Light," and the audience voted by their applause that the poetic race between him and Mr. Putnam was a dead heat.

MONDAY.

The first thing to occur Monday morning was the discussion of a Prohibition resolution, offered by Mr. Silver, of Cleveland. The resolution stood no chance of passing, in that audience of Freethinkers and individualists, though everyone was in favor of temperance, and it was finally laid to rest upon the table.

After this had been disposed of, the subjoined were passed:

Resolved. That the thanks of this Congress are hereby tendered to the members of Pittsburgh Secular Union for their generous coöperation in the work and success of this Congress, and we congratulate this Union on its great service in the past to the cause of Liberalism, and are sure that this Congress held under its auspices will be a noble landmark in civilization, and will make a new and powerful impulse for Freethought, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

Resolved, That we acknowledge our appreciation of the apparent efforts of the reputable and intelligent press of Pittsburgh to render fair reports of our proceedings, while we equally felicitate ourselvs upon having aroused the coarse vituperation and ignorant abuse of the organ of the slums.

WHEREAS, It is with deep and unfeigned regret that the American Secular Union accepts the unalterable decision of its valiant Executiv. Samuel P. Putnam, to resign the presidency and lay down the arduous task of leadership in the Secular host; but we rejoice to know that he steps back into the ranks a loyal private, still the most eager to press forward and plant everywhere the standard of universal mental liberty; therefore,

Resolved, That this Congress fully realizes that the highest encomiums it can bestow will fail to adequately convey in any true sense the profound obligation which this organization is under to our retiring President, who possesses the fervid genius of the poet, the skill and polish of a brilliant writer, the genial warmth of the orator, and the keen discrimination of the philosopher, and who, above all, has been the American Secular Union's most heroic and energetic worker for the past four years, unreservedly devoting his time and splendid talents for but meager compensation—organizing, speaking, and writing with undiminished enthusiasm for the advancement of the Secular cause beyond that of any predecessor—for all which we hereby tender Samuel P. Putnam our sincere gratitude and devotion.

Resolved, That, this Congress recognizing the inestimable services to the American Secular Union so freely given by our sterling champions of the Freethought press, Horace Seaver, J. P. Mendum, and Eugene M. Macdonald, we hereby, as a slight acknowledgment, place them on the roll of Life Members.

Since last we met, Freethought and Secularism hav suddenly lost one of their most brilliant and distinguished champions, and a gloom has been cast over the Liberal cause. Our late President, and long-time Treasurer of the American Secular Union, whose name stands as a synonym for princely generosity, for noble ideals, for intellectual grandeur—Courtlandt Palmer—has passed to the silent majority, but his disinterested, self-sacrificing, and exalted life adds a halo to the glory and sublimity of humanity.

Born to the inheritance of wealth, his environments were cast among conservativs, but he disenthralled himself from all ostentatious and vulgar pride, becoming the very embodiment of a true reformer, for he sought to remedy the intellectual as well as the social condition of the race. He aimed to interest our American "aristocracy" in the lives of the lowly laborers; to inspire them with loftier ambitions than fashionable dissipations; to lift science and logic in the place of debasing superstitions, and, above all, to so secularize the state that the light and joy of mental freedom would be the rightful heritage of every citizen of this republic. The death of this fervent Freethinker is an irreparable loss to the American Secular Union. In an age of sordid selfishness. Courtlandt Palmer's example shines illustrious in labors for the elevation of others, for his was the truly noble life.

> Wisdom, wealth, and fame are glorious things,
> And each may grace a life to which it brings
> Its treasures to be shared—not garnered pelf.
> No life is noble with only good for self!
> Whosoever a noble life would liv
> Must toil to aid and gather still to giv;
> Succor the weakling, smooth the ragged ways,
> And with wise bounty sweeten all the days
> He hath with man—so laying down his staff,
> A noble life shall be his epitaph.

Resolved, That we tender to Mattie P. Krekel, a vice-president and co-laborer in the Secular cause, our sincere condolence in the loss of her noble husband, Judge Krekel; one whose name and fame are indelibly associated with the history of the struggle for freedom; a brave soldier, a righteous judge, and a sterling Freethinker.

Resolved, That a Committee on Grievances be appointed by the Directors to whom any and all questions of misconduct or charges against any officer of the Union shall be preferred; that if they deem them of sufficient importance, the charges shall be brought before the Board and their action thereon shall be maintained until the succeeding Congress, when the charges shall be considered by a special committee of Life Members. That any person who shall publicly or privately make charges against the officers of this Union, without giving them an opportunity to refute them before the Board of Grievances, shall be denounced as a slanderer of the American Secular Union.

Mr. Watts reported that he was instructed by the Canadian Secular Union to call attention to the Eighth Demand of Liberalism and suggest that it be amended as follows:

We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality, as such, shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

The amending words are in italic. The amendment was adopted.

A discussion of what literature is best for the Union to circulate then ensued. Practically, the question was left to the Board of Directors. Overtures to the lecturers were also made, whereby the lecturers were to agree to speak for and of the Union, and, if deemed wise, to take up collections for its benefit—one-half of such collections to be given to the lecturers to enable them to break new ground and speak in places otherwise inaccessible. The Congress authorized the Secretary to carry out the plan if the lecturers would agree.

The Auditing Committee then reported:

With the exception of a few slight errors in addition, your Committee finds the Secretary's report adopted by this Congress to be correct. From November, 1887, to September, 1888, inclusiv, the receipts were $913 46, and expenditures $292 54 leaving a balance of $620.92.

The Treasurer's report has been received without vouchers, and the Committee therefore cannot report intelligently upon it. The report is placed on file. The Treasurer's report dates from October 1, 1887, to September 30, 1888, and the Secretary's report from November, 1887, to September, 1888. The Treasurer's report includes the first two weeks of October, which belong to the preceding year. The report shows a balance of $46 42 in the treasury.

[There is no room in this issue for the detail statements of the Secretary and Treasurer. They will be given in a subsequent issue.—ED. T. S.]

The Congress then thanked Mrs. Lucy N. Colman and A. B. Bradford for attending the sessions, notified the delegates who wished to see Pittsburgh's iron-mills to be on hand at 2 P M, and then adjourned, satisfied with its work, enthusiastic in the cause, and hopeful for the future. After many years of hard work and trouble, the delegates seemed to think that they had at last got down to hardpan and a business basis, with an able and efficient board of officers.

The Escort Committee consisted of Messrs Barker, Hoover, Wittman, and Barchfield. Between twenty and thirty delegates availed themselvs of the chance to see iron made, and on their return thanked their conductors for their courtesy. The Reporter noticed, however, an unusual gloom on the faces of many, and heard subdued inquiries for the address of a minister and the probable cost of joining a church. A little interviewing developed the fact that they had seen huge caldrons of melted iron seething and bubbling at a temperature of 4 000°.

The Congress closed with a ball, which was a highly successful and numerously attended affair. The lights and flags and music made a festival of beauty, and in what the conductor said was the grand march calcium lights of various colors were thrown upon the marchers, weirdly hightening the beauty of the ladies and displaying the manliness of the men. Good-fellowship and sociability prevailed, and Mrs. Colman, with her seventy-one years weighing her down, marched over the floor, in company with young Mr. Marlett of Chicago, as gaily as the youngest girl. Mr. Putnam, during the evening, succeeded in stopping the music and the laughter long enough to read a belated telegram from Colonel Ingersoll:

NEW YORK, Oct. 8, 1888.

TO SAMUEL P. PUTNAM: Had it been possible I should hav attended the Convention, but was prevented by an important suit in Massachusetts, the trial of which commenced last Wednesday and is not yet finished.

I congratulate the Convention on its success in the great cause in which it is engaged, and it givs me great pleasure to say that through the efforts of the delegates and their constituents intellectual hospitality is growing dav by dav; that the churches are getting ashamed of their cruel creeds; that the thoughtful people are coming to the conclusion that a government should be absolutely Secular; that all legislation should be for this world instead of another; that all property not devoted to the public use should bear its equal burden; that all days belong alike to the human race, and that all the world should be free not six but seven days in every week; that the highest object of the republic should be to protect the rights of the individual; and that it is the duty of all to hasten the coming of the day when science, guided by kindness, shall fill the world with light and joy.

Be kind enough to present to the Convention my thanks and regrets.

R. G. INGERSOLL.

Mr. Putnam then presented, on behalf of her many friends, one of Otto Wettstein's badges to Mrs. Colman, who would hav responded more lengthily had not her feelings overcome her and obliged her to be supported to a chair. She could, she said, stand a fight better than the many kindnesses she had received at this Congress. After this the elders gradually withdrew, leaving the young and strong to conclude the session. It is understood that the festivities went on for a long time, and corroborativ testimony to this effect was discovered by the Reporter, Tuesday morning, in the failure of the young delegates to appear at the breakfast table, and the fact that Roman Staley's bookstore was tightly locked when the New York delegation left the city at 8 o'clock. Those interested in the affairs of their friends can draw their own conclusions.

The length of the Report of the Congress of the American Secular Union held at Pittsburgh, and the fact that it did not close till Monday night of this week, compels us to omit the usual Editorials, and also to issue THE TRUTH SEEKER one day late. We think, however, that our readers will overlook this delay in view of the importance of its occasion.

S. P PUTNAM will speak at Washington, Ind., October 17th, 18th, 19th; at Westfield, Ill., 20th, 21st; at Wahoo, Neb., 23d, 24th, 25th, and at Denver, Col., 28th.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Every Inch A Man.

She sat on the porch in the sunshine
As I went down the street,
A woman whose hair was silver,
But whose face was a blossom sweet,
Making me think of a garden,
When in spite of the frost and snow
Of bleak November weather,
Late fragrant lilies blow.

I heard a footstep behind me,
And the sound of a merry laugh;
And I knew the heart it came from
Would be like a comforting staff
In the time and the hour of trouble,
Hopeful and brave and strong—
One of the hearts to lean on,
When we think all things go wrong.

I turned at the click of the gate-latch,
And met his manly look—
A face like his gives me pleasure,
Like the page of a pleasant book—
It told of a steadfast purpose,
Of a brave and daring will:
A face with a promis in it,
That God grant the years fulfill!

He went up the pathway, singing;
I saw the woman's eyes
Grow bright with a wordless welcome,
As sunshine warms the skies;
"Back again, sweetheart mother!"
He cried, and bent to kiss
The loving face that was lifted
For what some mothers miss.

That boy will do to depend on;
I hold that this is true—
From lads in love with their mothers
Our bravest heroes grew;
The grandest hearts hav been loving hearts
Since time and earth began;
And the boy who kisses his mother
Is every inch a man!

In the Swing.

Here we go to the branches high!
Here we come to the grasses low!
For the spiders and flowers and birds and I
Love to swing when the breezes blow.
Swing, little bird, on the topmost bough;
Swing, little spider, with rope so fine;
Swing, little flower, for the wind blows now;
But none of you hav such a swing as mine.

Dear little bird, come sit on my toes,
I m just as careful as I can be;
And oh, I tell you, nobody knows
What fun we d hav if you'd play with me!
Come and swing with me, birdy dear,
Br ght little flower, come swing in my hair;
But you, little spider, creepy and queer—
You'd better stay and swing over there;
The sweet little bird, he sings and sings,
But he doesn't even look in my face;
The bright little blossom swings and swings,
But still it swings in the selfsame place.
Let them stay where they like it best;
Let them do what they'd rather do;
My swing is nicer than all the rest,
But maybe it's rather small for two.

Here we go to the branches high!
Here we come to the grasses low!
For the spiders and flowers and birds and I
Love to swing when the breezes blow.
Swing, little bird, on the topmost bough;
Swing, little spider, with rope so fine;
Swing, little flower, for the wind blows now;
But none of you has such a swing as mine.

Why Boys Go to Sea.

I was but a very small lad when I first went to sea—my age thirteen years and six months. Why I went to sea I can hardly say. I had certainly no clear views. Maybe the reading of story-books about the ocean life raised a kind of hankering in me; but I think it was the desire to shine in buttons, to wear a pair of blue-cloth trousers flowing at the feet, a little jacket with pretty brass-bound sleeves, a colored shirt with a collar lying well open at the throat and embellished with a black silk handkerchief tied in a proper sailor's knot, the ends twinkling to every breeze like the fly of a streamer pulling at a mast, a cap on the back of my head with a sparkling device above the peak of it representing a golden wreath encircling a flag beautifully colored with blue and silver silk. I say it was a yearning to walk attired in clothes of this kind that ended in my going to sea.

My notions of the deep were entirely romantic. I thought of coral islands, green savannas, forests of fruit trees, savages with bows and arrows, great elephants with little black men riding cross-legged on their heads, blue rivers winding toward the purple of distant mountains, with shining white cities upon their banks, where the roofs of the houses of the nobility were garnished with gold and silver and precious stones, where there were ducks that laid emeralds and hens rubies, and where there were the funniest monkeys in the world to be had for the asking. I promised one of my little sisters to bring her a box of gold dust and the ivory tusk of an elephant; for another I was to procure a bird of paradise, two humming birds, and a lizard that wasn't poisonous. To my brother Tommy, who was two years younger than myself, I promised a real canoe, and I rather think I added that if it was to be managed I would present him with a live savage to go fishing with him in it.

I knew geography pretty well, though my ideas of distant lands were a little confused when I came to think of their products; but it seemed to me that a fellow only needed to go to sea to obtain what he wanted. The world was very big, I thought, and when a man sailed into it he was bound to meet with everything that was wonderful and worth having. It never struck me that I might make a voyage to a place where there were no elephants, no gold dust, no canoes, no savages even, merely a civilized black man or two, such as you may meet any day, bland, clean, and shining, in a London street. Indeed, I no more realized the sort of country I might first visit than I did the life I must lead in order to get to it. There was a great deal of fruit mixed up in my seafaring dream; the brass buttons and the badge stood first, and then my vision was as plentifully stocked as a big market with cocoanuts, bananas, oranges, dates, custard apples, and other first-class eating.

I knew something about ships; I had lived half of my little life in a seaport town, and could talk of bowsprits, quarter boats, dead-eyes, and jibs without blundering; but of the hardships of a sailor's life, the food he eats, the work he has to do, I was, of course, quite ignorant. It has often amused and interested me since to ask a boy, say of thirteen years and six months, who has told his papa and mamma that he is determined to go to sea, what his notions of the calling are. As a rule I find them wonderfully like what mine were. It is partly an idea of getting away from school, partly the dream of becoming a man all at once, partly a fancy of pirates, buried treasure, glittering uniforms, and fine curiosities to be got somehow and brought home, the whole colored with the light of the romance which shines very gloriously upon the minds of boys when they are little, but which slowly fades as one gets older and older, till life turns as gray round about one as a cold November day.—Clark Russell.

Printing in China.

A correspondent of the North China Daily News, of Shanghai, describes a printing establishment which he found in a village in the interior, about one hundred and fifty miles from Shanghai:

The printing was being temporarily carried on in the village temple, and movable type only was used. In the large central hall of the temple were placed about twenty ordinary square tables, on which the cases of type were spread out. At the time of the visit one man was engaged in setting up type, another was printing. The former stood before a table, on which was what might be called the Chinese "case." It was a solid block of hard wood, about twenty-two inches long by fifteen inches broad, and perhaps three inches deep. The inside was hollowed to a depth of about a quarter of an inch, this depression being still further hollowed out in grooves about three-quarters of an inch deep. The block had twenty-nine of these grooves, each filled to the depth of a quarter of an inch with ordinary stiff clay. With his copy before him, armed with a small pair of iron pincers, the compositor began his work; character after character was transferred from the case and firmly pressed into the clay.

When the "form" was complete a flat board was placed on the top and the characters pressed perfectly even and level with the surface of the wooden block, the edge of which was cut to form the border generally found round every Chinese page. The printer now received the form and carefully brushed his ink over the type. Taking a sheet of paper, he pressed it down all over the form so that it might be brought in contact with every character. He then removed the sheet and examined each character, carefully adjusting those which were not quite straight with the pincers, and apparently never touching the type with his fingers. After sufficient copies had been struck off, the type was distributed, each character being returned to its particular box. The writer was told that the art of printing in this way had been handed down in the same family since the Sung dynasty more than six hundred years ago. No strangers were ever taught, apprentices being always taken from the same clan.

An Expensiv Luxury.

But the cost of running the White House is a small affair compared with the cost of the institution at the other end of the avenue known as the Congress of the United States, writes a Washington correspondent. Whew! that is where the big items of expense make their appearance. Listen to these two little paragraphs as the clerk of the House reads the bill: "For the compensation of senators, $380,000;" "For the compensation of members of the House, $1,695,000," or a total of over $2,000,000 a year, just for salaries of members of Congress. Then there are an unusual number of other expenses attending the running of Congress. For instance, there is about $150,000 mileage of members of Congress.

Then there is the snug little item of $684,000 for the pay of officers and clerks and messengers and aids to the lawmakers. There are four hundred members of the House and Senate, and to wait upon them and run errands and hold open the door as they pass in and out and carry the cards of their callers and take care of the thousands of bills they put in, they hav employed about four hundred people, who are paid the snug little sum of $684 000 for doing so. Every member has an average of about one employee, and for the service of the same there is paid an average of about $1,800 to each. To run Congress and the Capitol costs, in salaries alone, about $3,000,000 a year.

When you go into details of this thing they are positivly appalling. Think of an appropriation of $47 000 for the stationery for members and officers of the House alone during one session of Congress. Think of $52,000 for reporting the debates of Congress, whether the sessions be long or short. Think of over $150,000 a year for committee clerks, who put in probably one day's time a week in their legitimate duties as clerks to committees and the remainder of their time as clerks to the men who appointed them. Think of nearly $3,000,000 a year to pay for the collection of internal revenue, and as much more for collecting the customs. It is, however, when you glance at the figures at the end of the bill that you get the most impressiv view of the size of the government. For this bill alone, the legislativ, judicial, and executiv expenses, the total expenditures are over $20,000,000. Then the bill for the "sundry" civil expenses will be as much more, for it has not fallen below $20,000 000 in this decade; army and navy, $40,000,000; rivers and harbors, $20,000,000, and so on until the grand total of appropriation bills, for running the daily expenses of the government, including the post-office department, amount to $250,000,000 for the year.

Hold It Over a Day.

Let me tell you how I write mean letters and bitter editorials, my boy. Some time, when a man has pitched into me and "cut me up rough," and I want to pulverize him and wear his gory scalp at my girdle and hang his hide on my fence, I write the letter or editorial that is to do the business. I write something that will drive sleep from his eyes and peace from his soul for six weeks. Oh, I do hold him over a slow fire and roast him. Gall and aquafortis drip from my blistering pen. Then I don't mail the letter and I don't print the editorial. There's always plenty of time to crucify a man. The vilest criminal is entitled to a little reprieve. I put the manuscript away in a drawer.

Next day I look at it. The ink is cold; I read it over and say: "I don't know about this. There's a good deal of bludgeon and bowie-knife journalism in that. I'll hold it over a day longer." The next day I read it again. I laugh and say, "Pshaw!" and I can feel my cheeks getting a little hot. The fact is, I am ashamed that I ever wrote it, and hope that nobody has seen it, and I hav half forgotten the article or letter that filled my soul with rage. I havn't been hurt, I havn't hurt anybody, and the world goes right along, making twenty-four hours a day, as usual, and I am all the happier. Try it, my boy. Put off your bitter remarks until to-morrow. Then, when you try to say them deliberately, you'll find that you hav forgotten them, and ten years later, ah! how glad you will be that you did! Be good-natured, my boy. Be loving and gentle with the world, and you'll be amazed to see how dearly and tenderly the worried, tried, vexed, harassed old world loves you.—Burdette.

That Ugly-looking Toad.

"That ugly-looking toad!" that's what you said.

Now let us see about it—let us examin it. Oh, see the warts all over its body, and the warts secrete a kind of fluid, and if his toadship gets angry, this fluid will ooze out all over his thick-skinned body! This is called venom or poison, and it is secreted more especially in those two little knobs just behind his head. If it should get in your eyes they would smart awfully, so always be careful when you are handling the toad. He has a wide mouth, and a good tongue. His jaws are sharp-edged, but he has no teeth. The brownish-black and white spots and the stripe down his back make him appear rather interesting as he sits in that squatty fashion which must be seen to be understood. "Squat like a toad," we read in Milton's "Paradise Lost."

They are very quick-tempered creatures. Once when I was among the mountains at Jefferson, N. H., I accidentally stepped on one and he swelled all up just like a ball, a milky-white substance oozed all over him, he opened his mouth and spat and hissed, his tongue darted out, and he looked at me with his great shining eyes as if he would like to swallow me the same as he does his skin when he sheds it. I apologized to him for the accident, and we parted good friends.

My dog Bonnie caught a toad in his mouth once, but he dropped it very quickly, as the little fellow threw his venom on poor Bonnie's tongue, which smarted a long time after. This venom is the toad's method of protecting himself from enemies.

There is a smaller toad, called the tree-toad. It likes to get on the limb of a tree, and there utters the most doleful and distressing sounds, and sometimes keeps it up all night long, to the annoyance of nervous persons.

The toad can liv a long time without eating and without much air, and his average life is thirty-five or forty years. We hav heard stories of toads having been found imbedded in trees and solid rocks, but this is probably an error. They belong to the same class as frogs, and come under the head of amphibia. Professor Agassiz thought toads were a step higher than frogs, because their habits make them more at home on the land, and the web that is seen in the fingers of the frog is not seen in the toad's fingers, nor do frogs hav cutaneous glands, as the toad has.

They are harmless and very useful, for they eat all the slugs, beetles, potato bugs, and insects they can find, and thus protect our fruit and vegetables from being destroyed.

English gardeners prize them highly, and even buy them by the dozen to put in their gardens. Take one in the house and it will catch flies and any other insect it can find.

There are several varieties of toads. In California there is founud the "horned toad," which has two horns on its head. It is capable of changing its color, and it sometimes appears very brilliant and sparkling in its changeable dress.

Superstitious people in ancient times thought there was a jewel hidden in the head of the toad. And in the play of "As You Like It" we read:

Sweet are the uses of adversity;
Which, like the toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in his head.

Toads seem dull and sluggish, but really they are quite intelligent, and may be taught to come when called by a pet name, to eat from the hand, and to know the one who takes care of them. So you see the toad is intersting after all; it has several good qualities and few bad ones. You will be kind to the toad, I am sure, and not cruel toward it, teasing it with sticks and stones, as some children do.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—Describe the toad. What will the toad do when angry? What becomes of its skin when it is shed? What can you say of the tree-toad? To what order do toads belong? State the difference between toads and frogs. For what are they useful? What did superstitious people formerly believe about them? Can they be taught, and what can they learn?

The Narrowing Way.

We gaze adown the bright suburban street,
And note the narrowing of the trodden way,
Till to the eye the bordering hedgerows meet,
And check the vision's farther reach or play.

"What lies beyond?" will ask the wondering child;
"Who livs and loves where we no farther see?
Is it moorland waste, or forest wild,
Or flowers, and purling brooks, and lake, and lea?"

Be sure, dear child, there's nothing in the way—
The lengthening hedgerows only seem to blend;
If you should start and journey all the day
Till night comes on, you could not reach the end.

We gaze adown life's path as age creeps on,
And note the narrowing of its forward course;
New friendships do not cling—the old are gone—
The way but narrows to the narrow house.

What lies beyond? now asks the questioning sage;
Who livs and loves where we no farther see?
Is it wild waste? is there no added page?
No flowers, no purling brooks, no lake, no lea?

The sage may answer to the wondering child,
But who shall answer to the questioning sage?
The meeting hedgerows are but sight beguiled,
But broadens e'er the narrowing path of age!

How can we know there opes a farther way?
The narrowing road-lines seem in truth to blend—
What 'surance we may journey through a day
New waked to life, and never reach the end?

The thought appalls! 'Twere better otherwise;
We grow aweary of the life that is—
What weary hearts, and nerves, and brains, and eyes,
Must weary wait through dread eternities!

Each duty cataloged upon the scroll
Of highest ethics, should be bravely done—
Then may the mystic map of life unroll,
And show us at the last, Nirvana won!

Detroit, August, 1888. S. B. McCRACKEN.

The Roman Catholic Church in America.

A Catholic Layman in the Independent.

The witty editor of a New York paper observed lately that a certain Irish politician, like many of his countrymen, inherited his religion from his mother and preserved it through his wife.

I fear there are many men who do their duty to God vicariously and take a good deal more on trust than they would in temporal affairs. There is generally more apparent piety among women than among men, and when the torch of faith burns brightly in any country it is sheltered and fed for the most part by a faithful few of the female sex.

Is it that men care too little about religion to trouble themselvs with its practice? Is it that the world of business or the world of science blunts their perceptions of spiritual things? Or is it that they fondly imagin that those who hav been joined together in temporal bonds of matrimony will not be sundered in the land of spirits?

Certainly St. Paul gave some hint of all which the believing wife might be to the unbelieving husband, and men hav been given to take his words for all they are worth.

Its numerical strength is the great point made by Catholics when they wish to impress on their own minds or on the minds of others the great power of the church in this country. And so far, the numerical strength of the Roman Catholics in America has told, and has told beyond all doubt in politics. But what is the real, rather we should say what is the spiritual, value of this preponderating influence? Is it to lessen crime? Is it to lessen suffering? Has it elevated the moral or intellectual condition of the masses in New York? He would be a bold man who dared to say in the face of facts that the Roman Catholic church has been a powerful influence for good in that city. And yet was there ever a body so full of vaunt of its own virtue? It is time that some one cried out and awakened the powers of the church from their dreams of self-complacent security. If the shepherd sleeps what shall become of the hapless flock?

Building churches, building schools, establishing colleges, publishing panegyrics on ecclesiastics which should make any self-respecting man sink into the earth with shame that he should be the subject of such gross flattery, is this a sign of real, solid, divine life?*

When will the pastors of the church remember Italy and France and Germany, and learn to be wise in time? No amount of political influence or authority or obedience or excommunications or threats will keep a nation Catholic if the true spirit of religion is absent.

Look at New York; it should be pre-eminently a Catholic city. The mass of the Catholic population is Irish, or of direct Irish descent, and of the most faithful Catholic nation on earth. I know well that there are thousands of Catholics in this city faithful to their God and to their religion, but who will dare to deny the miserable social and religious condition of the mass of the Catholic population? It is true that there are good and earnest priests here; it is true that the confessionals in some churches are well attended, principally by women; but is this a real test of the religious condition of the people?

Look at the exterior aspect, look at the social aspect; it is true that New York is crowded with costly churches, rich vestments, much singing, and much show, which attract the multitude even as moths fly to the flame.

But what solid foundation lies underneath? The churches are magnificent and costly and heavily burdened with debt; but few are consecrated though they are built for many years. Is this creditable to ecclesiastical management or to religion? The poor are heavily, I might almost say cruelly, taxed to pay these debts, or rather to pay the heavy mortgage on these churches, and with little hope of reprieve.

We hav before us a report made by the Rev. Father Colton in regard to St. Stephen's church, lately occupied by the Rev. Dr. McGlynn. He announces a strawberry festival to last through a whole week for the benefit of the church. He urges the congregation to send him in contributions for an immense bazar, and makes the astounding announcement that although the debt of the church amounts to $140,000, he is about to increase it by $60,000 more. It is said in the report that much sympathy is felt for Father Colton in being obliged to increase so much the heavy debt, but that he will obey the mandate of the council of Baltimore to the very letter by building schools. The old buildings now occupied by the primary schools are to be destroyed and handsome new structures are to be erected in their place. The Catholic Review, Archbishop Corrigan's organ, sympathizes with Father Colton, but it does not sympathize with the people who are again taxed so heavily.

The amount of money obtained from the Catholic poor will never be known in this world and is very little suspected. A priest, at his own will and pleasure, announces that a certain sum of money will be required weekly or monthly from each person; and woe to the unhappy individual if the demand is not met promptly. We know churches where three different collections are demanded and obtained at each mass on Sunday from a patient though often indignant people.

As in the case of Dr. McGlynn's successor, each new priest must do some new work to get credit for his zeal. But all this is done at the expense of the poor of his parish. The priest gets all the honor and the poor get all the burden.

The Freeman's Journal, which expended so much red-hot shot on Dr. McGlynn for the debt which he left on his church, is lost in admiration of Father Colton for his zeal in increasing and probably doubling it. Father Colton, he says, is "quite cheerful" about it, and he well may be, considering that not one penny of the expense will come out of his pocket, and that he will get all sorts of ecclesiastical and episcopal honor and glory for using other people's money.

The statement of the editor of the Freeman's Journal is amusing in more ways than one, and we giv it here. He says:

> St. Joseph is a rich and powerful friend, who has often proved himself a benefactor to others even in darker hours than now, frequently causing magnificent churches, convents, and other institutions to rise seemingly out of nothing, as in the case of the splendid building erected by the late Rev. Father Drumgoole, in this city—known as the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin, but erected by the St. Joseph's Union through the medium of twenty-five-cent subscriptions—at a cost of over $350,000, not including the property on Staten Island, which, with other expenditures, would bring the total cost up to about half a million of dollars. . . . Would it not be well to try some special devotion to St. Joseph with the above intention, such, for instance, as keeping a light burning constantly before his statue until the debt is paid?

Well, if burning candles to St. Joseph will pay the debt, by all means let them be burnt. But we fear the poor Irish servant-girls of the parish will hav a good deal more to do with the payment than St. Joseph, and that it will remain for another pastor to increase.

There is an utter recklessness in the way in which buildings are demolished which certainly could be very well made to serve the purposes for which the new ones are intended, and handsome new structures are erected without the slightest regard to cost, because they are at the expense of a long-suffering people, and though the vast mass of these hapless Catholics are suffering untold misery, not always from their own fault, but too often from the neglect of those who should be their guides.

There is too often but little money to spare for helping the honest poor, because splendid schools and lofty spires and magnificent colleges are supposed to be the great needs of the nineteenth century; and the Irish bear the burden of all. It was lately announced in the New York World that St. Anthony's church, which is situated in one of the poorest parts of New York and was especially set apart for Italians, is chiefly supported by Irish Catholics, though the congregation and the pastor are all Italians. We may well ask what is to become of the Roman Catholic church in America if the Irish people are alienated from it as the Catholic people of Italy and France and Germany hav become?

What! the Italians will neither build nor support their own church, and it is left to the Irish to attend to their spiritual welfare! And yet the court of Rome has hardly even a word of sympathy for the sufferings of the same exiled Irish.

Reports will be sent to Rome of the devotion and care of the archbishop of New York for the Italians of his diocese; but will even one word be said of their real benefactors? Will they receive even a passing meed of praise? And in this connection, I may add, will one word be said or known in Rome of the thousands of Italians who honor Garibaldi's statue and who never enter a church? Here is a people who of all others should be Catholic and devoted to their church, and yet who hav either abandoned it altogether or do not care enough for it to giv a few cents for its support. And it is well known, also, that it is the Irish chiefly, if not exclusivly, who build and support the French and German churches.

Catholic papers, as we hav said elsewhere, are absolutely under the control of the bishop of the diocese in which they are published. They are guilty of sycophancy to an extent that is simply nauseating. In the Roman Catholic church, as at present governed, everything centers round the bishop; and for all practical purposes he is his own pope and the pope of the people. Hence the profound deference that is paid to him and which he accepts as a religious duty from every individual in his diocese. He is the local head of the church, and a number of small deities who hav to be placated are more dangerous to society than one great autocratic ruler. A Protestant bishop would simply be ashamed to accept the fulsome flatteries which are not only acceptable but which must be offered to secure the patronage of the Roman Catholic bishop. No more deadly injury could hav been done to the Roman Catholic church than the maintaining of this practice: and it will be kept up until some noble bishop rises in his might and forbids and denounces it forever.

One favorit way of laying on this flattery well and wisely is to write an article on the great increase of Catholicity in the diocese, and attribute it all to the master mind and financial ability of the bishop. No doubt a good bishop can do a great deal, but even a bishop needs help both in the shape of mind and money. In fact, the bishop needs a people to govern quite as much as people need the bishop, and to praise one party to the exclusion of the other is unjust; and injustice advances no cause.

A moment's consideration will show how very false these boastings are. The numerical strength of the Roman Catholic church has certainly increased enormously of late years, but how and where? It has increased in our large cities in consequence of Irish, German, and Italian immigration. We will let the Germans and Italians pass; the whole world knows how very little Italians care for their church. The Germans are undoubtedly a religious people; if they do not giv liberally to the church they know how to assert themselvs and are doing so.

But the Irish Roman Catholic is the great support of the Roman Catholic church in America, and let us see what is his social condition. A few millionaires, a host of politicians, and a vast population of shiftless, thriftless, ill-cared-for people. Better, a thousand times, that these people should be back in the bogs of Connemara with their pure fresh air and their pure fresh life than in the crime-haunted liquor saloons of New York and Boston. Millions of Irish Catholics hav fled to America, and when one thinks of their miserable state in this country it is hard to feel that the head of their church whom they support so loyally has not one word to say to stop this bleeding of the nation, this destroying of a people who hav loved him, one might dare to say not wisely but too well.

They hav increased and multiplied in the land of their adoption, but what has become of the descendants of the first Irish emigrants? Are they now the stay and support of the Roman Catholic church? Far from it.

In all the Southern states in every town you find names which are unquestionably Irish, "The voice is the voice of Jacob," but they do not represent the church to which by their nationality you would suppose they rightly belonged. Catholic people hav increased and multiplied in America, but they hav not multiplied as Catholics, and no one knows that better than the ecclesiastics of the Catholic church. It is a grave question whether they would not hav been more devoted to their church, more faithful to their religion, and more pious in their lives had they been allowed to remain in Ireland.

Of course the number of Catholics and of Catholic institutions has increased immensely in the Catholic church in the last few years; but certainly thousands upon thousands of Catholics hav lost their faith and either hav no religion or hav joined other religious bodies, because of the gross neglect of those who should hav been their shepherds and who are now their taskmasters. What a glorious change, what a revival, there might be in the Catholic church if the poor were made its first object!

Look at the hospitals in New York, look at public institutions, at Blackwell's Island, at the lunatic asylums, in all these places we hav found for the most part Roman Catholics sadly neglected by their priests, and let me say here that I speak of what I know. Quite recently in making a report of the Presbyterian Hospital, the number of Catholics that hav been received into it was immensely ahead of the number of Protestants—this is infinitly to the credit of the Protestant founders of the institution, but what of the souls of the Catholics who suffer and die there?

* A very amusing instance of this abject flattery of ecclesiastics occurred lately. A poem was written by a priest in which a cardinal was glorified in meter, and out of it, with the grossest adulation. Each verse had the refrain, "Loved cardinal, great cardinal;" but the poet suddenly burst into French and finished by declaring that the holy father had given the cardinal the "coup de grace" when he elevated him to that dignity.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

PROFESSOR STOKES replies in the Spectator to an American who challenges the statement in his book on "Ireland and the Celtic Church," that kissing one's wife or child on Sunday was regarded by old Puritans in Connecticut as sinful. Professor Stokes establishes the fact by citations from Archdeacon Hessey's lectures on Sunday.

THE pope and the czar are haggling over the terms of a proposed bargain by which they are to render each other mutual services. The main point of disagreement is in regard to the language to be used in Polish churches, the czar wishing Russian, to prepare the way for Polish annexation, and the pope fearing that the Russification of the liturgy will lead to conversion to the Russian Orthodox church.

THE PIOUS CHAUTAUQUA SCHOOL OF PHILOSOPHY.

Chautauqua is 1400 feet above the level of the sea; but the expense of living there is higher than that.

Chautauqua is situated on a section of the south shore of the lake of that name, and wears a fence around itself. It is the only walled town in America. It costs you forty cents to break in for a single day's punishment—and all you happen to hav with you to effect an escape.

People who take their lives in their hands and submit to the whole seas n's torture, can commit slow suicide for a few cents per day less.

It is considered the correct thing for studious individuals gunning for a much needed rest to go to Chautauqua and take a dose of the "Chautauqua Idea." This "Idea" is served up as indicated in the following daily program:

5 30 A.M.—Waking bell.
6:00 A.M.—Service in cottages.
7 00 A.M.—Breakfast.
9 00 A.M.—Temperance address in the Amphitheater.
10:30 A.M.—Lecture, Amphitheater.
12:00 M.—Dinner.
2 00 P.M.—Services in Hall of Philosophy.
3 00 P.M.—Lecture in the Amphitheater.
5 00 P.M.—Study of the Holy Land.
6 00 P.M.—Supper.
7 30 P.M.—Lecture in the Amphitheater.
9 30 P.M.—Lights out!

Any unoccupied time, which can be discovered by the aid of a microscope of high magnifying power, is devoted to the study of Greek, Hebrew, Metaphysics, Mythology, and Ice-Creamology.

Everything at Chautauqua is done systematically. The place is run on the belief that everybody is trying to beat the concern, and the concern humps itself to see that such attempts fail to ripen.

You buy a ticket of the dragon at the gate or the steamboat landing, and then hand it back to him to be punched. If it is your first visit, and you ask a few questions for information, you are likely to be punched also. After paying for your ticket, hanging up your picture in the rogues' gallery, and filing your pedigree and references in the office, you are graciously permitted to enter and absorb as much of the "Idea" as you can carry.

If you wish to indulge in a boat-ride, you must deposit your admission ticket at the boatery. If you hav left your ticket at the hotel, it is necessary to leave your watch and all the money you hav about your clothes with the boat-renter, as a guarantee that you will not attempt to escape by rowing across the lake.

A hole is then punched in your right ear for purposes of indentification in case you are drowned, and you are turned adrift. When you return your bail is returned, a hole is punched in your other ear, and you are ready to grapple again with the "Idea."

The same ceremonies are necessary when you want to bathe.

If you happen to be unfortunate enough to become detached from that priceless ticket, you are assessed forty cents per day for every day since the Assembly opened, even though you hav just arrived. The idea of this is to teach lessons of carefulness, and prevent anyone from getting a dose of the "Idea" without going through the initiatory punching process.

Chautauqua is noted for its topographical plan of Palestine, spread along the lake shore, the water-line of which does duty as the Mediterranean coast. The Holy Land is, however, in a state of fatigue. Some of the mountains and little hills, originally stuffed with sawdust, hav been made into depressions by the action of rain. The river Jordan has run dry, while Capernaum is overflowed. The Waters of Merom consist of a bunch of weeds, and you can no longer obtain anything to drink at Beersheba. The Dead Sea is full of watermelon rinds and chips, and the fence around Bethlehem needs repairing. Joppa and Cæsarea are badly dilapidated, evidently having been trampled on by the small boys. The houses of Jerusalem are lying on their sides, and the whitewash snow on Mount Hermon's summit has been washed into inartistic streaks by the summer showers.

The principal products of Chautauqua are flies, desperate flirtations, uncongenial marriages, diplomas, and ten-per-cent slices off the gross receipts of all business done on the grounds.

An attempt made last year to measure the air consumed by each visitor, so as to charge a percentage thereon, failed for some reason.

There are always flies on the victims of Chautauqua; but a diligent search has failed to discover any on the management.—Wm. H. Siviter in Puck.

Gems of Thought.

LET me put one case and I will be through with this branch of the subject. A husband and wife love each other. The husband is a good fellow and the wife a splendid woman. They liv and love each other and all at once he is taken sick, and they watch day after day and night after night around his bedside until their property is wasted and finally she has to go to work, and she works through eyes blinded with tears, and the sentinel of love watches at the bedside of her prince, and at the least breath or the least motion she is awake; and she attends him night after night and day after day for years, and finally he dies, and she has him in her arms and covers his wasted face with the tears of agony and love. He is a believer and she is not. He dies, and she buries him and puts flowers above his grave, and she goes there in the twilight of evening and she takes her children, and tells her little boys and girls through her tears how brave and how true and how tender their father was, and finally she dies and goes to hell, because she was not a believer; and he goes to the battlements of heaven and looks over and sees the woman who loved him with all the wealth of her love, and whose tears made his dead face holy and sacred, and he looks upon her in the agonies of hell without having his happiness diminished in the least. With all due respect to everybody, I say, damn any such doctrin as that.—Ingersoll.

IN this age of sanitary abuses our lives are mostly half-told tales. Our season ends before the trees of hope hav time to ripen their fruit; before their day's work is done our toilers are overtaken by the shadows of approaching night. Sanitary reforms would undoubtedly lengthen our average term of life, and an increase of longevity alone would solve the most vexing riddles of existence: the apparent injustice of fate, the disproportion of merit and compensation, the aimlessness, the illusiv promises and baffled hopes of life. For millions of our fellow-men an increase of health and longevity would suffice to make life decidedly worth living.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in The Bible of Nature.

IF you sin against the Holy Ghost, you cannot "be forgiven, neither in this world nor the world to come." I fear that most of us will never be forgiven; for who among us has not grossly insulted the Ghost by attributing certain of his writings to a poor scribbling worm of the dust, and vice versa? Not only do we frequently fail to distinguish the Ghost's work from Smith's work in the authorized version, but there are a number of books which some allege to be the Ghost's and some allege to be Smith's, which are excluded from the authorized version altogether. There are the books of Tobit and Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, the epistle of Jeremiah, the Song of the Three Children, Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, and the Maccabees. The Roman Catholic church believes all these books to be from the pen of the Ghost; but the Protestant church alleges that they are the worthless writings of Smith. If the Ghost really wrote them, I should like to hear his opinion of the Protestant church. If he did not write them, it would be interesting to hav his verdict upon the church of Rome.—Saladin.

PRESS on, press on, ye Rulers, in the roused world's forward track;
It moves too sure for ye to put the clock of Freedom back!
We're gathering up from near and far, with souls
in fiery glow,
And Right doth bare its arm of might to bring the spoilers low.
Kings, Priests, ye're far too costly, and we weary of your rule;
We crown no more "Divinity," where Nature writeth "Fool!"
Ye must not bar our glorious path as in the days
agone;
We know that God made Men, not Princes, Kings, or Priests. Press on! —Massey.

WITH an armed and resolved hand,
I'll strip the ragged follies of the time
Naked as at their birth . . . and with a whip of steel,
Print wounding lashes in their iron ribs.
—Ben Jonson.

EDUCATION draws out and disciplins a man; fills him with varied and rational ideas; prevents him from sinking into monomania or being excited by transport; givs him determinate thoughts instead of eccentric fancies, pliable opinions for fixed convictions; replaces impetuous images by calm reasonings, sudden resolves by the results of reflection; furnishes us with the wisdom and ideas of others; givs us conscience and self-command. —M. Taine.

REPOSE and cheerfulness are the badge of the gentleman—repose in energy. The Greek battlepieces are calm; the heroes, in whatever violent actions engaged, retain a serene aspect; as we say of Niagara, that it falls without speed.—Emerson.

THE CHURCH CARING FOR ORPHANS.

Notes and Clippings.

REV. SAM JONES is said to hav made at least $100,000 since he gave up the law and became an evangelist.

A PATENT for a church collection-box was taken out by a Methodist deacon of Connecticut recently. It is so constructed that the surface box instantaneously turns over, depositing each coin into a lower box. This prevents money being taken out of the box, and it exposes those who pretend to make an "offering" but do not, for the gesture is not followed by the jingle.

ON page 771 of "The Golden Manual" I find that if the pope should declare war against the government of the United States all true Catholics would be compelled to take the side of the pope against the government, and St. Thomas is authority for the statement that if the pope should curse the government of the United States every consistent orthodox Roman Catholic would be absolved from his oath of allegiance to the government.—The American Protestant.

WHEN Rome has spoken that is the end of the matter.—Augustine. Let him that desires to grow in godliness giv himself up to a learned confessor, and be obedient to him as to God.—Philip de Neri. Let God arise: let him repress, confound, annihilate this unbridled license of speaking, writing, and publishing.—Pope Leo XII. It will be a glorious day for Catholics in this country when, under the laws of justice and morality, our school system shall be shivered to pieces.—The Catholic Telegraph. The bearing of the Catholics of the United States fills me with hope for the future of the church.—Pope Pius IX.

THE Christian Statesman, the organ of the National Reform Association, thinks of the ladies leading the W. C. T. U.: "The heartiness and intelligence, the faith and courage, with which these Christian women embrace and advocate the fundamental principles of Christian government are most gratifying."

GERALD MASSEY, who is said to be on his way to this country to lecture, stirred up considerable feeling here about fifteen years ago by delivering a lecture that was regarded as blasphemous, and whose title was a query as to why his satanic majesty was not vanquished. Mr. Massey, who was a silk-mill hand and straw-plaiter before he was a Freethought and labor reform poet, is now sixty years old.

THE whole nation of France seems to be in the hands of the drillmaster, and large bodies of troops are constantly moved from point to point on the frontier. The strategic advantages of railways are constantly improved. All France is virtually mobilized and is ready for action. Bulgaria is also under military sway and ready for any emergency. Austria is gradually bringing her forces up to a degree of efficiency never before equaled. All of highly Christian Europe is ready for war.

MEDFORD, Mass., Oct. 7.—James Nichols, four years of age, to-day came home from the session of Sunday-school swelling with the information that Jesus had walked upon the water. It made such an impression upon his imagination that he could not be content until he had tried to do the same thing. Secretly he went to the bathroom of the family, filled the bathtub with water, and attempted the feat that was agitating his little mind. The result was that he was nearly drowned. Taken out of the water, his first spluttering effort at articulation appeared in the sentence: "I ain't no kind of a Jesus."

ONE of the first things that strikes the stranger in St. Petersburg, and still more in Moscow, is the constant crossing that goes on in the streets. Whenever a devout Russian passes a church or a shrine or a holy altar he lifts his hat and crosses himself in the fashion of the Eastern church. In Moscow the number of shrines is so great and the sanctity of some of them so overpowering that it must be difficult for the devout orthodox to get along the street.—Contemporary Review. Among the nations classed as civilized, Russia stands as one of the most ignorant, poverty-stricken, despotic, anti-republican, and miserable.

WE still hav divinely ordained monarchs besides the czar. William I. of Germany said that his crown was "a symbol of absolute authority from God, and not to be taken away by man." His private secretary relates that he once ventured to change the words, "Providence willed us," to "Providence permitted us," in an imperial address being dictated to him, suggesting to the emperor that "we cannot know what providence has willed." "Do you think, then," replied William, "that I could hav borne the heavy burden of this war, or that such triumphs would hav been possible, had I not been firmly convinced that Providence had willed it so, and chosen us for his instruments? Write exactly what I dictated to you." The secretary still objecting, the emperor seized the pen in displeasure and wrote in the word himself.

LATE description of the Chinese people: "Tradition and custom are everything to them. They are linked to the dead past by the unbreakable bonds of precedent; they are chained to a historical corpse. Their blind prejudice against post-mortem examinations still leaves them in ignorance of human anatomy; the functions of the heart, lungs, liver, and other organs are sealed books to them; they make no distinction between veins and arteries, or nerves and tendons. In medicin, ignorance and superstition prevail, and the medical board at Pekin, in the exercise of its profound wisdom, has sanctioned such remedies as dried red-spotted lizards, silk-worm moths, tortoise and oyster shells, dragon's teeth, verdigris, bear's gall, shavings of rhinoceros's horns, elephant's skin, etc. In astronomy, their Chaldean heritage, they hav progressed no further than popularly to believe that the earth is square and flat, and that eclipses are caused by some monster attacking the sun or moon. Their agricultural methods are of the most primitiv sort. And so it goes through all their so-called arts and sciences. They hav not the inherent life and power to break their way out of the cocoon of early superstition. Although as a nation they are forty centuries old, they are yet in the first stages of evolution. We Americans liv more in one year than they in forty; we hav made more progress in a hundred years than they in four thousand." The above is an exact description of our condition during the thousand years of Christianity before that antinaturalism began to be weakened by Rationalism and free investigation.

Communications.

More Miracles and Evolution.

So far we hav seen that the alleged miracles of Jesus were, in some instances, harmful in their result, in others doubtful, in others stupid, and in others useless—admitting, for the sake of argument, that they were really accomplished. The account of St. Peter's so-called miraculous deliverance from prison by the aid of an angel is susceptible of more than one interpretation, but if the event actually happened, it was undoubtedly a very fortunate occurrence for Peter; but unless Peter or the angel wrote "The Acts," we hav not their word for it, and it may hav been that Peter made his escape from prison, or was released, without the aid of an angel, or indeed without any supernatural assistance.

In the Acts of the Apostles, too, we read that St. Paul carried on what, in these days, would be called a little "faith healing" business. He is said to hav healed a man who was a cripple from his birth. All he did was to say to the man in a loud voice, "Stand upright on thy feet." And the man leaped and walked. Perhaps he was not used to being shouted at. It was a good miracle if it occurred, but it would hav seemed more satisfactory if he had operated on a one-legged man and miraculously supplied him with a fresh limb.

A little further on St. Paul is alleged to hav restored a young man named Eutychus to life. It appears that while Paul was delivering an eloquent discourse, Eutychus became so interested that he fell into a deep sleep—a not unnatural thing to do when listening to a dreary sermon—and "fell down from the third loft and was taken up dead." But Paul went down and fell on him and said: "Trouble not yourselvs, for his life is in him." Now, if the young man were really dead it was surely a little perversion of the truth for St. Paul to say that "his life was in him;" and if his "life was in him," then there was no miracle performed by St. Paul, and his falling upon the young man was an additional punishment to the injured youth.

And so we may leave the miracles of the New Testament with this reflection, that there was not much utility in them if they occurred, but that the miracles of the New Testament were immensely superior to those recorded in the Old.

And to come to miracles in general. What hav we to say with regard to them?

1. That the performance of them would be a violation of all the laws of nature.

2. That they are never attested by trustworthy evidence.

3. That they are opposed to the human experience in all ages of enlightenment.

4. That they are opposed to the great doctrin of evolution. And by laws of nature are not meant some divine commands which are rigidly carried out in the operations of natural forces, but merely the observed order of phenomena.

Human experience givs the very best warrant for the belief that nature's laws are uniform in their mode of operation; that each and every event is preceded by some other event without which it could not happen, and with which it is bound to happen, or, in other words, that the phenomena of nature consist of one long chain of causes and effects which is practically endless.

Now, it must be perfectly obvious to any rational creature that, if this be true, miracles cannot happen, for the happening of a miracle would be the disturbance of the whole order of phenomena, and since all events are the necessary consequence of previous events through all time, the performance of a miracle would involve the undoing of this endless series of phenomena. Feuerbach well expresses it when he says: "Who suspends one law of nature suspends them all."

The study of astronomy and natural philosophy affords us ample proof that the same laws which govern the earth on which we liv, also govern the stars and other heavenly bodies. Professor Büchner says: "The laws of gravitation, i.e., the laws of motion and attraction, are, in all space reached by the telescope, invariably the same. The motions of all the most remote bodies take place according to the same laws by which on our earth a stone falls, or the pendulum vibrates, etc. All astronomical calculations regarding the motions of distant bodies, and which are based upon these known laws, hav proved perfectly correct. Astronomers hav pointed out the existence of stars which were only discovered after being sought for in the spots indicated; they predict solar and lunar eclipses, and calculate the reappearance of comets in centuries to come. The form of Jupiter was deduced from the laws of rotation, and was verified by direct observation. We know that the planets hav their seasons, days, and nights, like the earth, though they differ in length" (Force and Matter, pages 111, 112).

This learned writer then carries his illustration into other departments of physical science. He says: "The laws of light through all space are the same as on our earth. Everywhere has it the same velocity and composition, and its refraction takes place in a similar manner. The light which the most remote fixed stars transmit to us through a space of billions of miles, differs in nothing from the light of our sun; it acts according to the same laws, and has the same composition."

We possess not less sufficient grounds proving that the bodies in the universe possess two of the same properties as our earth, and the objects upon it, namely, impenetrability and divisibility. The laws of heat are like those of light—everywhere the same. The heat emanating from the sun acts according to the same principles as that radiating from the earth. But it is upon the relation of heat that the solid, liquid, and aeriform states of bodies depend; these states must therefore exist under the same conditions. Again, electricity, magnetism, etc., are so intimately connected with the evolution of heat that they cannot be separated; consequently, wherever heat is, that is to say everywhere, there must also be these forces. The same may be asserted of the relation of heat to the mode of chemical combination and decomposition, which must everywhere take place in a similar manner.

Meteoric stones—visible messengers from another world—afford a more direct proof. In these remarkable bodies, which are projected from other heavenly bodies, or from the primordial ether, there has as yet no element been discovered which is not already existing upon the earth, nor is the form of those crystals different from those known to us.

The history of the origin and development of our earth is analogous to that of the heavenly bodies. The spheroidal forms of the planets prove that they, like the earth, were once in a fluid state, and the gradual development to present form that we find in the case of the earth must, in similar manner, hav taken place in all other planets.

In the foregoing passages Dr. Büchner has admirably demonstrated the universality of the laws which regulate all bodies in the universe.

It is perfectly clear that if the laws of nature were not immutable man could not calculate with any certainty upon the happening of any single event; all the forces acting haphazard, or having no inherent qualities of attraction or repulsion, would cause irreparable confusion.

It follows consequently from the universality of the laws of nature that the performance of a miracle would mean the suspension of all these laws, and the production of universal chaos.

Secondly, no alleged miracle has been attested by sound or trustworthy evidence.

The Old Testament miracles are not recorded by eye-witnesses, and even if they were, unless we knew what sort of persons the writers were, whether they were wise or foolish, credulous or careful in the examination of evidence, we could not determin the exact degree of credibility to be attached to their statements.

That Moses was not the author of the Pentateuch is now regarded by all who are capable of forming a just judgment on the matter as beyond all doubt. It is equally certain that two or more writers contributed toward the production of the first five books of the Bible, and from their writings we are entitled to say that they were unable to discriminate between the tricks of a conjurer and the appalling phenomena of the universe.

Of the other writers we may say that they were either self-deceived or so credulous that they believed everything they were told concerning alleged extraordinary events that were said to hav happened at the time at which they wrote.

Nor can it be said that the alleged miracles of the New Testament are properly attested. Such evidence as is offered for them would be rejected by any magistrate as altogether inadequate. The question then is, What evidence is required to establish the truth of such extraordinary events? In the first place, we require the evidence of eye-witnesses; in the second place, we require the evidence of individuals who were not likely to be deceived, and thirdly, we want the evidence of persons who were not interested in telling a falsehood to maintain some theory which they believed to be true.

In no case hav we got such witnesses. The alleged writers of the gospels do not pretend that they witnessed the performance of the miracles, and if they did their testimony would not be considered as conclusiv, since they may be regarded as interested, nay, highly prejudiced, in favor of the occurrence of the miracles.

David Hume years ago laid it down that we may accept it as a general maxim "that no testimony is sufficient to establish a miracle unless the testimony be of such a kind that its falsehood would be more miraculous than the fact which it endeavors to establish, and even in that case there is a mutual destruction of arguments, and the superior only givs us an assurance suitable to that degree of force which remains after deducting the inferior.

"When anyone tells me that he saw a dead man restored to life I immediately consider with myself whether it would be more probable that this person should either deceive or be deceived, or that the fact which he relates should really hav happened. I weigh the one miracle against the other, and according to the superiority which I discover I pronounce my decision, and always reject the greater miracle. If the falsehood of the testimony would be more miraculous than the event which he relates, then and not till then can he pretend to command my belief or opinion."

Sometimes the discussion of this question of the happening of miracles is rendered exceedingly confusing by the employment of the word "miracle" in a different sense altogether from that which we are now considering.

In one sense, as Thomas Paine points out, everything in nature is a miracle, that is to say, its very existence is wonderful and strange to man.

Walt Whitman says:

What shall I giv? And which are my miracles?
Realism is mine—my miracles. Take freely,
Take without end. I offer them to you,
Wherever your feet can carry you, or your eyes reach.
Why! Who makes much of a miracle?
As to me I know nothing else but miracles.
To me every hour of the light and dark is a miracle;
Every inch of space is a miracle;
Every square yard of the surface of the earth is spread with the same;
Every cubic foot of the interior swarms with the same;
Every spear of grass—the frames, limbs, organs of men and women and all that concerns them—
All these to me are unmistakably perfect miracles.
To me the sea is a continual miracle—
The fishes that swim, the rocks, the motion of the waves, the ships with men in them—
What stranger miracles are there?

But it is quite clear that the poet is not using the word miracle in the sense of a marvelous and supernatural event.

Raising dead people to life, feeding thousands on five loaves and two fishes, walking on the surface of the sea, opening the eyes of the blind, ascending into heaven through the clouds, these and like events are occurrences which are not in harmony with nature's every-day performances, which contradict human experience, and which, if we are expected to believe at all, would require the most conclusiv kind of evidence to substantiate.

If a man said that he saw another raised from the dead to-day, who would believe him? No one. If he affirmed that he himself was so raised, we should probably get a strait-waistcoat for him. But if he declared that somebody saw a miracle happen hundreds of years ago when there was no printing-press, when the masses were ignorant and credulous, when every event that was not understood was regarded as miraculous, Christians would say, "We believe it." But if he went on to allege that the said miracle was performed by Mohammed, they would smile and say, "Mohammed! Oh, he was an impostor!"

Each religionist denies the miracles of the other; each affirms the other's to hav been "mere jugglery," and the Rationalist denies them all.

With the truth of the doctrin of evolution firmly impressed upon his mind, with a clear understanding of the oneness of nature in spite of her multifarious manifestations, the Rationalist is fortified against delusions of every kind.

He knows that in the realm of matter each event forms a link in an endless chain of causes and effects, and what is true of matter is true of mind. Each thought is indissolubly connected with every other thought throughout all eternity. Nothing absolutely begins in nature, and nothing ends; all is change—a ceaseless unfolding of events, an endless transformation of the one eternal substance. In nature everything is natural, and the word supernatural in the past has always been the term by which man has separated the known from the unknown, and with the ever accumulating force of knowledge the unknown will gradually giv way to the known, and the supernatural at last be expunged from the vocabulary of man.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

ELLENSBURG, WASHINGTON TERR., Sept. 8, 9, 10.—This is the most ambitious and energetic town in the eastern part of Washington territory. They are making vigorous efforts to entitle them to hav the capital removed from pretty sleepy old Olympia to this handsome city of progress, and if energy and push can win, Ellensburg is sure to become the capital. I counted over a dozen handsome brick and twenty frame buildings in course of construction.

The trinity of truth seekers here consists of John L. Dirks, a young enthusiast for Liberalism, bright, cultured, genial, a careful reader and earnest student; George Parrish, an A1 self-sacrificing worker for human progress, and William Rehuike, the reliable stand-by, and universally respected, outspoken Infidel. The three lectures were delivered at the court house, the attendance increasing at each lecture. The first night the Rev. Mr. Denton, a Campbellite minister, took exception to three points in my lecture:

1. That there was no text in the Bible teaching that Sunday should be kept as the Sabbath.

2. That the God of the Bible over and over again declares there never had been, never was, never should be a savior.

3. That ministers feared investigation and endeavored to keep people from reading Liberal publications or attending Liberal lectures.

I at once offered him one half the time the next evening, either the first or second hour, to discuss these questions, and he accepted.

The announcement of the discussion filled the court house. The reverend spent the first half hour in silly, gross personalities, and then admitted there was no text in the Bible teaching Sunday observance. This was an awful shock to the Christians, for they came expecting an able defense of Sunday, especially as many of them knew that only two weeks ago he had served a blacksmith in his neighborhood with a written notice that if he did any more work in his blacksmith shop on Sunday, the holy Sabbath of God, he, the Rev. Mr. Denton, would prosecute him with the utmost rigor of the law.

He dodged the Bible God's denials of a savior, and wound up with a Salvation Army exhortation to believe in Jesus.

It was too good. He had said nothing that called for any reply, but afforded me opportunity to lay facts and fallacies of the gospel plan of salvation before a large number of devout Christians whom I could never hav reached under other circumstances. On Sunday evening I had another immense audience and delivered a lecture on "The Bible: Whence it Came and What It Really Teaches." Rev. Mr. Denton attended and took notes.

WALLA WALLA, WASHINGTON TERR., Sept. 11, 12, 13.—Sol Center, the most able and highly respected business man of Walla Walla, had just recuperated from a long attendance at the sick-bed of an unfortunate young fellow who had been most horribly burnt at an incendiary fire at a hotel. In case of suffering or affliction there is no tenderer heart, no more generous soul, nor one more ready self-sacrificingly to help anyone in need, than Sol Center, the outspoken Infidel.

The following editorial published in the Walla Walla Daily Journal, Friday, Sept. 21, 1888, is testimony from a religious opponent, and gives the best idea of the lectures and how they were received:

REYNOLDS, THE EX-REVEREND.

C. B. Reynolds, formerly a minister of the gospel, but now an Infidel, and in many ways a second Robert Ingersoll, lectured for the last three nights at Small's Opera House to large and indeed fashionable, intelligent audiences. We never had the pleasure of listening to the able speaker till last night, and, judging from the manner in which he handled the subject, from an Infidel point of view, he is well schooled in theology and in the use and abuse of the Bible and its contents. He is undoubtedly a scholar, full of action, rich in language, and forcible in his illustrations. To one raised from childhood beneath the shadow of a church, whose early impressions regarding God and our savior are deep and inflexible, the lecturer appears like a bold yet not a bad man. Mr. Reynolds seems to be sincere, rational, and respectful toward those who may differ with him. He has a very pleasing address and stands there like a poet, full of wisdom and mental resources. We could listen to such a man night after night and yet after all stay where we are and not budge an inch from the glorious belief in which our fathers died. Mr. Reynolds's doctrin is full of wit and humor, acrimony, and even good horse sense, but the hope which every human seeks and naturally longs for is not there.

All three of the daily papers gave complimentary notices.

There are a host of generous, cultured Liberals in Walla Walla. On Friday afternoon we had a special meeting of Liberals at the Opera House, when I laid before them the practical plan of organization—how to conduct science schools without a teacher, etc.—and the initiatory steps were taken in the organization of the Walla Walla Liberal Society.

I go from here to Utah, and will giv a full, fair account of Mormonism as I find it.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Intoxicants.—License.—Absurdity.

The most perfect popular government is that in which an injury offered to the meanest individual is considered an insult upon the whole constitution.—Solon.

A perfectly civilized man can never be perfectly happy while there is one unhappy being in this universe.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

To be nobly wrong is more manly than to be meanly right.—Thomas Paine.

Contact with vicious persons has a tendency to either deaden our sensibility of, or enliven our attachment to, virtue. Too many are slumbering with their morality. They rest tranquil, satisfied with their own goodness. Contentment with one's self is an exhibition of selfishness. The average moral man, contented with existence in this world, and satisfied with his supposed chance in the next, is apt to overlook the misery, ignorance, and degradation attending the lives of others. It must be admitted, if the human race has been given a mission to perform—an end to reach—that the requirements of the creator will be fully met only when true happiness has been attained, not by one individual, but by all. Universal happiness is heaven. There is no wiser way to please God than to light the darkened paths of ignorance with the bright sunshine of intelligence, alleviate the sorrows of the oppressed with charity, and reclaim the degraded. Let all who are tender-hearted survey the world, listen to the groans and witness the tears of Siberian exiles, see the thorn of poverty in the side of London, hear of the crimes and immorality of Paris, think of the poor subjects of all the despotic governments, ascertain the condition of the laboring class (even in America), reflect that human (inhuman) slavery still exists as an institution. He who can, before this array of evidence, remain stolidly indifferent, must possess a "shriveled soul." Many may think that to stand appalled at the misery and crime extant is sufficient; that is to say, they are possessed of enough feeling to notice, but lack the courage to combat. To oppose popular error is to become a martyr. The question arises, What can be done to improve the condition of the race? The task of making the whole world happy is gigantic. The accomplishment seems utterly impossible. But history, observation, and reason teach that the human family, in spite of tremendous difficulties, has advanced—that perfection can be arrived at in the remote future. Let reformation commence at home.

Let us examin into the condition of society in the United States. It is admitted by every decent person, passionately asserted by a few Prohibitionists, and realized by every individual possessing the least sense, that if there is anything productiv of immorality and unhappiness it is the liquor traffic. I do not wish to denounce a single respectable rumseller. They—those who are respectable—admit they are engaged in a mean business. They also declare the foolishness of many of their customers. This shows that even a grog-slinger is sometimes not ashamed of his opinion, a trait to be commended. Why do not the licensed saloonkeepers deserve more respect than they receive? Why not treat them decently? They are granted the privilege of selling intoxicants by the government. Their business is legalized. A righteous government would not sanction other than respectable business. What possible excuse can the majority of Christian churches hav for excluding a lawful rumseller? A person who obeys the laws of a just government ought not to be unfit for church membership. Is further argument needed to prove that communicants should not be in favor of licensing the liquor industry? All candid men will admit that every thinker has, or supposes he has, sufficient reasons for thinking as he does. Let us inquire for the reasons of those who are in favor of licensing the abominable liquor business. We will first analyze the case of the most assuredly certain clamorer for license—the rum-dealer. After subtracting those of this guild for whom we cherish notions of respect—a microscopic portion—we hav remaining those whom we choose to speak of. These proprietors of groggeries envelop a vast deal of the propensity, avarice. Ignorance is also a great characteristic of theirs. It may be claimed they are hypocritical to a certain extent to their drunken customers, but it is impossible for them to deceive the sober world regarding their character. I insist that the prerequisits of these rumsellers are avarice, ignorance, and hypocrisy.

If any intelligent reader regards this as a mere assertion, let him become acquainted with one of the class to which I allude. It is no wonder such dealers favor license. The reason is obvious. What other order of citizens believe in license? The drunkards, of course. I most cheerfully admit these gentlemen cannot consistently be stigmatized as largely as hav been their friends the gin-dealers. It must be acknowledged that there are many really intelligent inebriates—many who would never pollute themselvs by selling the beverage they hanker after.

Drunkards are avaricious—they covet drink. Pecuniary avarice belongs to the rumseller, not his victim. Drunkards are usually good hypocrits, for they seldom admit they are drunkards. I insist that drunkards are generally hypocritical, occasionally intelligent, and always covetous. What other class believes in license? The moderate drinkers. Who are they? If the drunkards are not hypocrits, the term moderate drinker is a false appellation. I rather think it not advisable to proceed further on this delicate ground. Let us run away from the moderate drinkers; they are a peculiar set. Who can draw the line? Perhaps the drunkards and moderate drinkers had better be allowed to make the distinction. Who else favors license? The compromisers. Do they drink? No; at least they say they do not. They themselvs never sell intoxicants. No; at least they say they would not.

Do they consider the liquor business respectable? No; at least they say they do not. They do not want money made in this business? No; at least they say they do not. Then why do they believe in licensing the most diabolical business in this world? Well, they say, to benefit the town they reside in. Do they not expect individual reward? Yes. How? They hope to be relieved of an enormous burden. What? A small part of their taxes. Great heavens! these compromisers are more stupidly ignorant, avaricious, and hypocritical than either the rumseller or his bar patron. They (the compromisers) also occupy the strongholds of ignorance, avarice, and hypocrisy, and they are the superior officers, the rumsellers and drunkards being merely subordinates. These despicable, compromising ignoramuses say they do not sympathize with the rumsellers—say they do not wish to make their living by selling liquor. Yes, they say so; but it is simply say. What do they do? They favor license with the intention of lowering their taxes and becoming participants in the profits of the liquor trade. Nothing is done in this world without expectation of reward. The laborer voting for protection has the intention of preventing a reduction in his wages. The prevention is his recompense. The free trade advocate insists upon a lessening of the cost of living. The lessening is his pay. Invariably the respectable liquor-dealer seeks license. Respectability rewards him. It is perfectly apparent that a believer in license is simply an indorser of the willingly admitted terrible results of liquor-drinking. In other words, he sanctions, givs consent to, the commission of crime, and with a mercenary motiv. Prohibition will never wholly prevent the manufacture, sale, and use of rum or equivalents, but it will be satisfactory to all followers of conscience who believe, if wrong is wrong, it is wrong for government to smile on wrong and say, For a certain sum of money you can wrong.

It is generally believed that in those states and places where Prohibition has been adopted just as much liquor is sold as if the business was licensed. The drunkards say just as much is used. Is this not equivalent to the rumsellers saying to the majority, "We hav no regard for your feelings. Your views are none of our business. We hav our dupes and they must hav their toddy. For you who are conscientiously against our nefarious occupation we hav no respect whatever. We still continue to sell our mind-desolating liquid, and insist upon lighting the torch of debauchery in our now darkened den of infamy." What does the drunken sot say? "What care I what the majority think? I am not a slave of government. It is claimed that I am controled by appetite, to which I reply, Yes, and say, Delightful bondage. I hav no regard for anyone, no true feeling toward my family. All I ask of the rumseller is drink. I don't care for him. I hav no respect for myself, as you can easily see by my appearance. The sum total of all I regard sufficiently important for me to consider is my appetite. I prefer to exhibit myself as usual in the school paths of your innocent children, that they may see intoxication is popular. Popularity is right. I must continue to mightily contribute toward supporting in luxury the rumseller and his happy family, and, as ordinarily, devote my mite for the subsistence of my own wife and worse than orphan children. It is absolutely necessary for me to 'cover my hearthstone with serpents' and endeavor to induce them to occupy my brain."

Why do the majority continue to allow their will to be thwarted? Why are officers elected in Prohibition states who prove pueril and impotent in dealing with such miscreants? The fault undoubtedly lies with those who are "slumbering with their morality."

The priests, ministers, communicants, and prominent citizens are the ones who should tackle this glaring evil, but, unfortunately, they are generally engrossed in a more lucrativ employment. To all who are uncompromisingly in favor of reason, I offer the following quotation from Thomas Paine, the thinker, patriot, and author-hero of the American Revolution—a Deist: "That in which every man is interested, is every man's duty to support. And any burden which falls equally on all men, and from which every man is to receive an equal benefit, is consistent with the most perfect ideas of liberty. . . . There never was a scheme against which objections might not be raised. But this alone is not a sufficient reason for rejection. The only line to judge truly upon, is to draw out and admit all the objections which can fairly be made, and place against them all the contrary qualities, conveniences, and advantages, then by striking a balance you come at the true character of any scheme, principle, or position."

I know of no better rules to be guided by than Paine's. Make use of them in attempting to solve the liquor problem and you will become at least a sentimental Prohibitionist. The man who is ashamed to defend his principles, whatever they be, or refuses to do so through mere discretion, has no principles, and is so disgustingly saturated with the odor of insignificance that he can be appropriately consigned to the shade of a skunk's-cabbage. Indiscretion is ofttimes an evidence of honesty. Wise dishonesty is ever circumspect. The world contains too many living pantographs.

Philadelphia. Oct. 11, 1888.

To the Members of the American Secular Union

Friends and Patriots: When informed of my election to the presidency of your institution, I promptly telegraphed my answer as follows: "Regarding the American Secular Union as an organization for the protection and promotion of the principle implied in its name, and not for the advancement of any dogma of religious belief or disbelief, I cordially accept its presidency, unanimously tendered me, and publicly pledge myself to resist all encroachments of sacerdotalism, whether papal or puritan." It only remains for me now to thank the members of the Union for this token of their confidence, and to promis the utmost firmness and diligence in maintaining the Demands of Liberalism, which I prefer to call the demands of simple justice, and an honest conformity to the Secular principle upon which our government was founded. Respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

This splendid "Roll of Honor" bespeaks the interest, devotion, enthusiasm, and sacrifice which the Liberals of our land are manifesting for the cause of mental liberty. Mark well these names, for their responses to the words of wisdom and warning at the Congress just closed deserve a deathless fame among those who advocate and struggle for human welfare. They prove that Liberals are ready to advance and enforce the Nine Demands—the new Declaration of Independence—and freely giv of their substance to achieve that result. To all these the Secretary sends his salutations in the name and for the cause of Universal Mental Liberty.

Gems of Style.

All readers are familiar with choice selections from various writers; so much so, indeed, it is to be regretted that the familiarity with many through school-books has made them hackneyed and common. Before the age of Queen Elizabeth there seems to hav been no peculiar style among writers; one general mode of expression prevailed, and the brightest ideas were so encumbered with and surrounded by heavy, awkward expressions as to be obscured. This is a little strange, for they had examples of various and even brilliant styles in several familiar Latin authors. They had only to literally translate, to make, with little alteration, some glorious examples. Indeed, it would seem that this was the fountain from whence originally flowed the newer styles of such writers as Temple, Bolingbroke, and others. Thus, Tacitus gives an instance of a style admired by many, one of stirring brevity, in the very introduction of his History: "The period now before me is fertil in vicissitudes; pregnant with sanguinary encounters; embroiled with intestin dissensions; and even in the intervals of peace, deformed with horrors: four princes put to death; three civil wars; with foreign enemies more—sometimes both at once; prosperity in the east; disasters in the west: Illyria convulsed; both the Gauls revolting; Britain conquered and in a moment lost; Sarmatians and Suevians rising against us at once; Dacians renowned for defeats given and sustained, and even the Parthians well-nigh induced to arm against us by the trick of a pretended hero." It is too long to quote, but many lines, with the slightest change, will giv us Macaulay at his best. One more quotation: "The temples, the porticos, and the great halls around the Forum were filled with crowds of sorrowing spectators. A deep and sullen silence prevailed. The very rabble were hushed. Amazement sat in every face. Their eyes watched every motion; their ears caught every sound. It was not tumult; not the stillness of peace; but silence of terrible anticipation and high-wrought resentment."

One of the earliest of Englishmen to write in a polished style was Bolingbroke. Few are familiar with his writings. Some of his remarks are very striking from the manner of expression alone. Here are a few specimens culled randomly:

"A minister stands as much in need of us as we of him; in prosperity he can no more subsist without daily praise than we without daily bread, and the farther he extends his views the more necessary are we to his support. Let him speak as contemptuously of us as he pleases, for that is the manner of those who employ us most and pay us best; yet will it fare with his ambition as with a lofty tree, which cannot shoot its branches into the clouds unless its roots work into the dirt, from which it rose, on which it stands, and by which it is nourished."

If that is not a fine example of Bolingbroke, at his best, I am no judge; and it is a sample of fine composition.

"We hav made the quarrels of other people our own, and find ourselvs engaged as principals in some cases where we hav a very remote concern; in others where we hav none at all."

"My own unfitness to inform, to instruct, and to rouse our countrymen, some from lethargy and some from golden dreams. I may toll the alarm bell, but those of greater strength and skill than I must be called to raise and ring it out into the nation's ear."

"Some he took; some he neglected; and some he managed ill."

"Many things are disguised, many concealed, and hardly any truly shown."

I think Macaulay got something of his style from Bolingbroke—and from a chapter "On the Study of History." Letter VI—in that part entitled, "A View of the Ecclesiastical Government of Europe." The suggestion is there in magnificent description. It seems to me that by combining the best of this and of Tacitus we get Macaulay's style, the most brilliant and fascinating, perhaps, of all writers.

By the way, Tacitus, in two places, shows us the true cause of Rome's submission to her armies and her overthrow. In one place, in the first book of his History, he says: "A secret of empire was then discovered, namely, that elsewhere than at Rome an emperor might be made." Where? In some one of the armies. After Rome conquered the world she kept several great armies north, south, east, and west. In time they were composed entirely of men either born in the armies or recruited from surrounding populations. In time these soldiers were utter strangers to Rome and Italy, attached only to their generals and organization. Hence, the jealousy of generals bidding for commissions from Rome ended in civil war and disruption which despotism alone could weld. In 30 h Agricola, Calgacus, a British chief, described to a mighty multitude the Roman soldier as he was then and had been for over a century, in these celebrated lines: "Robbers of the world, after they hav devastated all the earth they explore the sea. If their enemy is rich, they are avaricious; if poor, ambitious. Neither the rising nor the setting sun hath satisfied them. Alone of all this world they envy and begrudge wealth and want alike. Where they make a solitude they call it peace, and name plunder, murder, and rape, empire. . . . All the incitements to victory are ours; none inspire the Roman husbands; no parents are to be upbraided by flight; to most all of them is no country, or at least a foreign."

Aye, the last words are the key to Rome's downfall. How long could such a monstrous power of doing all, rewarding and punishing all, emanate from Rome, the town, and its paltry people? It was a brain whose arms and legs were "of no country, or else a foreign."

Even early in Elizabeth's age, while such writers as Bacon were struggling in the heavy, pedantic style of the time, some of the dramatists were breaking out into natural forms of grace and beauty, instances of which are common in Shakspere, such as "What a piece of work is man!" etc. Some of these old fellows, treading the path earliest, gathered the most splendid flowers of expression, and such as seemed never to grow again. Perhaps, as Washington Irving was honest and manly to admit: "We old ones had all the advantage. Anything we wrote had the advantage." He meant, advantage as American authors.

There is a rich quotation by De Quincey from Dr. Brown, which he admired as a specimen of the finest writing in our language. It is from the "Urn Burial," and is thus: "Now, since these dead bones hav already outlasted the living ones of Methuselah, and in a yard under ground, and thin walls of clay outworn all the strong and spacious buildings above it, and quietly rested under the drums and tramplings of three conquests." The last words struck him so forcibly.

Here is a sample rarely quoted. It is from De Quincey himself, as whom no man ever had such a perfect command of words, such a power of putting the right word, with its exact shade of meaning and euphony, just where it is wanted. It is from the preface to his essay on "Political Economy," as follows: "Let us judge by analogy from mathematics. If it were possible that but three elementary definitions in geometry should be liable to controversy, what would follow? Simply this, that the whole vast aerial synthesis of that science, at present towering upward toward infinity, would exhibit an edifice eternally, perhaps, renewing itself by parts, but eternally tottering in some parts and in others moldering eternally into ruins. That science which now holds converse with the stars by means of its inevitable and imperishable truths would become as treacherous as Shakspere's 'stems of sand;' or, like the fantastic architecture which the winds are everlastingly pursuing in the Arabian desert, would exhibit phantom arrays of fleeting columns and fluctuating edifices which under the very breath that created them would be forever collapsing into dust."

One or two of the finest things in our language are in "Noctes Ambrosianæ." Professor Wilson in that work produces imagined conversations between himself, De Quincey, Hogg, and other famous contemporaries. For a sample of strength and terseness take the following by Hogg: "I turn to the mountains, Mr. North, and stern they stan' in a glorious gloom; for the sun is struggling wi' a thunder cloud, and, facing him, a faint but fast brightening rainbow." That I call pure diamond; perfection in brevity. I think that description and what follows it for a page will be read forever. But this is already too long. HOLT.

Mr. Benjamin Driving the Last Nail Into Mr. Freshman's Coffin.

More facts and less theology, if you please. Two boys once endeavored to outwit each other in boasting. Said one, "My father put up a French roof upon our country cottage." "But," responded the other promptly, "my father put up an immense mortgage upon our country house."

The Independent, too, ever since my crusade against falsehood—alias Freshman's Christianity—tries to counterbalance my writings by articles pertaining to the glorious results of the Jewish missionary swindle. Thus the Independent of September 6th devoted two columns to "Jewish Mission Statistics and Work." After vouching for Dr. Dallman's reliability, it presents the minutest statistics of the vast sums wasted, the number of missionaries, stations, population, et al. But it winds up with the most disastrous results, as it leaves us to grope in the dark as to the success achieved—the number of converts yielded. Unblushingly the article winds up: "Dr. Dallman thinks it impossible to give complete statistics of the converts from Judaism to Christianity. For a number of reasons, many of the societies do not publish statistics of their success" Shame, where is thy blush?

While the well paid missionaries and agents find ample time to receive their boodle, they then suddenly become busy, preventing them from keeping an account of how many head of converts they raise annually.

As another counterbalance to my epistles, an article over a page in dimensions appeared in the Independent of September 20th, dwelling upon the Rabbinowitz fizzle in Russia. As an adherer to facts, I will state that the article in question has been quietly reposing in the Independent's pigeonhole ever since last May. But now it has crept out in its full glory to outshine my bright and true facts in THE TRUTH SEEKER. To dwell in detail upon that page in the Independent would, I fear, tire out the patience of your intelligent readers. Suffice it to say that, while the Christian at Work some time ago claimed that Rabbinowitz baptized fifty thousand Jews in the city of Kishineff, out of a Jewish population of twenty-five thousand, the Independent is satisfied with one hundred and fifty converts. Thus the difference between the two accounts is 49,850 only.

But why carry the war into the land of the czar of all the Russias, when, in our own blessed country—in its very metropolis—a board of trustees comprising the most eminent divines, and presided over by an equally eminent lawyer, is represented by a man who is creating corners in faith, a son of a rabbi, playing havoc with the Jewish soul? He offers to extract old souls and insert new ones without pain. Old souls are bought and sold, the highest cash price paid for cast-off souls, with the gratifying results that a line of Jews with dilapidated souls is constantly streaming into Freshman's place of business. In fact, the rush is so great that policemen, with their clubs, hav to be called to keep back the surging crowds. This, no doubts, accounts for a policeman being called in last Thursday night to drive me away from his so called reading-room, about which we read in his sixth annual report, page 8: "On Tuesday and Thursday evenings this room is thrown open to all Jews who come."

Now, gentle reader, allow me to conduct you into the sanctum sanctorum in which the soul-renovator Freshman sways the scepter of faith over the faithful pocketbooks of his dupes. The glittering letters are Hebrew characters comprising the Lord's Prayer, about which my certified check for $500 was six years ago deposited with the New York Herald to be distributed for charity, if that hypocritical spiritual beggar, Freshman, would translate it into English. Life is too short to present more facts of the dark ways into which Christian divines, editors, and pocketbooks are led astray by that black, falsifying ignoramus Freshman.

Now the good old soul J. M. Buckley, D.D., a devout reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, not daring to come out against myself, attacks the organ where my articles are so piercing. This mode of attack only an editor of a Christian weekly is capable of making. But, my dear Rev. Dr. Editor Buckley—you, a disciple of Christ, a teacher to thousands of your readers—in fact, all the eyes of the Methodist denomination are upon you—why so forget yourself as to fly into such a passion for my innocent act of telling the truth? Like a valuable gem, no matter where it is lost, no one will hesitate to dive for its recovery. Truth, no matter where it is told, loses none of its value. The unconverted Jewish sages hav an axiom: "Accept the truth, from wherever it comes." It is true the mere name of TRUTH SEEKER is enough to frighten away the Christian press. That my articles contain the truth and nothing but the truth is self-evident, for had Freshman and his seventeen clergymen trustees, with an eminent lawyer as president, had a shadow of a doubt in my capability of proving my every assertion, they would ere now hav been instrumental in sending me up to state prison for libel for the balance of my natural life.

In order to exonerate themselvs for permitting Christianity to be polluted and uphold their own false self pride, Dr. Buckley pours out his wrath upon the source whence my truthful statements emanate. But who would believe that the secular press, whose whole business is to manufacture scandals of the highest and lowest degrees—how married clergymen elope with laymen's wives and daughters, how laymen photograph their sleeping-beauty wives in the arms of everybody but their own husbands—would now blush when their attention is called to the school for scandal at St. Freshman's?

The editors of the secular press, radiant in blushes like Vassar girls, advised me to start a paper of my own. When I offered to back my abilities against their capital, they changed the subject.

The truth-hater, Freshman, in the mean time is preaching the gospel, informing his dupes how difficult it is for any faithful Christian with a fat pocketbook to squeeze himself through the gates of heaven. As an infallible remedy he prescribes to hav the cumbersome pocketbook deposited with him, for which sum he will issue a letter of credit, bearing enormous interest, to his exchequer, St. Paul, whenever the Christian is ready to die. The duped Christian who is familiar with Christianity's teaching, that in order to die rich, one must liv poor; in order to die happy, one must liv in misery, parts like a fool with his shekels. Freshman, like the fox in Esop's fable, walks off with the boodle smiling. In order to make the contents of the pocketbook doubly safe he invests it in faith, which he and his good wife can solace themselvs with whenever their stomach is empty or a new spring bonnet is needed.

Such a mode of falsification is guarded against being revealed by eminent divines and editors. But the cat was let out of the bag by a certain Christian minister who, I promising not to divulge his identity, said: "Why, my dear sir, the actions of the clerical trustees, president, and editors are as clear as daylight. They who know your capability of proving every assertion you make against Freshman, are afraid that the questions propounded by you will be a difficult task for both Freshman and themselvs to answer. Hence their supreme silence."

If such be the case, I will say that I pledge myself to question only on such points as neither Christian layman nor minister is expected to know. In fact, I will touch upon no point of theology whatsoever. I will confine myself solely to Freshman, whom I intend to catch in his own trap, and then prove his falsifying, black character, that he is obtaining Christian money under false pretenses. Should I fail to substantiate my assertions, I pledge myself to make my apology as public as my accusation, with a fair prospect of becoming a modern St. Paul in place of an ancient Saul of Tarsus.

But alas! Christianity, with boy preachers and men cheaters, with seventeen of its most eminent divines, besides eminent editors, are kept at bay by whom? By a Jew born and raised in barbaric Russia, where his soul and body were fettered by the shackles of persecution and bigoted fanaticism, but who for the last decade and a half inhaled some whiffs of freedom of thought, and already succeeded, fourteen years ago, in silencing the bombastic talk of Freshman's partner in trade, Ex Rabbi Missionary Emanuel Stamowitz as my letter in the New York Herald of Feb. 15, 1874, will demonstrate. This, of course, is too well known to the present backers of Freshman & Co. Hence they tremble in their divine shoes, not daring to meet truth face to face.

To recapitulate, I will say that Freshman & Co., upon whom thousands of dollars are spent annually to promote Christianity among the Jews, not only waste that money but help to promote falsehood, cheating, and depravity of the worst form. Again, the hirelings of the Freshman type are an insult to the intelligent Jew, besides adding fuel and helping to feed the blazing fires of Infidelity.

Since such despicable, disgraceful, mercenary, convert mongering institutions are guarded by falsifying statements written and printed by both pulpit and press, it is conclusiv evidence that both clergy and editors are protecting their own bread and butter, as the millions appropriated for missionary work, directly or indirectly, find their way into the pockets of minister and editor.

As I intend to take leave, for the present, at least, of THE TRUTH SEEKER I wish to extend my sincerest thanks for the use of its columns. "Be strong and of good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed." You hav the most sacred mission on hand—to stamp out falsehood with your extinguisher,

THE TRUTH SEEKER. A BENJAMIN.

Great spouter, shouter most horrisonous!
Whose legs and arms keep wonderfully busy,
Whose wild grimace is nothing if not dizzy,
Whose mouth a bleak void is and cavernous.
An ape in action, parrot-like in speech,
With ganglionic nerves of India-rubber—
Befitting, possibly, a devil drubber—
Quite fit thou art the Holy Queer to preach!
Grotesque, uncouth contortionist art thou,
A veritable jumping jack in motion,
Moved by hypocrisy, or fetid lotion
Distilled from Superstition's reeking slough!
Some thusly think of thee, O pampered pastor,
And thou the Champion Theologaster!

To save unnecessary travel Liberals in those states mentioned, and in Kansas, should address him promptly at Monte Vista, Col., and dates for lectures will be assigned as soon as route is made up. He will receive subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER, New Thought, and Freethought.

CHARITY is the greatest of all Christian virtues, and consists in loving with our whole hearts a God with whom we hav but the very slightest acquaintance, or his priests, with whom we are very well acquainted indeed. It moreover requires us to love our neighbor as ourselvs that is, provided he loves God and his priests and is beloved by them, otherwise it is charity to murder him. But the most genuin and efficacious charity is that which greases the paws of the priests; such charity covereth a multitude of sins.—Voltaire.

The "Good Book."

In reading the "holy scriptures" we are every now and then made to stumble on strokes of policy of the great I Am toward his chosen people so ineffably mean, so shabby, so disgusting, in fact, that a feeling of positiv refreshment follows their recital—thankfulness that other arguments hav been added to fortify our repudiation of all claims that he is the "Lord God Almighty before whom every knee shall bow and whom every tongue shall confess."

Not to his dear Hebrews alone did he confine his low, unseemly treatment. Waiving his Egyptian eruptions of divine anger, the Assyrians came in for a share of his degrading savagery, a savagery unworthy an ugly boy, even. Because they knew not the manner of the gods of the land, he sent lions among them, and "behold they slew them"—leaving the reader in doubt who were the slayers, the Assyrians or the lions.

A queer lot of missionaries to send among a nation as instructors. But not to educate them were they sent, but to giv them to understand that "they must fear the Lord." We are told in the same holy pages that "the sin of ignorance God winks at." He was "not i' the view" to wink then, doubtless.

In the next chapter we find the Assyrian envoy, Rabshakeh, telling Hezekiah, the Jewish representativ, that "the people who sat upon the walls shall eat ——" well, something so utterly offensiv that I refuse to mention the words, giving my readers chapter and verse (2 Kings xviii, 27).

In the chapter following we find the great Jehovah back at his old ferocities: "The angel of the Lord smote in the camp of the Assyrians one hundred four score and five thousand, and when they arose early in the morning, behold they were all dead corpses." Live corpses would be startling enough, but corpses arising early in the morning must hav been stunning. Reading along, the same beastly blundering history is continued.

"On horror's head horrors accumulate."

And yet we find a mind in our day, a mind of such splendid proportions as to be fitted to rule a great nation, holding in his keeping the best interests of millions; a mind disposed to be merciful and just, but so besotted by his early teachings on the subject of the Bible—characteristic of his country, Scotland—as to demand for its contemplation and discussion a "reverential calm." And this, while all over civilization the claims of the "sacred volume" are being disputed. The ex-premier must be content to find in and around Hawarden, in auld Scotland, the land of the great apostle John Knox, the "reverential calm" he calls for. And there he will find it in all its groveling saintliness. And yet in many parts of the lowlands he will find the claim disputed, a fact of which he cannot be ignorant.

I remember well the show of reverential calm which, glamour-like, shadowed all faces at the reading of the "holy book." The dark spell was known alike in lordly castle and in humble shieling—

Frae Maiden Kirk tae John O'Groat's.

On muir, on hill, or dale, in lowly glen, soon as the lids were parted, down flopped the reverential calm, blotting out all cheerfulness from face and mien, muffling the ears against all nasty passages, while the reader glazed them over by the aid of "holy tones."

"And let us worship God, he said with solemn air," the announcement bringing the pious gloom of the inquisitor over the face, giving to each the expression which usurped the countenance of Daniel O'Connell when he sat down to dine at the hotel table where I saw him upward of fifty years ago; a moment before, genial as sunlight, then black as horror, the natural expression veiled by the saintly abjectness imposed by mother church in "grace before meat."

But for the restless buoyancy, the pliant tendency, inherent in the human mind, a pliancy the result of perpetual counteractions springing up through life, it might be regarded as impossible to relieve Christianized society of the long poisoning process of Catholicism; and when I say Catholicism, I embrace all the sects. For out of the early church organization all the others sprung, each being the merest modification of the parent, just as the parent herself was a modification, along with certain additions, of beliefs dating back beyond history. From the nursery of the first trumpery organization all other sects hav had birth, each being indebted to the same original diablerie for their altar nourishment. How it came about that the people of the land of the great ex-premier consented to drop Druidism and join "holy mother church," and then in after years to accept the invitation, "Come out of her, my people," is explainable only on the hypothesis that the Sawnies had so much of the "Wha's like us?" in their make-up, so strong a tendency to individualism, that they preferred to hav a pope of their own, or, if not a pope, at least a chance to hav an ecclesiastical head who could speak to them in the pure Doric of the hills—a vernacular to which they religiously clung, it being, up to 1815, patriotically regarded as not straining the national vanity to suppose that even God favored it to the degree of being confused when addressed in French. "Eh, mon," quoth granny, "oor lads a' prayed when they began tae fecht, and that's the way they threshed the French at Waterloo." "But, granny, the French prayed just the same," said the grandson. "Ooh, maybe," rejoined the dame, "but who can un'erstan' their bletherin' yatter?"

Fifty years ago, veneration for an object found its acme in the crawling adoration of the Bible as evidenced by all classes in Scotland.

When dusting the few books seen on the mantel shelf, the pleasant lilt of the lassie, as she put the volumes back into their places, became hushed as she carefully took up the treasured "book o' books," and, drawing the dusting-cloth with gingerly movement over boards and binding, replaced it with a show of "reverential calm" that would hav charmed the venerable master of Hawarden.

Fifty years ago, the holy "Sabbath calm" of a Scottish Sunday, in the great city of Edinburgh, might hav been said to be not only palpable to the eye, but tangible to the touch, so apparent was it to the apprehension of all who had seen its streets from Monday to Saturday; busy as beavers through the week, dead on Sunday. On the long stretch, walled on either side by high, ungainly-looking ancient houses—in "Bonny Mary's" time the homes of titled retainers of the royal court—a stretch reaching from Holyrood palace to the beetling castle—a fortification the rudimentary construction of which antedates the history of Scotland—on this stretch now liv many of the most destitute of the city, who hav become so utterly subjugated by Presbyterianism that on Sunday no noise is heard of drunkenness or quarreling, the usual noises of the Scottish poor. The dread of John Knox, whose statue occupies a niche in a salient corner in the least savory part of the street, having apparently the same effect on them as the dread of the red man had on the infant of the early settler, the frightened mother hushing it with the whispered word, "Indians." Even the measured tramp of the soldier seemed noiseless, as, Bible in hand, sans pomp of banner or music, he marched to the "sanctuary."

No sound was heard save the church-going bells, all pealing in jangling dissonance, from the deep-toned jar of the ancient Tron, to the silvery tinkle of some modern new town steeple, inviting worshipers to hear the gospel preached and the "gude beuk" read—

How Moses bade eternal warfare wage
With Amalek's ungracious progeny;
Or how the royal bard did groaning lie
Beneath the stroke of heaven's avenging ire.

Four lines sufficiently biblical, all will admit.

The policeman, usually on the alert, sauntered along, with sanctimonious tread, humming God's praise in psalmody, while he hugged his baton.

About the time I speak of, cholera came to pay the "auld toon" a visit. I say "auld toon," knowing that the new town had but little share of attention from the pest. An awful dread fell upon the churchgoers; a dread the ministers resolved to professionally profit by. A number of them clubbed together and signed a circular to the premier in London, asking him to appoint a day of fasting and prayer to avert the scourge; an appeal eliciting the following reply: "Go home," said the great statesman to the orthodox committee, "and purify the dwellings of the poor, and complete your system of city sewerage. It will be quite useless to pray till these things be accomplished." Good for "Pam!" We ought to know that as filth and general neglect of sanitary precautions are in the question of health in the community, so are poverty and ignorance in the matter of its moral well being. Oust these curses from society, and the devil, there being no further use for him, dies.

We may with safety say that there is nothing among the knowable to stay the course of progress in society. The dwellings of the poor are not left to prayers to purify them. People know better than to trust to any agency outside of science to neutralize contagion in any form, epidemic and endemic alike refusing to be budged by prayer from pew or pulpit, priest in full canonical or layman in clouted shoon. The dwellings of the poor are less filthy than they were; society demanding through organized committees of intelligent laymen, uninfluenced by priests, to see to it that they shall be kept less filthy; the intelligent among the rich uniting in the demand for self-preservation if nothing more. Systematic drainage, too, is an acknowledged public necessity; cities vying with each other in the perfection of their channels. How many ministers in Auld Reekie, old smoky Edinburgh, could now be found to sign requests for days of fasting and prayer to avert anticipated ravages by causes so transparently beyond the reach of beseechments from altar or pews? Fasting and prayer as antidotes in the treatment of disease retire as science advances—faith cure to bring up the lagging rear.

That Scotland is being purged of Bibleism is made apparent in its land movement, and to a degree not appreciable to the ordinary observer.

Among no class of people was the influence of the minister so abjectly felt as among the crofters of the north highlands. Holding their lands so as to admit of rack-renting, a practice as heartlessly followed as ever it was in Ireland; the screws of the titled landowner were at all times mercilessly applied by the factors, the minister the while counseling non-resistance, fortifying his teachings by tid-bit texts from the "holy scriptures" in favor of the landlord, interlarding the same with deceptiv promises of compensation in after life—a cunning fraud, the bane of the ignorant laborer's life, through all the centuries of Christendom drugging the poor with its poison, cursing the springs of life from birth to death. On the land of the dukes of Argyle and Sutherland servility was made to reach down to depths of degradation scarce paralleled in religion-and-state-cursed Spain. And not until the luxurious robbers found they could make more money by raising sheep and renting shooting-boxes in the game season to wealthy denizens of the city than they could by renting their glens to men whose ancestors had cultivated their simple limits for centuries beyond the occupation of the country by the Gauls; men whose modern fathers had raised sons for the army, and had given their best strokes in battle for their kings—and even for the establishment of the present dynasty, although, in the last instance, against their will, many preferring "royal Charlie," did the worst come—sending thousands away from their homes and acres by eviction, moneyless and hopeless, to compete with lowland laborers.

Not by dukes alone was the law of eviction let loose upon the humble cultivators of the crofts. The smaller lairds availed themselvs of the same legal apparatus for dislodging the "serfs of the soil"—what else was their status? One of the lairds on being remonstrated with for his brutality, replied: "I keep my lands to make money by, just as the merchant keeps his shop open. I can make more money by raising sheep than I can by keeping men upon my acres; therefore I order the men off." "And where can the wretched dispossessed go?" urged his interrogator. "They can go to hell," was the rejoinder. So that we find the sentiment of the rich New Yorker, "The public be damned," echoed among the glens of Scotland, with an added emphasis in both word and deed. It is the universal dictum of mammon. Is it to be wondered at that the streets of Paris echoed to the cry, "A bas l'aristocrat!" or that in our day London is kept in a state of frenzied dread from hour to hour by hungry Socialists clamoring complaints in Trafalgar square? Like causes produce like effects.

No doubt there are trifling zealots, mulish dogmatists, who hug the delusion that "the Lord will settle all these difficulties in his own good time," a phrase much in vogue among the men of the pulpit and the pew during the Abolition movement immediately preceding the last war. "Vox populi vox dei" was the well-established aphorism of the ancient. The voice of the people is the voice of God, is still the well-attested truism of humanity. It is the practical language of wisdom. Man and God are the same at all times.

There is no interference with national affairs mentioned in honest history at all corresponding to the Bible accounts of worshiping golden calves, and the atrocious visitations of "divine wrath" following the nonsensical orgies; no announcements of "kindling the anger of the Lord" to the degree of tumbling an entire people into banishment; nothing in the program of the nations of commissioning butchering angels to interfere with the census to the degree of lessening the number of voters to the tune of "one hundred fourscore and five thousand" good men and true.

On what possible basis would nominees of parties speculate on majorities if such interference were still popular in divine circles? What, too, would editors of daily papers do, restricting as it would their claims to political prescience? What would become of betting on elections and the thousand and one other features of daily life? Pshaw! the humbug stories must dry up and shelve with Baron Munchausen and sich.

"The Lord helps them as helps themselvs," as one of my neighbors said the other day—a formula pretty generally accepted, and in effect giving the "God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob" a respit for all time.

A long good-night to Marmion.

The introduction of the Socialist element among the peoples of civilization is an assurance that humanity is bound

To leap the rotten pales of prejudice,
And dare assert none lordlier than themselvs.

The crofters of the isles hav done so. And whatever of hindrance may follow in the wake of their initiativ, they may be counted on forever after. They cannot be blotted out of the great program of human redemption. Once a Socialist, always a Socialist.

Bondholders, Churches, and Saloons.

Yes, the capitalistic element, the bondholders, in Europe as well as in America, and who wear the stars, hav, by and through bribing, giving "retainers" to the shysters and tricksters, called lawyers and judges, swindled the poor and middle-class people, who bear the stripes, out of so many billions of "dollars" that now our flag may very appropriately be called the Star Strangled Banner. Just consult Webster as to the definition of the word bribery.

Our United States national debt, just after the slave-mongers' rebellion, amounted to about $3.000,000,000. It is now reduced to less than half that amount, and is at a reduced rate of interest; and still it is greater than it ever was before.

Now, to the average American gawky in the Benighted States this may be a paradox. But when he is led to see that, by and through the contraction of the volume of our money, from about $55 down to about $11 per capita, the wealth-measuring capacity of each "dollar" is equal to about three of the "dollars" of 1865 and 1866, and that now it requires more labor, converted into corn, wheat, horses, cattle, sheep, chairs, buggies, pianos, or any other kind of wealth, and then into cash, to pay the total annual interest on our national, state, county, or city debts, than it did during any past year, the scales begin to fall from his poor benighted eyes, and he begins to see why it is that the capitalistic bondholder cares nothing about the number of "dollars" of wealth that he may possess; but what he does care particularly about is the amount of wealth—labor in any form—that each of those "dollars" will measure from the possession of other persons into that of himself. Now, are we poor, average American gawkies in the Benighted States, or am I harsh? Please scratch yourself and wake up, and let us hear from you, fellow truth seeker. The tariff issue is all bosh, to gull and mislead the gawky.

I hav just read in the New York Morning Journal that Mr. Warner Miller, candidate of the Republico-rebel wing of the Democro-Republico-rebel party for the position of governor of New York, in an address to the people of Brooklyn last night, Sept. 17, 1888, said: "A New York politician once remarked that he would rather hav the saloons, the whisky-shops, behind him than the churches. I think that man made a mistake. For my part, I would rather hav the churches." Now, why the churches? True, the saloons hav done and are now doing a woeful sight of harm, and they should be prohibited from doing so. But just think of Galileo in chains by the church for teaching truth and science versus superstition, humbug, falsehood! Think of the horrors of the Spanish Inquisition, the most consistent part the church ever played! Think of the rivers of blood the churches hav spilled only to keep the people in darkness and in drudgery! The churches and saloons are about alike. They each produce their peculiar form of drunkenness, hallucination, lunacy, delirium tremens. He who "has it bad" of either kind imagins that he is in great danger of being attacked by snakes, worms that die not, devils, gods, ghosts, spooks, angels, beings of human form, with wings, with or without feathers, countless monstrosities. Well did Rev. Mr. Jansen, of Iowa, say that if a man will but get drunk occasionally he can more readily believe in Christianity! Reason is the brightest jewel studded in the human mind, and, as with a post set in the ground, if it be tilted in any particular direction, it can then be more easily tilted in any other direction, and, finally, entirely dislodged. If the Republico-rebel wing elect their candidate to the presidency next fall by a very small and questionable majority, and the Democro-rebel wing count him out, and, if necessary, fight him out, tit for tat, they shall hav my aid, and in that case the Republico-rebels need not hope for an unconstitutional (ex post facto!) pardon such as they extended to the Democro-rebels. A party that willfully and traitorously stings itself to death just to hav another war for bonds, should eternally die.

New York, Sept. 18, 1888. G. N.

Satan.

In "reverential calm" I sit, as hush and quiet as a hard-boiled egg, as unwhipped cream, molasses when it does not "work," hard cider when the farmer is asleep, accounts that do not "run," "dead issues," frozen pork, as sorrows drowned in gin, as Philadelphia, and other quietnesses far too numerous to mention here. And why and wherefore do I sit in this environment of hushness of calmness, not to say calmness of hushness? Simply because I am about to approach Satan, and Gladstone says all sacred subjects embraced in the Sacred of Sacred—ye Holy Queer—should be approached when one is invested with the aurora of "reverential calm"—truly "reverential," and no brummagem substitute, you know.

To the best of my knowledge and belief, one may wade through the blood, filth, and hocus-pocus of the Holy Queer until he comes to the "book of Job," the eighteenth of the aggregation, without meeting His Satanic Majesty, but on the very threshold of the eighteenth "book" he runs plumb against the "adversary," and so abruptly as to startle him greatly and break up entirely the "reverential calm" in which he "approached" said threshold. Beyond mere mention, somewhere in Kings, one gets no intimation of the existence of H. S. M., and to meet him face to face, so unexpectedly, in Job, not only startles and thrills, but, later, casts one into the slough of enervation, when, if he wishes to be hoisted out, he must "hoist in something" without delay.

It was on the "holy seventh day," I take it, the one day "sanctified," when all nature, inanimate and animate, including rams, grasshoppers, busy bees and billy-goats and things, lay wrapped in "reverential calm" forty-horse-power hushness to the square inch, that certain of the "sons of God," residing in Uz, "came to present themselvs before the Lord, and Satan came also among them"!—the exclamation point does not appear in the H. Q., but the incident—the event—would justify an entire line of them. "And Satan came also!" Whew!—Great Jones! but isn't that a startler?

Satan among the "sons of God," and they content, for all we know to the contrary. With not a word descriptiv of his personality or peculiarities, up to date of Job's "book," with only a mere mention to the effect that "Satan tempted David to number Israel," nothing very heinous, but showing him to hav been a tempter, yet not so diabolical as the one who "did tempt Abraham" to murder Ike, here he is put before us in person, pert, palpable, and "pot-bellied," judging from his response to Jahveh's brusque and impertinent query. A very strange and trivial introduction of so important a personage, I think; one who, as alleged, is a most tremendous factor in the disposition of affairs mundane, as far as these relate to mortals, and who has been termed a rival of Jahveh in pursuit of "souls," but who is no rival, unless the sun is rival with a penny dip, or maiden fair with railway fare, being the soul-grabber par eminence!

But Satan having been sized up for our delectation, since the writing of "the book," by pulpit painters of the preposterous, working in "distemper" with gall and iron, painting him than Erebus much blacker, so, blacker far than he could be, if a reality; delineating him as one of horrid form, with horns and hoofs and barbed tail, and mien too terrible for anything; having thus pictured, and given him a history that's just too awful, why, we know all about him, of course, thanks to these artists in black who produced a nocturne that once did fright the world from its propriety, but doesn't scare worth a cent today.

"And Satan came also!" He did, eh! Well, "the book" says so, and that's enough. But where had he been all the long time "previously before" that day? He says he had been "going to and fro in the earth, and walking up and down in it." This is altogether too indefinit. It is too general and spready. It is "by and large" to a fault. It is too scattering, spreading everywhere but touching nowhere. No district attorney, unless a "simple Christian," would accept that answer, yet did Jahveh without a word! He "knew his man," probably. Now, I hav a notion that H. S. M. had been wrapped up in a "reverential calm" of the calmest and most reverential sort, previous to that time, or we should hav heard of him in connection with the deluge, Sodom and Gomorrah, that truly awful affair of the golden calf, cast and mounted for god business while Mose was on the mountain engaged in god business of another sort, and other affairs in which it would seem that he ought to hav had a hand.

What brought him out of that "reverential calm," and in form as palpable as that of pudding, peat, or porcupine? Why, he had just heard of Job, a citizen of Uz and ranchman of renown, of whom Jahveh spoke in the highest terms, though indulging in hyperbole to some extent, I think, when he declared that there was "none like him in the earth," and who, of course, must just hav rioted in "reverential calm," with all the fancy trimmings A1 righteousness affords. Hearing how Job was reveling in a genuin "r. c.," with trimmings, and not understanding how such a thing could be with man, and overcome him (Satan) like a sudden shower, he broke out of the "r. c." enveloping him, as a chicken out of the shell, or a pimple out of the skin, and struck out hot foot for Uz to see about it, you know; and of the ways and means he employed to break up that beatific "r. c." of Job's, "Barkis" in the person of Jahveh being "willin'," you hav all read, of course.

Now, none can approve of Satan's proceedings in Job's case, but all must condemn them, I think; yet how are they to look at Jahveh's hand in that game of "brag"—that's what it was, no more, no less, on the part of Jahveh? It was a bet between the high contending parties. Jahveh bet Satan—no, Satan bet Jahveh that Job would bounce out of the "r. c." under sufficient provocation, Jahveh betting he wouldn't, and giving Satan carte blanche to work the racket on Job as he pleased, only he wished him to "save his life."

How was this "saving" clause, in form of a request, from an alleged "all-powerful" being to a creature of his, powerful, but not, presumably, "all-powerful?" Either the one was overrated and the other underrated, or the latter was as many guns as the former, whether the caliber was "a. p." or lighter. It looks to me from the reading in the H. Q.—"but save his life"—and Jahveh must hav known whether he was writing himself down correctly or not, that, had Satan willed to kill Job, Jahveh cou dn't hav helped himself! Still, I am willing to admit that it may be a fault of my understanding, to which this strange request is "insoluble."

Satan, in this affair of Job's, stands head and shoulders above Jahveh, I think. He didn't put Job to the torment from pure cussedness, and for the sake of seeing him writhe and hearing him groan and cuss, but to gain the end in view, indifferent, of course, to the victim's sufferings, which indifference was not to be wondered at, he never having posed as a being of "love and mercy;" besides, if not an enemy, he was not a friend of Job, while the latter was an open and avowed enemy of his from way back. To take up Jahveh's side of the case, you find him, a friend of Job, let him tell it, Job being his friend indisputably, a Stalwart of Stalwarts in the matter of faith—you find Jahveh allowing the "arch enemy" of God, and, as alleged, of man, which allegation I deny, defying the alligator, to go for Job in a way that was painful to observe, especially in view of the extremely friendly relations existing between the God of Paradise park and the man of Uz!

You may say there was no cussedness evinced by Jahveh when he allowed this thing to go on; you may claim that he was not indifferent to Job's sufferings, but groaned in spirit on account of them. Claim not allowed. I am on the bench and doing this thing myself. I charge that he was indifferent, or he never would hav allowed the job, which he really put up himself, to go on to completion, after seeing it started; and indifference, in his case, was brother to cussedness, and twin brother at that, as I look at it. Why, the difference between the indifference of Jahveh and that of Satan represents a distance as wide as a gulf, if the gulf is very wide. As there are times in the affairs of men, and Gods, when a blunder is a crime, so there are times when indifference is cussedness, pure and simple; and that was one of the times, if ever there was one! To come down fine, I think it is drawing it mild, devilish mild, to call it indifference on the part of Jahveh, who, in cold blood, told Satan to go ahead and inflict Job to the extent of his ability, short of the coup de grace! The "loving and merciful father" who permits a loving and dutiful child to be afflicted as was Job, is no company for me, but would suit the late Signor Torquemada to a dot.

Satan skips, rather ashamed of himself, I think, after failing to bring Job to the point of cursing God, as he was advised to do by Mrs. J., and does not put in an appearance again, as far as I know, until the advent of the famous God-begotten one, when he bobs up serenely with a princely offer to the "O. B. S.," which is brusquely declined without thanks. After this second fiasco he is heard of no more. Whether he "slept with his fathers" or not, deponent sayeth not. The parsons, who call him the "devil," generally, say he "still livs," but I hav heard, and often from other sources quite as trustworthy, that "the devil is dead." I think he must hav died from gangrene of jealousy, brought on by a perusal of the Old Testament, which convinced him, probably, that he was no match for Jahvey on the cruelty lay. This discouraged him and made him tired, and to end the matter he gave up the ghost. It was a sad case of untimely end, for he must hav been a devil of promis, from what I hav heard of him. But sic transit gloria mundi!

SI SLOKUM.

"Gems from Christian Preachers."

From the Banner of Light.

Ministers and laymen of the orthodox ilk are roused every now and then to a denial that a literal sulphurous burning lake is the kind of "hell" meant by their creeds. But their denials are vain; the proofs to the contrary are too handy! We hav before us, while writing, for instance, a leaflet headed as above, containing several fine specimens in evidence, from which the following are extracted:

UNDER A PYRAMID OF CINDERS.—The Clarksburg (Va.) Register, in 1855, published the following as an extract from a sermon preached by Rev. Samuel Clawson, a Methodist minister, in allusion to a Universalist who was present: "Thank God the dav is not far distant when you will be chained down to hell's brazen floor, and the devil, with his three-pronged harpoon, will pierce your reeking heart, and pile the red-hot cinders of black damnation upon you as high as the pyramids of Egypt, and fry out the pride of your heart to grease the gudgeons of hell."

A MUSICAL DEVIL.—In Spurgeon's sermon on the Resurrection is the following: "In a fire exactly like that which we hav on earth, thy body will lie, asbestos like, forever unconsumed; every nerve a string on which the devil shall forever play his diabolical tune of Hell's Unutterable Lament."

Additional to the above, and of later date, is the following, reported in the New Orleans Picayune of July 18, 1888, as having been enunciated by Rev. Dr. W. C. McCoy at the Seashore Camp-ground, Miss., the day previous. It purported to be a description of a lost soul receiving its punishment. Said the reverend (?) gentle-man:

I can see a rebellious soul standing in the presence of Jehovah, and taunting him, while before all the hosts of heaven he dares God to do his worst. I see the angels, at God's command, grapple that defiant soul, bind him hand and foot and carry him to the utmost bound of heaven, and there, with all the power of their great strength, from the top of some vast promontory, hurl him out, out into utter darkness. I see him dashing down the vast abyss, striking from projecting crag to crag, until he lands upon that seething lake of fire, and bounding from wave to wave, bound, wrestling, struggling, unable to help himself forever and forever, groaning, subject to the power of God.

The American Secular Union.

Following us from Pittsburgh comes this jumble of bad grammar and misstatements. It is from the Press:

"The Twelfth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union ended their proceedings with a grand ball at Lafayette Hall last evening. During its progress a telegram was received from Col. R. G. Ingersoll congratulating the members on the success of their convention, and giving the Union credit for a growing feeling of shame in regard to their foolish creeds—that seven days in the week belong to the people, etc.

"The actual truth is that the session just closed was anything else but a success. Many former activ members and prominent speakers were conspicuous by their absence. The audiences were rather slim and the collections or subscriptions for the coming year were small. Notwithstanding this blasphemous assembly was called to the attention of the Law and Order Society early last Saturday, no action was taken by them. It is admitted that the treasurer, Charles Dean, through President Houston, notified Captain Wishart, but an interview by a Press reporter with the latter this morning revealed the fact that he never saw it.

"'What would you hav done, captain, if you had seen it on Saturday?'

"'Well, I don't know; I doubt if the law could reach their case. No, I do not know that the same statutes which cover my Sunday arrests contain authority which would hav given me power to arrest these people whom you term blasphemous.'

"Thus the Seculars, with only the condemnation of one paper in the city (the Press), and without any attempted interruption by our so-called Law and Order Society, hav folded their tents and silently stolen away."

The Press is, we fully believe, the only paper in Pittsburgh which would deliberately tell lies about the Congress. It has upon its editorial staff a priest who wrote the lengthy and ridiculous editorial which Mr. Watts commented upon on Sunday night. The Press only sent a reporter one or two sessions, and its Monday issue contained reports of the proceedings of Saturday. As a *news*paper the Press is worthless, and as a relater of facts is as unreliable as it can well be. The other journals gave the Congress fair reports, and, with the possible exception of the Gazette, their representativs were young men of ability and good manners. The Gazette reporter was roused to anger on Sunday night by Mr. Watts, and, with many profane adjectivs, told the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, at whose table he sat, that he should write the Congress "down" in the most lurid language that he could command. His editor, however, must hav slaughtered the youth's report, for Monday's Gazette contained only a brief but respectful account of the proceedings. So much for the Pittsburgh papers.

The audiences on Friday were not large because the people were not especially asked to come in until evening, when a good audience was present. The morning sessions were for business. Saturday and Sunday afternoons and evenings the audiences were as large as the Union has ever had at its congresses, except when Colonel Ingersoll was present. It is true that many prominent speakers were absent, but the reasons were satisfactory. Some of them had engagements elsewhere, some could not afford the expense, and some had heard from Mr. Hoover's friends of the proposed fight, and stayed away because of indisposition to participate in it. Until he arrived in Pittsburgh the present secretary had no idea that his position was to be attacked. The subscriptions for the "campaign fund" were, however, larger this year than ever before. In 1884, the first year funds were gathered at a Congress, the amount subscribed was $1 251. In 1885, $1.138. In 1886, nothing. In 1887, $828. In 1888, $1 662.25. The Congress was notable for the attendance of the older workers in Liberalism, and at each business session gray heads were more numerous than youthful faces. A great many names do not appear in the official lists, because, strange as it is, their possessors hav never qualified themselvs to vote. Even Mr. Burnham, one of the oldest and best workers for the Union, had no vote in the Congress. A little more attention should be paid to the constitutional provisions of the Union, for though "red tape" is distasteful when used too freely, no organization can maintain its dignity without adhering to at least a few rules.

There is no doubt that the Law and Order Society could hav arrested the speakers for blasphemy, but unless Pennsylvania desires to rank with New Jersey her authorities did well to refrain. The Congress adjourned when its business was finished, and the malevolent frothings of the Press had the effect only of exciting ridicule.

So much for the facts.

The Congress was a decided success. After the little trouble had been settled, the prominent feelings were good nature, enthusiasm, and a determination to make the Union a great power in the land. We do not think anyone in Pittsburgh harbors any ill-will, and we feel sure none of those who felt obliged to oppose Mr. Hoover hav any but the kindest feelings toward him or his friends. Differences will spring up in all bodies of people, but they should not be dwelt upon a minute after settlement. The cause is greater than any person, and must not be sacrificed for any reason. There never was greater need or better opportunity for the Union than at present. The school question is pressing hard, the people are waking up to the injustice of our present system of tax exemptions, and the Sunday laws are being oppressivly felt. These three issues are rousing more thought at present than at any time in the past, and the Union will find strong support for the three Demands which deal with them. There are other questions of less national importance, perhaps, but of no less importance to justice, which must be met. It is time that Girard College, the most magnifi cent charity in the world, should be wrested from the hands of sectarianism and restored to the conditions imposed by its founder. The selection of Judge Westbrook as president insures the beginning of this last enterprise. He is not a man merely of words, but a strong, industrious worker; a man of dignity, wealth, and position, a worthy successor to such men as Ingersoll and Palmer. He is a member of the bar of New York and Philadelphia and also of the Supreme Court at Washington. In the Girard College matter he has the opinions of eminent lawyers and judges (some of them churchmen) admitting that his legal points are unanswerable. With him at its head the Union ought to make a valiant fight for justice to Stephen Girard.

Of the other officers there is little need to speak. The people know them, know what they hav done, and hav an opinion of what they can do. Certainly with the limited amount of money at his command, no one could do more than the secretary has done during the past year. That his work is appreciated is shown by the increased amount of subscriptions, and probably this will be largely added to during the year.

It looks, taking it all in all, as though the Pittsburgh Press had stated the exact opposit of the truth in its reflections upon the Congress.

A Few Facts for Christians.

There are a few facts which ought to be more deeply impressed upon the mind of the Christian of to-day in regard to the superstitious and supernatural being whom he makes his idol and object of worship.

1. That there is no historical evidence that Jesus ever existed.

2. That there is no proof, or reason to believe, that he had a supernatural origin.

3. That the accounts of his resurrection are contradictory and fail to establish the fact.

4. That the miracles he is said to hav performed are based on insufficient proof.

5. That his moral teachings are imperfect, only good where borrowed from earlier teachers, and bad where original.

1. All that the world knows about Jesus Christ is found in the four gospels. These gospels are anonymous, unreliable, and contradictory. There is no evidence that one of them was written for at least one hundred and fifty years after the events they pretend to record had transpired. Irenæus is the first Christian writer who referred to them, in the latter part of the second century. Had they been known before his time it is inconceivable that some reference should not hav been made to them by the leaders of the Christians. Only two writers—Matthew and John, lay claim to having been disciples of Jesus, and Mark and Luke had to tell their stories for hearsay. As Jacolliot says, "The life of the great Christian philosopher, as transmitted to us by the evangelists, his apostles, is but a tissue of apocryphal inventions." No Greek nor Roman nor Jewish writer ever mentioned Jesus. This is sufficient to induce the strong belief that Jesus had no natural origin, but was set up by the early Christian theologians to "strike the popular imagination and solidly to establish the basis of their new religion."

2. It is claimed that Jesus had a supernatural origin. This claim is founded on a dream, which Joseph, the husband of the woman who is said to hav borne him, is said to hav had. The writer of the gospel narrating this tells it as though he had been present, yet the apostle Matthew did not write the book, nor was it in existence till Christ had been dead considerably over one hundred years. There is, then, no reason at all for believing the story. On the other hand, the probability that the tale is a legend, older by centuries than Christianity, and borrowed for the purposes of the priests, is greatly strengthened by the fact that the birth of saviors, begotten by gods or virgins, are common legends in many lands, and are supported by equally as solid evidence as that regarding Jesus. Draper says that the Egyptian disciples of Plato would hav looked with anger on those who rejected the legend that Perictione, the mother of that great philosopher, a pure virgin, had suffered an immaculate conception through the influence of Apollo, and that that God had delared to Ariston, to whom she was betrothed, the parentage of the child. Jesus himself did not claim to be more than man. And just as at first the books of the New Testament were not considered inspired, so was Jesus regarded simply as a human teacher. The inspiration of the Bible was an afterthought, a growth in superstition, and the attributing to Jesus of deityship is the work of theologians, betraying the marvelous misapprehension of nature for which the early Christians are so notorious.

3. As the legends of the supernatural births of saviors were common, so was the doctrin of the resurrection. The writer of Acts says that Christ should suffer and that he should be the first to rise from the dead. Yet if we are to believe that Christ raised the daughter of Jairus and Lazarus, or that Elisha revived and stood on his feet in the grave, then Christ was not the first to rise. All four gospel writers tell each a different story, and Paul, the one who wrote earlier than either, disagrees with them all. According to Matthew Jesus met the two Marys just after leaving the sepulcher, and told them to go and tell his disciples to meet him in Galilee. According to Mark, Jesus did not meet the two women at all, but they received their instructions from a young man in a long white garment who was sitting inside the sepulcher. According to Luke there was no appearance of Jesus to Mary or any other women, but he first appeared to two disciples who were on their way to Emmaus. According to John Jesus first appeared to Mary Magdalene. The gospel writers also disagree by their silence as to his being seen in the evening, and also as to his meeting the eleven at the Sea of Tiberias. Had these important events transpired the gospel narrators could not hav been ignorant of them. Of the ascension only Mark and Luke heard, while Matthew and John, who are affirmed to hav been personally acquainted with Jesus, knew nothing of it, or at least wrote nothing about it. Mark and the Luke who wrote the gospel of Luke say Jesus ascended to heaven the same day of the crucifixion.

Dr. Luke, who is said to hav written the Acts, says Jesus was seen for forty days. John says he was seen for eight days. Matthew predicted that Jesus should be three days in the heart of the earth, and Jesus himself prophesied his resurrection on the third day. Yet the apostles, when he was arrested, forsook him and fled, and did not watch for his resurrection when they knew he had been crucified. The contradictions of the gospel writers and the conduct of the apostles are unexplainable upon any theory which asserts that the writers knew any facts concerning events they pretend to record, or that the apostles believed that Jesus was the Christ.

4. Now, if no one knows who wrote the gospels; if it is certain that their accredited authors never heard of them; if we find in them contradictions so plain that one or the other must be false, then it follows that when they relate miraculous occurrences they cannot be believed because of their own reputations for veracity, but only as their stories are probable and in accordance with known laws. As Thomas Paine puts it, "Mankind hav conceived to themselvs certain laws, by which what they call nature is supposed to act." And "if we are to suppose a miracle to be something so entirely out of the course of what is called nature that she must go out of that course to accomplish it, and we see an account given of such a miracle by the person who said he saw it, it raises a question in the mind very easily decided, which is, Is it more probable that nature should go out of her course than that a man should tell a lie? We hav never seen, in our time, nature go out of her course, but we hav good reason to believe that millions of lies hav been told in the same time. It is, therefore, at least millions to one that the reporter of a miracle tells a lie." But if miracles could be proved, if it could be demonstrated that the course of nature can be interrupted constantly, then we should be forced to conclude either that there is no order of nature, or that all marvelous events are in accord with it, and that there is and can be no supernatural. But we know that the law of nature is never upset. We know that the earth never stops in its revolution around the sun. And we must therefore conclude that if a miracle is in correspondence with nature's order, it is no miracle; if not in such correspondence, that it could not happen. The real question to be settled, then, is not that of the supernatural, but one which concerns the narrativ of the supernatural. We can safely leave the miracles of Jesus to stand or fall with the credibility of the writers. The character of the people with whom he associated and of the times in which he lived are important in considering this subject. As illustrating the superstitious character of the times and the credulity of the people, it is only necessary to cite the importance attached to dreams and visions. The people believed also in angels who came to sleeping men, in devils who held possession of the human body, and in deaf and dumb spirits. Their credulous, uncritical character is shown in the story of Christ's work related by Mark (chap. ix, 25), in which Jesus spoke to a deaf spirit which heard him. But where the people did not believe, Jesus failed to do "mighty works," showing that miracles are only performed for the eyes of credulity. If he could hav really worked miracles, the belief or unbelief of his audience would not affect his power. The thaumaturgist of the present day does not care how many skeptics there are around him.

5. In Buckle's "History of Civilization" we read: "That the system of morals propounded in the New Testament contains no maxim which had not been previously enunciated, and that some of the most beautiful passages in the apostolic writings are quotations from pagan authors, are well known to every scholar. . . . To assert that Christianity communicated to man moral truths previously unknown, argues, on the part of the asserter, either gross ignorance, or else willful fraud." Of the first statement, Buckle says that so far from supplying, as some suppose, an objection against Christianity, it is a strong recommendation of it, as indicating the intimate relation between the doctrins of Christ and the moral sympathies of mankind in different ages. This might be true were Christianity a human religion, but it is not. All of its distinctiv features depend upon an acceptance of its supernatural character and origin. Instead, therefore, of recommending to us Christ's moral teaching, it but proves the first part of the saying that what is good in Christ's lectures and sermons is not new, and whatever is new is not good. For the truth of the last half of the proposition it is only necessary to refer to his original utterances. Unlike the previous saviors, Jesus did not consider that his mission was to the whole world—even that part of the world which he knew—but to the Jews. He told his followers not to go after the gentiles, but rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. The substance of this he repeated many times, and specially impressed upon his hearers. This does not look as though there were intimate relations between his doctrins and the moral sympathies of mankind in different ages. Had there been he would hav tried to get the gentiles into heaven as well as the Jews. This narrowness of spirit was original with him among the saviors. Other original teachings were that no one who is rich could obtain salvation, that poverty is a blessing, that all property belonged to the Lord, i.e., to the Lord's ministers, acting on which doctrin he overthrew the tables of the money-changers, borrowed an ass with her foal, and drowned some two thousand hogs by filling them with devils. Still further teachings, original with him, are those in regard to what constitutes a true believer. Those who denied his messiahship he called fools, hypocrits, thieves, serpents, vipers. His enemies who disputed his reign he desired to see slain at his feet. Those who believed should be saved; those who did not should be damned. He boldly proclaimed that he came not to bring peace, but war; to set men and women at variance with their families, and the crowning traits of a true disciple—without which, indeed, no man could be a disciple—were that he should hate his father, mother, wife, and children, and brethren and sisters. These are a few of Christ's original teachings, and no man can say that they are good, or in accord with the moral sympathies of mankind.

It is facts such as these to which the Christian of the present day pays so little attention that it is necessary to remind him of them occasionally, that we refer to. They constitute a portion of the hundreds of reasons why the Christian system of theology should not be accepted by thinking people of the present age.

We do not write them in a "blasphemous, malignant, or vulgar spirit," but to warn reasonable creatures away from the sloughs of idiocy in which the orthodox preachers are wallowing.

Mr. Walker: His Enemies and His Ideas.

The trial of Messrs. Harman and Walker has again been postponed, this time to the spring term of court. The reason for this, says Mr. Walker, is that the officials concerned in the case are busily engaged in the work of building and repairing political fences. We sincerely hope they will build a good many miles of fences before they drag the defendants into court, though it be necessary to build them out into the Pacific to occupy their time. Even dipping the ocean dry with a thimble would be a better occupation than trying three men for doing nothing criminal.

This may be, perhaps, a good place to acknowledge Mr. Walker's handsome apology for misrepresenting the sentiment expressed in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We trust that hereafter he will observe strict accuracy in these matters. But Mr. Walker returns to the argument in this way:

"I am by no means prepared to admit that parents and guardians cannot care for their children's moral health as well as provide for their physical needs and guide their mental unfoldment, once they are left free to act. I doubt very much if Mr. Macdonald would argue in favor of a law to punish Catholic propagandists for putting the literature of that church into the hands of the children of Protestants and Freethinkers. I see no more reason for supporting the class of statutes which he is defending than I do for advocating the suppositious law I hav just mentioned. Neither Catholicism nor sexual ignorance is to be eliminated by law. Regarding the former, Mr. Macdonald would say that what he asks is that all the special privileges granted to the church be withdrawn. So I say that what Social Radicals demand is that all the special privileges granted to ignorance and prudery be withdrawn, and intelligence and candor be left free to lead the rising generations into the paths of health. So long as philanthropists are punished for trying to disseminate useful information amongst the people so long will there seem to be need for the quack remedy of law. It is useless to say that the evil lies in the enactment of these laws by national instead of by local lawmakers. The intelligence of aldermen is not greater than that of Congressmen, and they are certainly as much under the influence of religious and other prejudices as are the latter.

"We do not expect reformation to come in a day, or a month, or a year, or a century, but we believe concerning morals as Mr. Macdonald does regarding religion, viz., that liberty is the essential condition of progress, and hence the removal of the barriers is the first work we hav to do. So long as we depend upon the law to do for us and our children what we should do for ourselvs and for them, so long will the work be ill done and the law be the greatest criminal in the land. Let us be Freethinkers all through instead of merely on the surface; let us trust liberty in morals and hygiene as well as in religion and politics, and cease frittering away our energies in the enactment and enforcement of laws which are sure to produce ten times more evil in the hands of bigots than they will good in those of Freethinkers, admitting for argument's sake merely that even the latter could be trusted with the power that such laws would giv them, and that they would not make the dirtiest of musses in the attempt to enforce them."
